Doctor Sands disguiseth himselfe like a gentleman, and escapeth.

if you meet your brother in the street, shun him not, but outface him, and know him not. Accordinglie doctor Sands did, clothed like a gentleman in all respects, and looked wildlie as one that had beene long kept in prison out of the light. Beniamin carried him through Birching lane, and from one lane to another till he came at Moore gate: there they went forth vntill they came to Bednoll greene, where the horsses were readie, and maister Hurleston to ride with him as his man. Doctor Sands pulled on his boots, and taking leaue of his friend Beniamin, with teares they kissed ech other, he put his hand in his purse, and would haue giuen Beniamin a great part of that little he had, but Beniamin would take none. Yet since doctor Sands hath remembred him thankfullie. He rode that night to his father in law maister Sands where his wife was, he had not been there two houres, but it was told maister Sands that there was two of the gard which would that night apprehend doctor Sands, and so they were appointed.

That night doctor Sands was guided to an honest farmer neere the sea, where he taried two daies and two nights in a chamber without all companie. After that he shifted to one James Mower a shipmaster, who dwelt at Milton shore, where he expected wind for the English fleet readie into Flanders. While he was there, James Mower brought to him fortie or fiftie mariners, to whome he gaue an exhortation; they liked him so well, that they promised to die for it, yer that he should be apprehended. The first of Maie, being sundaie the wind serued: he toke his leaue of his host and hostesse, and went towards the ship. In taking leaue of his hostesse who was baren, and had beene married eight yeares, he gaue hir a fine handkercher and also an old rosall of gold in it, thanking hir much, and said: Be of good comfort, yer that an whole yeere be past God shall giue you a child a boie. And it came to passe, for that daie twelue moneths lacking one daie, God gaue hir a faire sonne.

God stirreth vp the harts of the mariners to fauor doctor Sands &c.

Doctor Sands his prophetical dieting to his hostesse at his departing.

At the shore doctor Sands met with maister Isaac of Kent, who had his eldest sonne there, who vpon the liking he had to doctor Sands, sent his sonne with him, who afterward died in his fathers house in Frankford. Doctor Sands and doctor Cox were both in one ship, being one Cokzels ship. They were within the kenning when two of the gard came thither to apprehend doctor Sands. They arriued at Antwerpe, being bid to dinner to maister Locke. And at dinner time one George Gilpin being secretarie to the English house, and kinsman to doctor Sands, came to him and rounded him in his eare, and said; King Philip hath sent to make search for you, and to apprehend you. Herevpon they rose from their dinner in a maruellous great shower, and went out at the gate toward the land of Cleue; there they found a wagon and hailed awaie, and came safe to Aulspurge in Cleueland, where doctor Sands taried fouretæne daies, and then iournied towards Strasborough, where after he had liued one yeare, his wife came vnto him. He fell sore sicke of a flix which kept him nine moneths, and brought him to deaths dore. He had a child which fell sicke of the plague and died. His wife at length fell sicke of a consumption and died in his armes; no man had a more godlie woman to his wife.

Doctor Sands and doctor Cox go by wagon into Cleueland.

After this, maister Samson went awaie to Emanuell, a man skilfull in the Hebrue. Maister Grindall went into the countrie to learne the Dutch tong. Doctor Sands still remained in Strasborough, whose sustentation then was chieflie from one maister Isaac, who loued him most dearelie, and was euer more readie to giue than he to take. He gaue him in that space aboue one hundred marks, which sum the said doctor Sands paid him againe, and by his other gifts and friendlinesse shewed himselfe to be a thankfull man. When his wife was dead, he went to Zurike, and there was in Peter Martyrs house for the space of fiue weekes. Being there as they sate at dinner, word suddenlie came that quéene Marie was dead, and doctor Sands was sent for by his friends at Strasborough. That news made maister Martyr and maister Iarret then there verie ioyfull: but doctor Sands could not reioise, it smote into his hart that he should be called to ministerie. Maister Bullinger and the ministers feasted him, and he toke his leaue and returned into Strasborough, where he preached, and so maister Grindall and he came towards England, and then to London the same daie that quéene Elizabeth was crowned.

Happie newes of quéen Maries death: whereupon doctor Sands returneth home into England.

This is the true storie of such accidents as befell doctor Sands, a reuerend father, and constant in the truth; whereof if anie part had beene false, likelie it is that one or other would haue barked against it per now. But the report being common, and hauing beene thus long extant in print, the silence of men is a sufficient proofe & confirmation of the truth.] Here therfore we will leaue doctor Sands in his archiepiscopall see of Yorke; and after this long (but yet needfull) digression fall againe to the discourse of Calis; which being lost (as you haue heard) in a verie short time after so long possession, tidings thereof were carried to and fro, farre and neere, by word of mouth and by writing. In so much that the same newes likewise being made notorious and knowne to the French were not so ioifullie receiued in France, as they were generallie gricuous and displeasant to the whole relme of England: but speciallie to quéene Marie, who being a princesse of hart and courage, more than commonlie is in womankind, thought hir selfe so much touched in honour by the losse of hir said towne and possessions on that side the sea, as she counted hir life irksome, vntill the same were either recouered againe, or the losse redoubled with some like victorie against the French elsewhere.

With what indignation quéene Marie toke the losse of Calis.

In respect whereof she ceased not to trauell after with king Philip hir husband, as with hir owne priuie councell, and the lords of the realme, which waie should be best to reuenge this iniurie: and speciallie now whilest the French king was occupied in wars with king Philip, to indamage some of his countries by waie of inuasion, & to surprise some of his townes vpon the sudden. And among sundrie deuises, none was thought so fit to be attempted as an hauen towne in Britaine called Brest, which in the time of king Richard the second was kept and mainteined with an English garrison, vntill the said king rendered the same to the French king againe by composition. This towne as well for the conuenient situation alwaies readie to receiue fresh succors and victelling out of England by sea, as also for that it was knowne to the quéene and hir councell at that present, not to be furnished with anie garrison of soldiors, sufficient to repell the power of a prince vpon the sudden, was thought to be the best marke to be shot at for the time. Wherefore vpon this case well debated, there was immediatlie order giuen to Edward lord Clinton then high admerall of England, with all expedition to prepare himselfe with all the quéenes ships of warre, furnished with soldiors, munition & victels, to ioine with the admerall of king Philip, who had like order from the said king to ioine with the naule of England for the atchiuing of this enterprise.

But before I declare to you the aduenture of these two great naules by sea, it shall not be impertinent to touch some accidents in the mean time by land.

land. While king Philip being absent from the low countrie, was (as you haue heard) occupied with his warres in France, monsieur de Thermes the new capteine of Calis, being a man verie expert in the wars (whose propertie is neuer to neglect anie time of aduantage) call in his mind, how (during king Philips absence) to do some singular seruice to the French king his maister. And espieng well the negligence of the Flemings his neighbors, how little they vnderstood the great weakening of their countrie by the losse of Calis, and that there was no new prouision made for the defense thereof, more than was before, whilest Calis was English, by the losse wherof, their frontiers were now become open for the French at all times to enter. He therefore taking out of Calis so manie of his soldiors as might be spared from thense, adioining to them all the forces of the French garrisons in Arthois, Bullongnois, and Picardie, whereof togither with the soldiors of Calis, being to the number of seuen hundred footmen, and three hundred light horsemen Scotish, there were assembled foure téene ensigns of the French footmen, eighténe vanlins of Almans, foure or fiue hundred men at armes of France, beside the light horsemen Scots, amounting in the whole to the number at the least of nine thousand footmen, and fifteene hundred horsemen, entred into Flanders, with full determination to spoile and waste all king Philips countrie along the sea coast, and namelie a proper hauen towne called Dunkirke, and with like purpose to haue surprised the towne of Graueling; if occasion would so serue.

Monsieur de Thermes capteine of Calis worketh vpon the aduantage to the French king more honorable feate.

Happie newes of queene Maries death: whereby vpon doctor Standis returne thither into England.

Monsieur de Thermes determination to spoile king Philips countrie.

This capteine following his enterprise, of a policie passing by the towne of Graueling, laid siege to a little towne not farre from thence called Berghs, which he wan in a small time, and with small resistance, leauing the saccage of the same vnto his soldiors, where they found manie good bootes. And without long staieng they marched forth to Dunkirke beforesaid, and planting a siege in like maner there, battered the same so sharplie with the cannon, that within lesse than foure daies he became maister of the towne, which he in like maner put to the sacke, where was found more plentie of spoile and good bootes, than in anie place before, so farre forth as the meanest slaues and lackies came awaie rich. And after setting the towne on fire (whereby all in the countrie about were maruellouslie put in feare) and the French spreading further abroad, wasted the most fruitfull quarter of all that part of Flanders, euen almost vnto Newport. But yet bicause that monsieur de Thermes fell diseased of the gowt, the armie withdrew and incamped within halfe a mile of Graueling, & for his more ease, he himselfe laie at Dunkirke, and in the meane time diuerse skirmishes fell out betweene the Frenchmen, and them of the garrison within Graueling.

With what indignation queene Marie tooke the losse of Calis.

Dunkirke besieged, taken, and burned by the French.

Force intended against Wzell in Westfaine.

Monsieur de Thermes sicke of the gowt.

During which passtime, the countie de Aiguemont (or as he is commonlie called Egmond) lieutenant generall for king Philip in the low countrie, with all hast possible assembled all the power as well of king Philips garrisons, as also of men of warre in the low countrie, to the number of foure téene or fiftéene thousand footmen, and two or three thousand horsemen, whereof there were fiftéene hundred swart Rutters, determining so to affront the French, that either they should passe no further into the countrie, or at the least waie to impeach them from the siege of Graueling, whereof there was great appearance. Monsieur de Thermes hearing of this power assembled (though scarselie well recouered) made all possible hast toward Graueling, where he was no sooner arriued, but that he saw his enimies readie ranged in the field. By reason whereof his studie was now nothing else but how he might bring home his armie in safetie to Calis.

Countie Egmond lieutenant generall for king Philip in the low countrie.

The countie de Egmond espieng the Frenchmen bent to march awaie with the spoile of the countrie, cut betweene them and home, placing his battels in such order, that the Frenchmen had no waie to passe, but vpon the sands betweene the towne and the sea. Whereas by good chance late a great fleet of queene Maries ships of warre, within the danger of whose gunshot the Frenchmen had no shift but to passe as their iournie laie. And so being forced either to fasht or to fight at disaduantage, monsieur the Thermes without staieng anie longer, caused his vantgard to passe ouer the riuer somewhat neere the towne, to auoid the shot of the English ships. And staieng vpon the further side for the residue of his battels, there came such thicke haile shot of artillerie out of the towne on the one side, and from the English ships on the other side, that there was a full batterie made vpon the Frenchmen on all sides, which they neuertheless abode, without breaking order for the time, when suddenlie appeered before them two great troops of horsemen, of fiftéene hundred a peece, part swart Rutters, and part Burgognians, whereof the one in front, and the other in flanke, gaue strong charges vpon the French vantgard, who being well backed with their other battels (whereof the most part then had passed the riuer) stoutlie repelled these two first troops, though not without losse of manie their best soldiors.

A valiant enset giuen vpon the Frenchmen by countie Egmond.

So thus both parties being at a staie, and seuered somewhat asunder, the countie de Egmond himselfe with eighténe hundred men of armes, and his foot battels following, before the French had well recouered breath, recharged vpon them with all his forces togither, so terriblie that he choked all their battell, and the number toke them to flight, without further triall. So by that time that the footmen on either side came to the push of the pike, the victorie was sone had, by reason (as the Frenchmen report) that the Almans beaten back with artillerie, as well of the towne as of the ships before said, brake their order, and came not to the shocke, whereby the whole charge of the battell rested vpon the French bands onelie. This field was fought the thirteenth of Julie 1558, vpon the sea sands neere to Graueling, where besides those that were slaine, being esteemed to the number of fiue thousand fighting men, there were taken prisoners the marshall de Thermes capteine of Calis, monsieur Senerpont gouernour of Bullongne, monsieur Villebou gouernour of Picardie, monsieur Annebault sonne to the late admerall Annebault, knight of the order, monsieur de Mozuilliers gouernour of Abuile, monsieur de Channe gouernour of Cozbie, beside a great number of other gentlemen, valiant capteins & soldiors: but specialli the bands of Calis went to wracke, so as verie few returned home to bring tidings. Which gaue such a terrour to the soldiors remaining in Calis, that it is verelie beleeued, that if the admerals of England and Flanders had béene present there with their nauies, as the said other few ships of England were, and vpon this sudden had attempted Calis, with the aid of the countie Egmond hauing his power present: the towne of Calis might haue béene recouered againe with as little difficultie, and hapilie in as short time as it was before gained by the duke of Guise. But the said admerals (as it appeared) knew nothing thereof. Wherefore following their prescribed course, & ioining togither at the place appointed, they sailed from thence with prosperous winds & weather, & by the nine and twentith daie of the same moneth, and in the said yeare, with seuen score ships of warre, appeared by the breake of the the daie before the hauen of Conquest, commonlie called Conquet in Britaine; whereof the poet saith, touching the seat of the same, abutting vpon the sea:

Nobile Conquetum salsis Thetis alluit vndis.

At whose arriuall there (as the manner is) they sounded their trumpets, & with a thundering peale of great ordinance gaue a lowd salue vnto the Britains: and by eight of the clocke the same morning, mauger all the power of the countrie, being assembled there in armes, with manie peeces of great artillerie, to defend the entrie of their port, the Englishmen manning forth their shipboats, with manie valiant capteins and soldiors, recouered landing, and within short time became maisters of the said towne of Conquet, which they put to the saccage, with a great abbeie, and manie prettie townes and villages neere thereabouts, where our men found great store of pillage and good booties. This done, they marched into the countrie, and burned manie villages and houses: and after withdrew downe vnto the sea side, where their ships late readie to receiue them. But the Flemmings being couetous of spoile, passing further into the land, before they could recouer their ships againe, were incountered by the power of the countrie, by whome there were slaine of them to the number of foure or fiue hundred.

Conquest or Conquet taken and burned.

A great slaughter of the Flemmings occasioned by their owne couetousnesse.

The admerals perceiuing the power of the countrie greatlie to increase, and hauing intelligence that the duke of Estampes the French kings lieutenant in Britaine was verie neere, comming on with a great number of horsemen and footmen, estéemed to be about twentie thousand (as the Frenchmen themselues affirme) thought not best to attempt anie assault against the towne of Brest, or to make longer abode there. But yet in hope to doo some further exploit elsewhere, they late there houering on the coast a while, to vnderstand the demeanour of the Britains: but by this time there was such numbers of people raised in all those parts for defense of the same coasts, that the admerals afterward attempting in diuers places to land their men, and finding ech where more appearance of losse than of gaine, returned home without atchiuing anie further enterprise. In this meane time, while king Philip and the French king, with two most puissant armies affronted ech other, neere vnto the water of Some, either of them was obstinatelie bent to driue the other out of the field, for which cause they intrenched their campes.

The admerals remoue for feare of losse.

Anno Reg. 6.

No memorable act doone by either of the kings during the affronting of their armies.

During which time there was nothing doone betweene them worthie memorie, more than dailie skirmishes of no great account. Neuertheless, the countrie of France could not but sustaine extreame damage, so long sustaining such a maine multitude, specially of men of warre, which those two mightie kings had assembled. And daie by daie came fresh companies to either partie; so as it was thought a thing impossible that such two princes being so neere, could depart without some cruell bloudie battell to determine their quarrels. But God, in whose hands are the hearts of kings (when least hope was) conuerted their obstinate minds from warre to peace, which came chiefli to passe by the mediation of the duchesse of Lorraine, who had béene a long and earnest trauailer to that end; and neuer ceassed, vntill by hir intercession, both the said kings appointed speciall commissioners to treat vpon peace. So that after diuerse conferences, they at last concluded vpon all controuersies, except the matter of Calis, wherof quéene Marie by hir ambassadours required restitution: but the French partie would in no wise heare thereof. By reason of which difficultie, this treatie could not come to anie good conclusion. King Philip thinking himselfe bound in honour to stand in that case with the quéene his wife, who for his sake had entered into a needlesse warre against France, and thereby lost hir said towne, with all the countrie adioining (as you haue heard before) did therefore staie a long time before he concluded peace with the French king.

Peace is procured betweén both kings at the sute and séeking of the duchesse of Lorraine.

Quéene Marie séeing no likelihood, nor hauing anie hope of the restitution of Calis, and considering also that most of hir affaires had but hard successe, conceiued an inward sorrow of mind: by reason whereof about September next she fell sicke of a hot burning feauer, which sickenesse was common that yeare through all the realme, and consumed a maruellous number, as well noblemen, as bishops, iudges, knights, gentlemen, and rich farmers: but most of the clergie, and other ancient and graue persons. In which while the quéene late languishing of a long sicknesse, and so continued vntill the seuentéenth of Nouember next betweéne the houres of fiue or six in the morning, and then ended hir life in this world, at hir house of saint James besides Westminster, when she had reigned fiue years, foure moneths, and eleuen daies, and in the three and fortith yeare of hir bodilie age. The death of this said quéene made a marueilous alteration in this realme, namelie in the case of religion, which like as by the death of king Edward the first it suffered a change from the establishment of his time: so by the death of this quéene it returned into the former estate againe. So that we sée the vncertaintie of the world, and what changes doo come in times by their reuolutions, and that euerie thing is subiect to vnconstancie, and nothing free from variablenesse; as the poet saith:

Q. Marie prosile for the losse of Calis.

And here, bicause we are come to the knitting vp of quéene Maries reigne, I cannot ouerslip with silence that notable and needfull discourse of master Fox concerning our blessed souereigne, quéen Elizabeth, whose maiestie the Lord of his mercie inuiron with frends as in number manie, so in seruice trustie; and whose enimies the same Lord in iustice rot out from the land of the liuing, heaping vpon them plague after plague, to their vtter confusion, bicause they haue reiected the gratious means of their conuersion. Thus therefore writeth master Fox concerning the mischéeuous persecution and miraculous preseruation of ladie Elizabeth, now quéene of England, from extreame calamitie and danger of life, in the time of quéene Marie hir sister.

But (saith master Fox) when all hath béene said and told, what soeuer can be recited touching the admirable working of Gods present hand in defending and preseruing anie one person out of thraldome, neuer was there since the memorie of our fathers, anie example to be shewed, wherin the Lords mightie power hath more admirablie and blessedlie shewed it selfe, to the glorie of his owne name, to the comfort of all good hearts, and to the publike felicitie of this whole realme, than in the miraculous custodie and outscape of this our souereigne ladie, now quéene, then ladie Elizabeth, in the strict time of quéene Marie hir sister. In which storie, first we haue to consider in what extreame miserie, sickenesse, feare, and perill hir highnesse was; into what care, what trouble of mind, and what danger of death she was brought. First with great routs and bands of armed men (and happie was he that might haue the carrieng of hir) being fetched vp as the greatest traitour in the world, clapped in the tower, and againe tossed from thence, from house to house, from prison to prison, from post to piller, at length also prisoner in hir owne house, and garded with a sort of cut-throats, which euer Secondlie, we haue againe to conſider, all this notwithſtanding, how ſtrangelie, or rather miraculouſlie from danger ſhe was deliuered: what fauour and grace ſhe found with the almightie, who when all helpe of man, and hope of recouerie was paſt, ſtretched out his mightie protection, and preſerued hir highneſſe, and placed hir in this princelie ſeat of reſt and quietneſſe, wherin now ſhe ſitteth, and long maie ſhe ſit, the lord of his glorious mercie grant, we beſeech him*. In which ſtorie, if I ſhould ſet forth at large and at full, all the particulars and circumſtances thereunto belonging, and as iuſt occaſion of the hiſtorie requireth, beſides the importunate length of the ſtorie diſcourſed, peraduenture it might moue offenſe to ſome being yet aliue, and truth might get me hatred. Yet notwithſtanding, I intend (by the grace of Chriſt) therein to vſe ſuch breuitie and moderation, as both may be to the glorie of God, the diſcharge of the ſtorie, the profit of the reader, & hurt to none, ſuppreſſing the names of ſome, whome here although I could recite, yet I thought not to be more cruell in hurting their name, than the queene hath beene mercifull in pardoning their liues.

Therefore now to enter into the diſcourſe of this tragicall matter, firſt here is to be noted, that queene Marie when ſhe was firſt queene, before ſhe was crowned, would go no whither, but would haue hir by the hand, and ſend for hir to dinner and ſupper: but after ſhe was crowned, ſhe neuer dined nor ſupped with hir, but kept hir alone from hir, &c. After this it happened, immediatlie vpon the riſing of ſir Thomas Wiat (as before was mentioned, * pag. 1418, 1419) that the ladie Elizabeth and the lord Courtneie were charged with falſe ſuſpicion of ſir Thomas Wiats riſing. Wherevpon queene Marie, whether for that ſurmiſe, or for what other cauſe I know not, being offended with the ſaid Elizabeth hir ſiſter, at that time lieng in hir houſe at Aſhridge, the next daie after the riſing of Wiat, ſent to hir three of hir councellors, to wit, ſir Richard Southwell, ſir Edward Haſtings, then maſter of the horſſe, and ſir Thomas Cornwallis, with their retinue and troupe of horſemen, to the number of two hundred & fiftie. Who at their ſudden and vnprouided comming, found hir at the ſame time ſore ſicke in hir bed, and verie feeble and weake of bodie. Whither when they came, aſcending vp to hir graces priuie chamber, they willed one of hir ladies, whome they met, to declare vnto hir grace, that there were certeine come from the court, which had a meſſage from the queene.

Hir grace hauing knowledge thereof, was right glad of their comming: howbeit, being then verie ſicke, and the night farre ſpent (which was at ten of the clocke) ſhe requeſted them by the meſſenger, that they would reſort thither in the morning. To this they anſwered, and by the ſaid meſſenger ſent word againe, that they muſt needs ſee hir, and would ſo do, in what caſe ſoeuer ſhe were. Whereat the ladie being againſt, went to ſhew hir grace their words: but they haſtilie following hir, came ruſhing as ſone as ſhe into hir graces chamber vnbidden. At whoſe ſo ſudden comming into hir bed chamber, hir grace being not a little amazed, ſaid vnto them: Is the haſt ſuch, that it might not haue pleaſed you to come to morrow in the morning? They made anſwer, that they were right ſorie to ſee hir in that caſe. And I (quoth ſhe) am not glad to ſee you here at this time of the night. Wherevnto they anſwered, that they came from the queene to do their meſſage and dutie: which was to this effect, that the queens pleaſure was, that ſhe ſhould be at London the ſeauenth daie of that preſent moneth. Wherevnto ſhe ſaid; Certeſſe, no creature more glad than I to come to hir maieſtie, being right ſorie that I am not in caſe at this time to wait on hir, as you your ſelues do ſee and can well teſtifie.

In deed we ſee it true (quoth they) that you do ſaie: for which we are verie ſorie: albeit we let you to vnderſtand, that our commiſſion is ſuch, and ſo ſtraineth vs, that we muſt needs bring you with vs, either quicke or dead. Whereat ſhe being amazed, ſorrowfullie ſaid, that their commiſſion was verie ſore: but yet notwithſtanding ſhe hoped it to be otherwiſe, and not ſo ſtrict. Yes verelie, ſaid they. Wherevpon they called for two phyſicians, doctor Owen and doctor Wendie, demanding of them, whether ſhe might be remoued from thence with life, or no. Whoſe anſwer and iudgement was, that there was no impediment (in their iudgement) to the contrarie, but that ſhe might trauell without danger of life. In concluſion, they willed hir to prepare againſt the morning at nine of the clocke to go with them, declaring that they had brought with them the queenes litter for hir. After much talke, the meſſengers declaring how there was no prolonging of times and daies, ſo departed to their chamber, being interteined and cheared as apperteined to their worſhips.

On the next morrow at the time preſcribed, they had hir forth as ſhe was, verie faint and feeble, and in ſuch caſe that ſhe was readie to ſound three or foure times betweene them. What ſhould I ſpeake heere that cannot well be expreſſed, what an heauie houſe there was to behold the vnreuerend and dolefull dealing of theſe men, but eſpeciallie the carefull feare and captiuitie of their innocent ladie and miſtreſſe? Now to proceed in hir iornie from Aſhridge all ſicke in the litter, ſhe came to Redborne, where ſhe was garded all night: from thence to S. Albons, to ſir Rafe Rowlets houſe, where ſhe tarried that night, both feeble in bodie, and comfortleſſe in mind. From that place they paſſed to maſter Dods houſe at Pims, where alſo they remained that night: and ſo from thence ſhe came to Highgate: where ſhe being verie ſicke, taried that night and the next daie. During which time of hir abode there, came manie purſeuants and meſſengers from the court: but for what purpoſe I cannot tell.

From that place ſhe was conueied to the court: where (by the waie) came to meet hir manie gentlemen, to accompanie hir highneſſe, which were verie ſorie to ſee hir in that caſe. But eſpeciallie a great multitude of people there were ſtanding by the waie, who then flocking about hir litter, lamented and bewailed greatlie hir eſtate. Now, when ſhe came to the court, hir grace was there ſtraightwaies ſhut vp, and kept as cloſe priſoner a fortnight, which was till Palmeſundaie, ſeeing neither king nor queene, nor lord, nor friend, all that time, but onelie then the lord chamberlaine, ſir John Gage, and the vicechamberlaine which were attendant vnto the doores. About which time ſir William Sentlow was called before the councell; vnto whoſe charge it was laid, that he knew of Wiats rebellion. Which he ſtoutlie denied, proteſting that he was a true man, both to God and his prince, defieng all traitors and rebels: but being ſtrictlie examined, he was in concluſion committed to the tower.

The fridaie before Palmeſundaie, the biſhop of Wincheſter, with nineteene others of the councell (who ſhall be here nameleſſe) came vnto hir grace from the queenes maieſtie, and burdened hir with Wiats conſpiracie: which ſhe vtterlie denied, affirming that ſhe was altogither giltleſſe therein. They being not contented with this, charged hir grace with buſineſſe made by ſir Peter Carew, and the reſt of the gentlemen of the weſt countrie: which alſo the diterlie denieng, cleared hir innocencie therein. In conclusion, after long debating of matters, they declared vnto hir, that it was the quéenes will and pleasure that she should go vnto the tower, while the matter were further tried and examined. Whereat she being agast, said, that she trusted the quéenes maiestie would be more gratious ladie vnto hir, and that hir highnesse would not otherwise conceiue of hir, but that she was a true woman: declaring furthermore to the lords, that she was innocent in all those matters wherin they had burdened hir; and desired them therefore to be a further meane to the quéene hir sister, that she being a true woman in thought, word, and déed towards hir maiestie, might not be committed to so notorious & dolefull a place: protesting that she would request no mercie at hir hand, if she should be proued to haue consented vnto anie such kind of matter, as they had laid vnto hir charge: and therefore in fine desired their lordships to thinke of hir that she was, and that she might not so extremelie be dealt withall for hir truth.

Ladie Elizabeth threatned to go to the tower.

Ladie Elizabeth purgeth hir selfe to the lords.

Wherevnto the lords answered againe, that there was no remedie, for that the quéenes maiestie was fullie determined that she should go vnto the tower. Wherewith the lords departed, with their caps hanging ouer their eies. But not long after, within the space of an houre or little more, came foure of the foresaid lords of the councell, which were the lord treasurer, the bishop of Winchester, the lord Steward, the earle of Sussex, with the gard, who warding the next chamber to hir, secluded all hir gentlemen and yeomen, ladies and gentlewomen, sauing that for one gentleman vsher, three gentlewomen, and two groomes of hir chamber, were appointed in their roomes three other men of the quéenes, and three waiting women to giue attendance vpon hir, that none should haue accesse to hir grace. At which time there were an hundred of northerne souldiers in white cotes, watching and warding about the gardens all that night, a great fire being made in the midst of the hall, and two certeine lords watching there also with their band and companie.

Ladie Elizabeths seruãts remoued from hir.

The quéenes men, and waiting women attendant vpõ ladie Elizabeth.

Vpon saturdate following, two lords of the councell (the one was the earle of Sussex, the other shall be nameles) came and certified hir grace, that forthwith she must go vnto the tower, the barge being prepared for hir, and the tide now readie, which tarieth for no bodie. In heauie mood hir grace requested the lords that she might tarie another tide, trusting that the next would be better and more comfortable. But one of the lords replied, that nether tide nor time was to be delaied. And when hir grace requested him that she might be suffered to write to the quéenes maiestie, he answered, that he durst not permit that: adding that in his iudgement it would rather hurt, than profit hir grace in so doing. But the other lord, more courteous and fauorable (who was the earle of Sussex) kneeling downe, said she should haue libertie to write; and as he was a true man, he would deliuer it to the quéenes highnesse, & bring an answer of the same, what soeuer came thereof. Wherevpon she wrote, albeit she could in no case be suffered to speake with the quéene to hir great discomfort, being no offendor against the quéenes maiestie.

Ladie Elizabeth writeth to the quéene but it would not serue.

And thus the tide and time passed awaie for that season, they priuilie appointing all things readie that she should go the next tide which fell about midnight: but for feare she should be taken by the waie, they durst not. So they staied till the next date, being Palmesundate, when about nine of the clocke these two returned againe, declaring that it was time for hir grace to depart; she answering: If there be no remedie, I must be content, willing the lords to go before. Being come forth into the garden, she did cast vp hir eies toward the window, thinking to haue séene the quéene, which she could not. Whereat she said she marueled much what the nobilitie of the realme meant, which in that sort would suffer hir to be led into captiuitie, the Lord knew whither, for she did not. In the meane time commandement was giuen in all London, that euerie one should kéepe the church and carie their palmes, while in the meane season she might be conueied without all recourse of people into the tower.

After all this, she tooke hir barge with the two foresaid lords, three of the quéenes gentlewomen, and three of hir owne, hir gentleman vsher, and two of hir grooms, lieng & houering vpon the water a certeine space, for that they could not shoot the bridge, the bargemen being verie vnwilling to shoot the same so soone as they bad, bicause of the danger therof: for the sterne of the boat stroke vpon the ground, the fall was so big, and the water was so shallow, that the boat being vnder the bridge, there staied againe a while. At landing, she first staied, and denied to land at those staires where all traitors and offendors customablie vsed to land, neither well could she vnlesse she should go ouer hir shoo. The lords were gone out of the boat before, and asked why she came not. One of the lords went backe againe to hir, and brought word she would not come. Then said one of the lords which shall be nameless, that she should not chose: and bicause it did then raine, he offered to hir his cloke, which she (putting it backe with hir hand with a good dash) refused. So she comming out, hauing one foot vpon the staire, said; Here landeth as true a subiect being prisoner, as euer landed at these staires: and before thée O God I speake it, hauing none other frends but thée alone.

To whome the same lord answered againe, that if it were so, it was the better for hir. At hir landing there was a great multitude of their seruants and warders standing in their order; What néeded all this said she: It is the vse (said some) so to be when anie prisoner came thither. And if it be (quoth she) for my cause, I beseech you that they may be dismissed. Wherat the poore men kneeled downe, and with one voice desired God to preserue hir grace, who the next daie were released of their cold coats. After this passing a little further, she sat downe vpon a cold stone, and there rested hir selfe. To whom the lieutenant then being, said; Madame, you were best to come out of the raine, for you sit vnwholesomelie. She then replieng, answered againe: Better sitting here than in a worse place, for God knoweth, I know not whither you will bring me. With that hir gentleman vsher wept: she demanding of him what he meant so vncomfortable to vse hir, seeing she tooke him to be hir comforter, and not to dismaie hir, especiallie for that she knew hir truth to be such, that no man should haue cause to weepe for hir. But forth she went into the prison.

The friendlie speach of the earle of Arundell to the ladie Elisabeth.

The doores were locked and bolted vpon hir: which did not a little discomfort and dismaie hir grace. At what time she called to hir gentlewoman for hir booke, desiring God not to suffer hir to build hir foundation vpon the sands but vpon the rocke, whereby all the blasts of bluttering weather should haue no power against hir. The doores being thus locked, and the close shut vp, the lords had great conference how to kéepe ward and watch, euerie man declaring his opinion in that behalfe, agreeing strictlie and circumspectlie to kéepe hir. Then one of them, which was the lord of Sussex swearing, said: My lords, let vs take héed, and do no more than our commission will beare vs, what soeuer shall happen hereafter. And further, let vs consider that she was the king our masters daughter, and therefore let vs vse such dealing, dealing, that we may answer vnto it hereafter, if it shall so happen, for iust dealing (quoth he) is alwaies answerable: Whereunto the other lords agreed that it was well said of him, and thereupon departed. Being in the tower, within two daies, commandement was that she should haue masse within hir house. One maister Pong was then hir chapleine: and because there was none of hir men so well learned to helpe the priest to saie masse, the masse staied for that daie.

The nert daie two of hir yeomen, who had gone long to schole before, and were learned, had two abcies prouided and deliuered them, so that vpon the abcies they should helpe the priest. One of the said yeomen, holding the abcie in his hand, pretending ignorance at Kyries eleison, set the priest, making as though he could answer that no further. It would make a pitifull and a strange storie, here by the waie to touch and recite what examinations and rackings of poore men there were, to find out that knife which should cut hir throte: what gaping among my lords of the clergie, to see the daie wherein they might wash their goodlie white rochets in hir innocent bloud, but especiallie the bishop of Winchester Stephan Gardiner, then lord chancellor, ruler of the rost, who then within fiue daies after came vnto hir, with diuerse others of the councell, and examined hir of the talke that was at Ashridge, betwixt hir and sir James Acroft, touching hir remouing from thence to Dunnington castle, requiring hir to declare what she meant thereby.

At the first, she being so suddenlie asked, did not well remember anie such house: but within a while, well aduising hir selfe, she said; In deed (quoth she) I do now remember that I haue such a place, but I neuer laie in it in all my life. And as for anie that hath moued me thereunto, I do not remember: When to inforce the matter, they brought forth sir James Acroft. The bishop of Winchester demanded of hir what she said to that man: She answered, that she had little to saie to him, or to the rest that were then prisoners in the tower. But my lords (quoth she) you do examine euerie meane prisoner of me, wherein me thinks you do me great iniurie. If they haue done euill and offended the quéenes maiestie, let them answer to it accordinglie. I beséech you my lords, ioine not me in this sort with anie of these offendors. And as concerning my going vnto Dunnington castle, I do remember that maister Hobbie and mine officers and you sir James Acroft, had such talke: but what is that to the purpose, my lords, but that I may go to mine owne houses at all times?

The lord of Arundell kneeling downe, said: Your grace saith true, & certeinlie we are verie sorie that we haue so troubled you about so vaine matters. She then said: My lords, you do sith me verie narrowlie, but well I am assured, you shall not do more to me than God hath appointed, and so God forgiue you all. At their departure, sir James Acroft kneeled down, declaring that he was sorie to see the daie in which he should be brought as a witnesse against hir grace. But I assure your grace (said he) I haue bene marueilouslie tossed and examined touching your highnesse, which the lord knoweth is verie strange to me. For I take God to record before all your honors, I do not know anie thing of that crime that you haue laid to my charge, and will therupon take my death, if I should be driuen to so strict a triall.

That daie, or thereabouts, diuerse of hir owne officers, who had made prouision for hir diet, brought the same to the vtter gate of the tower, the common rascall souldiers receiuing it: which was no small greefe vnto the gentlemen the bringers thereof. Wherfore they required to speake with the lord chamberleine, being then constable of the tower. Who comming before his presence, declared vnto his lordship, that they were much afraid to bring hir graces diet, and to deliuer it to such common and desperate persons as they were which did receiue it: beseeching his honor to consider hir grace, and to giue such order, that hir wants might at all times be brought in by them which were appointed thereunto. Masters (said he) who appointed you this office? They answered, hir graces councell. Councell (quoth he) There is none of them which hath to do, either in that case, or anie thing else within this place: and I assure you, for that she is a prisoner, she shall be serued with the lieutenants men, as other the prisoners are. Whereat the gentlemen said, that they trusted for more fauor at his hands, considering his personage, saieng; that they misliked not, but that the queene and hir councell might be better to hir grace than so, and therwith shewed themselues to be offended at the vngratefull words of the lord chamberleine towards their ladie and mistresse.

At this he sware by God, striking himselfe vpon the breast, that if they did either frowne or chyng at him, he would set them where they should neither see sunne nor mone. Thus taking their leaue, they desired God to bring him in a better mind towards hir grace, and so departed from him. Vpon the occasion whereof, hir graces officers made great sute vnto the quéenes councell, that some might be appointed to bring hir diet to hir, & that it might no more be deliuered in to the common souldiers of the tower. Which being reasonablie considered, was by them granted. Whereupon were appointed one of hir gentlemen, hir clearke of hir kitchin, and hir two purueiors to bring in hir prouision once a day; all which was done the warders euer waiting vpon the bringers thereof. The lord chamberleine himselfe being alwaies with them, circumspectlie and narrowlie watched, and searched what they brought: and gaue héed that they should haue no talke with anie of hir graces waiting seruants, and so warded them both in and out. At the said sute of hir officers were sent by the commandement of the councell, to wait vpon hir grace, two yeomen of hir chamber, one of hir robes, two of hir pantrie and ewrie, one of hir buttrie, another of hir cellar, two of hir kitchin, and one of hir larder, all which continued with hir the time of hir trouble.

Here the constable, being at the first not verie well pleased with the comming in of such a compasnie against his will, would haue had his men still to haue serued with hir graces men. Which hir seruants at no hand would suffer, desiring his lordship to be contented: for that order was taken, that no stranger should come within their offices. At which answer being sore displeased, he brake out into these threatning words: Well (said he) I will handle you well inough. Then went he into the kitchin, and there would néeds haue his meat rosted with hir graces meat, & said that his cooke should come thither and dresse it. To that hir graces cooke answered; My lord, I will neuer suffer anie stranger to come about hir diet, but hir owne swornemen, so long as I liue. He said they shuld. But the cooke said, his lordship should pardon him for that matter. Thus did he trouble hir poore seruants verie stoutlie: though afterwards he were otherwise aduised, and they more courteoulie vsed at his hands. And good cause why, for he had good cheare, and fared of the best; and hir grace paied well for it. Wherefore he vsed himselfe afterwards more reuerentlie toward hir grace.

After this sort, hauing lien a whole moneth there in close prison, and being verie euill at ease therwithall, she sent for the lord chamberleine, and the lord Shandois, Shandois, to come and speake with hir. Who comming, she requested them that she might haue libertie to walke in some place, for that she felt hirselfe not well. To the which they answered, that they were right sorie that they could not satisfie hir graces request, for that they had commandement to the contrarie, which they durst not in anie wise breake. Further more, she desired of them, if that could not be granted, that she might walke but into the queenes lodging. No nor yet that (they answered) could by anie meanes be obteined without a further suite to the queens and hir councell. Well (said she) my lords, if the matter be so hard that they must be sued vnto for so small a thing, and that friendship be so strict, God comfort me, I trow to they departed, she remaining in hir old dungeon still, without anie kind of comfort but onelie God.

Ladie Elisabeth denied the libertie of the tower.

The next daie after, the lord Shandois came againe vnto hir grace, declaring vnto hir that he had sued vnto the councell for further libertie. Some of them consented there vnto, diuerse other dissented, for that there were so manie prisoners in the tower. But in conclusion they did all agree, that hir grace might walke into those lodgings, so that he & the lord chamberleine, and three of the queenes gentlewomen did accompanie hir, the windowes being shut, and she not suffered to looke out at anie of them: wherewith she contented hirselfe, and gaue him thanks for his good will in that behalfe. Afterwards there was libertie granted to hir grace to walke in a little garden, the doores and gates being shut vp, which notwithstanding was as much discomfort vnto hir, as the walke in the garden was pleasant and acceptable. At which times of hir walking there, the prisoners on that side strictlie were commanded not to speake or looke out at the windowes into the garden, till hir grace were gone out againe, hauing in consideration thereof, their keepers waiting vpon them for that time. Thus hir grace with this small libertie contented hir selfe in God, to whome be praise therefore.

Libertie granted to ladie Elisabeth to walke in a little garden.

During this time, there vsed a little boie, a mans child in the tower to resort vnto their chambers, and manie times to bring hir grace flowers, which likewise he did to the other prisoners that were there. Whereupon naughtie and suspicious heads thinking to make and wring out some matter thereof, called on a time the child vnto them, promising him figs and apples, and asked of him when he had beene with the earle of Deuonshire, not ignorant of the childs wonted frequenting vnto him. The boy answered that he would go by and by thither. Further they demanded of him, when he was with the ladie Elisabeths grace? He answered: Euerie daie. Furthermore they examined him, what the lord of Deuonshire sent by him to hir grace? The child said: I will go know what he will giue to carie to hir. Such was the discretion of the child, being yet but foure years of age. This same is a craftie boy, quoth the lord chamberleine, how saie you my lord Shandois? I praie you my lord (quoth the boy) giue me the figs you promised me. No marie (quoth he) thou shalt be whipped if thou come anie more to the ladie Elisabeth, or the lord Courtneie. The boy answered: I will bring my ladie and mistresse more flowers. Whereupon the childs father was commanded to permit the boy no more to come vp into their chambers.

Suspicious heads.

A young child examined for bringing flowers to the ladie Elisabeth.

The next daie, as hir grace was walking in the garden, the child peeping in at a hole in the doore, cried vnto hir, saieng: Mistresse, I can bring you no more flowers. Whereat she smiled, but said nothing, vnderstanding thereby what they had done. Wherefore afterwards the chamberleine rebuked highlie his father, commanding him to put him out of the house.

Alas poore infant, quoth the father. It is a craftie knaue (quoth the lord chamberleine) let me see him heere no more. The gift of whaie the constable was discharged of his office of the tower, & one sir Henrie Benefield placed in his roome, a man vnknowne to hir grace, and therefore the more feared: which so sudden mutation was vnto hir no little amaze. She brought with hir an hundred soldiors in blew coted, wherewith she was maruellouslie discomforted, and demanded of such as were about hir, whether the ladie Jane & she were taken awaie or no, fearing by reason of their comming, least she should haue plaied hir part. To whome answer was made, that the scaffolds was taken awaie, and that hir grace needed not to doubt of anie such tyrannie: for God would not suffer anie such treason against hir person. Wherewith being contented, but not altogither satisfied, she asked what sir Henrie Benefield was, and whether he was of that conscience or no, that if hir murthering were secretlie committed to his charge, he would see the execution thereof? She was answered, that they were ignorant what maner of man he was. Howbeit they perswaded hir that God would not suffer such wicked deuise to proceed: Well, quoth she, God grant it be so. For thou O God canst mollifie all such tyrannous hearts, and disappoint all such cruell purposes: and I beseech thee to beare me thy creature, which am thy seruant, and at thy commandement, trusting by thy grace euer so to remaine.

About which time it was spread abroad, that hir grace should be carried from thense by this new souldiour captein and his souldiors: but whither, it could not be learned. Which was vnto hir a great griefe, especiallie for that such a companie was appointed to hir gard; requesting rather to continue there still, than to be led thense with such a sort of rascals. At last plaine answer was made by the lord Shandois, that there was no remedie, but from thense she must needs depart to the manour of Woodstocke, as he thought. Being demanded of hir for what cause? For that (quoth he) the tower is like further to be furnished. She being desirous to know what he meant thereby, demanded wherewith? He answered, with such matter as the queene and councell were determined in that behalfe, whereof he had no knowledge: and so departed. In conclusion, on Trinitie sundaie being the nineteenth daie of Maie, she was remoued from the tower, the lord treasurer being then there for the lading of hir carts, and discharging the place of the same. Where sir Henrie Benefield (being appointed hir gailor) did receiue hir with a companie of rakehels to gard hir, beside the lord of Marbies band, waiting in the countrie about for the moonelight in the water. Vnto whome at length came my lord of Tame, ioined in commission with the said sir Henrie, for the safe guiding of hir to prison: and they together conueied hir grace to Woodstocke, as hereafter followeth. The first daie they conducted hir to Richmond, where she continued all night, being restreined of hir owne men, which were lodged in outchambers, and sir Henrie Benefields souldiors appointed in their roomes to giue attendance on hir person. Whereat she being maruellouslie dismaied, thinking verelie some secret mischiefe to be a working towards hir, called hir gentleman vsher, and desired him, with the rest of his companie, to praie for hir. For this night (quoth she) I thinke to die. Wherewith he being stricken to the heart, said: God forbid that anie such wickednesse should be pretended against your grace. So comforting hir as well as he could, at last he burst out into teares, & went from hir downe into the court, where were walking the lord of Tame and sir Henrie rie Benefield.

When he comming to the lord of Tame (who had proffered to him much friendship) desired to speake with him a word or two. Unto whome he familiarlie said, he should with all his heart. Which when sir Henrie standing by heard, he asked what the matter was? To whome the gentleman wher answered: No great matter sir (said he) but to speake with my lord a word or two. Then when the lord of Tame came to him, he spake on this wise: My lord (quoth he) you haue beene alwaies my good lord, and so I beseech you to remaine. The cause why I come to you at this time, is to desire your honor, vnfeinedlie to declare vnto me whether anie danger is meant towards my mistresse this night, or no, that I and my poore fellowes may take such part as shall please God to appoint: for certeinlie we will rather die, than she should secretlie and innocentlie miscarie. Marie (said the lord of Tame) God forbid that anie such wicked purpose should be wrought: and rather than it should be so, I with my men are readie to die at hir foot also: and (so praised be God) they passed that dolfull night, with no little heauinesse of heart. Afterwards passing ouer the water at Richmond, going towards Windsore, hir grace espied certeine of hir poore seruants standing on the other side, which were verie desirous to see hir. Whome when she beheld, turning to one of hir men standing by, she said: Yonder I see certeine of my men, go to them and say these words from me: Tanquam ouis.

Tanquam ouis, i. Like a sheepe vnto slaughter.

So the passing forward to Windsore, was lodged there that night in the deane of Windsors house, a place more meet in deed for a priest than for a princesse. And from thense hir grace was garded and brought the next night to maister Dormers house, where much people standing by the way, some presented to hir one gift, and some another: so that sir Henrie was greatlie moued therewith, and troubled the poore people verie sore, for shewing their loning hearts in such a maner, calling them rebels and traitors, with such like vile words. Besides, as she passed thorough the villages, the townesmen rang the bels, as being ioyfull of hir comming, thinking verelie it had beene otherwise than it was indeed, as the sequele proued after to the said poore men. For immediatlie the said sir Henrie hearing the same, sent his souldiors thither, who apprehended some of the ringers, setting them in the stocks, and otherwise vncourteouslie misusing other some for their good wils.

On the morrow hir grace passing from maister Dormers (where was for the time of hir abode there a strict watch kept) came to the lord of Tames house where she late all night, being verie princelie interteined, both of knights and ladies, gentlemen and gentlewomen. Wherat sir Henrie Benefield grunted, and was highlie offended, saieng vnto them, that they could not tell what they did, and were not able to answer to their doings in that behalfe; letting them to vnderstand that she was the queens maiesties prisoner, and no otherwise: aduising them therfore to take heed & beware of afterclaps. Whereunto the lord of Tame answered in this wise: that he was well aduised of his doings, being ioined in commission as well as he, adding with warrant, that hir grace might and should in his house be merrie. The next daie as she should take hir iournie from Richmond towards Woodstocke, the lord of Tame, with an other gentleman being at tables, plaieng, and dropping vie crownes, the ladie Elizabeth passing by, staied & said she would see the game plaied out, which sir Henrie Benefield would scarse permit. The game running long about, and they plaieng drop vie crownes; Come on saith he: I will tarie saith she, and will see this game out.

After this, sir Henrie went vp into a chamber, where was appointed for hir grace a chaire, two cushions, and a fot carpet verie faire and princelike, wherein presumptuoulie he sat, and called one Barwike his man to pull off his boots. Which as sone as it was knowen among the ladies and gentles, euerie one mused thereat, & laughed him to scorne, obseruing his vndiscreet maners in that behalfe, as they might verie well. When supper was done, he called my lord, and willed him that all the gentlemen and ladies should withdraw themselues euerie one to his lodging, marualling much that he would permit there such a companie, considering so great a charge committed to him. Sir Henrie (quoth my lord) content your selfe, all shall be voided, your men and all. Nay my souldiors, (quoth sir Henrie) shall watch all night. The lord of Tame answered, It shall not need. Well said he, Need or need not, they shall so do: mistrusting belike the companie, which God knoweth was without cause.

The next daie hir grace tooke hir iournie from thense to Woodstocke, where she was inclosed, as before in the tower of London, the souldiors garding and warding both within & without the wals, euerie daie to the number of three score, and in the night without the wals fortie, during the time of hir imprisonment there. At length she had gardens appointed for hir walke, which was verie comfortable to hir grace. But alwaies when she did recreat hir selfe therein, the doores were fast locked vp, in as strict maner as they were in the tower, being at the least fiue or six locks betweene hir lodging and hir walks: sir Henrie himselfe keeping the keies, and trusting no man therewith. Whereupon she called him hir gailor: and he kneeling downe, desired hir grace not to call him so, for he was appointed there to be one of hir officers. From such officers (quoth she) good Lord deliuer me. And now by the way as digressing, or rather refreshing the reader, if it be lawfull in so serious a storie to recite a matter incident, & yet not impertinent to the same: occasion heere moueth, or rather inforceth me to touch briefelie what happened in the same place and time by a certeine merie conceited man, being then about hir grace: who noting the strict & strange keeping of his ladie & mistres by the said sir Henrie Benefield, with so manie locks & doores, with such watch and ward about hir, as was strange and wonderfull, spied a goat in the ward where hir grace was. And whether to refresh hir oppressed mind, or to notifie hir strict handling by sir Henrie, either else both; he tooke it vp on his necke, and followed hir grace therewith as she was going into hir lodging. Which when she saw, she asked him what he would do with it, willing to let it alone. Unto whome the said partie answered: No by saint Marie (if it like your grace) will I not: for I can not tell whether he be one of the queens friends or no. I will carie him to sir Henrie Benefield (God willing) to know what he is. So leauing hir grace, he went with the goat on his necke, and caried it to sir Henrie Benefield. Who when he saw him comming with it, asked him halfe angerlie what he had there. Unto whome the partie answered, saieng: Sir (quoth he) I can not tell what he is, I pray you examine him, for I found him in the place where my ladies grace was walking, and what talke they had I can not tell. For I vnderstand him not, but he should seeme to me to be some stranger, & I thinke verelie a Welshman, for he hath a white freese coat on his backe. And forsomuch as I being the queens subiect, and perceiuing the strict charge committed to you of hir keeping, that no stranger should haue accesse to hir without sufficient licence, I haue here found a stranger (what he is I can not tell) in place where hir grace was walking: and therefore for the necessarie discharge of my dutie, I thought it good to bring the said stranger to you, to examine as you see cause: and so he set him downe. At which his words sir Henrie seemed much displeased, and said: Well, well, you will neuer leaue this geare I see: and so they departed.

Now to returne to the matter from whence we haue digressed. After hir grace had bene there a time she made suit to the councell that she might be suffered to write to the queene, which at last was permitted. So that sir Henrie Benefield brought hir pen, inke, and paper; and standing by hir while she wrote (which he strictlie obserued) alwaies she being wearie, he would carie awaie hir letters, and bring them againe when she called for them. In the finishing thereof, he would haue béene messenger to the queene of the same. Whose request hir grace denied, saieng one of hir owne men should carie them, and that she would neither trust him nor none of his therein. Then he answering againe said; None of them durst be so bold (he trowed) to carie hir letters, being in that case. Yes (quoth she) I am assured I haue none so dishonest that would denie my request in that behalfe, but will be as willing to serue me now as before. Well (said he) my commission is to the contrarie, and I maie not so suffer it. Hir grace replieng againe said; You charge me verie often with your commission, I praie God you maie iustlie answer the cruell dealing you vse towards me.

Then he kneeling downe, desired hir grace to thinke and consider how he was a seruant, and put in trust there by the queene to serue hir maiestie, protesting that if the case were hirs, he would as willinglie serue hir grace, as now he did the queenes highnesse. For the which his answer hir grace thanked him, desiring God that she might neuer haue need of such seruants as he was; declaring further to him, that his dooings towards hir were not good nor answerable, but more than all the friends he had would stand by. To whom sir Henrie replied & said, that there was no remedie but his dooings must be answered, and so they should, trusting to make good account thereof. The cause which moued hir grace so to saie, was for that he would not permit hir letters to be caried foure or fiue daies after the writing thereof. But in fine he was content to send for hir gentleman from the towne of Woodstocke, demanding of him whether he durst enterprise the carriage of hir graces letters to the queene or no. And he answered; Yea sir, that I dare, and will with all my hart. Wherevpon sir Henrie halfe against his stomach toke them vnto him. Then about the eight of June came downe doctor Owen & doctor Wendie, sent by the queene to hir grace, for that she was sicklie; who ministring to hir, and letting hir bloud, carried there and attended on hir grace fiue or six daies. Then she being well amended, they returned againe to the court, making their good report to the queene and the councell of hir graces behauior and humblenesse towards the queenes highnesse. Which hir maiestie hearing, toke verie thankfullie: but the bishops thereat repined, looked blacke in the mouth, and told the queene, they maruelled that she submitted not hir selfe to hir maiesties mercie, considering that she had offended hir highnesse.

About this time hir grace was requested by a secret friend, to submit hir selfe to the queenes maiestie, which would be verie well taken, and to hir great quiet and commoditie. Unto whome she answered, that she would neuer submit hir selfe to them whome she neuer offended. For (quoth shée) if I haue offended and am guiltie, I then craue no mercie, but the law, which I am certeine (quoth she) I should haue had per this, if it could be proued by me. For I know my selfe (I thanke God) to be out of the danger thereof, wishing that I were as cleare out of the perill of mine enimies, & then I am assured I should not so be locked and bolted vp within walls and doores as I am. God giue them a better mind when it pleaseth him. About this time was there a great consulting among the bishops and gentlemen touching a marriage for hir grace, which some of the Spaniards wished to be with some stranger, that she might go out of the realme with hir portion; some saieng one thing, and some another.

Ladie Elizabeth requested to submit hir selfe to the queene.

Counsell of the papists to marrie the ladie Elizabeth to a Spaniard.

A lord (who shall be here nameless) being there at last said, that the king should neuer haue ante quiet common wealth in England, vnlesse hir head were stricken from the shoulders. Wherevnto the Spaniards answered saieng; God forbid that the king and maister should haue that mind to consent to such a mischéefe. This was the courteous answer of the Spaniards to the Englishmen, speaking after that sort against their owne countrie. From that daie the Spaniards neuer left off their good persuasions to the king, that the like honor he should neuer obteine, as he should in deliuering the ladie Elizabeths grace out of prison; whereby at length she was happilie released from the same. Here is a plaine and euident example of the good clemencie and nature of the king and his councellors towards hir grace (praised be God therefore) who moued their harts therein. Then herevpon she was sent for shortlie after to come to Hampton court.

But before hir remouing awaie from Woodstocke, we will a little staie to declare in what dangers hir life was during this time she there remained. First thorough fire, which began to kindle betweene the boords & séeling vnder the chamber where she laie, whether by a sparke of fire, gotten into a cranie, or whether of purpose by some that meant hir no good, the Lord doth know. Neuertheless a worshipfull knight of Oxfordshire, which was there ioined the same time with sir Henrie Benefield in kéeping that ladie (who then toke vp the boords and quenched the fire) verelie supposed it to be done of purpose. Furthermore it is thought, and also affirmed (if it be true) of one Paule Penie a kéeper of Woodstocke, a notorious ruffian and a butcherlie wretch, that he was appointed to kill the said ladie Elizabeth, who both saw the man being often in hir sight, and also knew thereof.

Ladie Elizabeth in danger of fire.

Another time one of the priuie chamber, a great man about the queene, and chiefe darling of Stephan Gardiner, named maister James Wallet came to Blandenbrige a mile from Woodstocke, with twentie or thirtie priuie cotes, and sent for sir Henrie Benefield to come and speake with him. But as God would, which disposed all things after the purpose of his owne will; so it happened, that a little before the said sir Henrie Benefield was sent for by post to the councell, leauing strict word behind him with his brother, that no man what soeuer he were, though comming with a bill of the queenes hand, or anie other warrant, should haue accesse to hir before his returne againe. By reason whereof it so fell out, that maister Benefields brother comming to him at the bridge, would suffer him in no case approch in, who otherwise (as is supposed) was appointed violentlie to murther the innocent ladie. In the life of Stephan Gardiner we declared before, pag. 1787, how that the ladie Elizabeth, being in the tower, a writ came downe subscribed with certeine hands of the councell for hir execution. Which if it were certeine (as it is reported) Winchester (no dout) was deuiser of that mischéeuous drift. And doubtlesse the same

Another conspiracie of murther against ladie Elizabeth.

Ladie Elizabeth preserued by the lords prouidence from execution in the tower.

Achitophell had brought his impious purpose that day to passe, had not the fatherlie prouidence of almightie God (who is euer stronger than the diuell) stirred vp maister Bridges lieutenant at that time of the tower, to come in hast to the quéene, to giue certificat therof, & to know further hir consent touching hir sisters death. Wherupon it folowed, that all that deuise was disappointed, & Winchesters diuelish platforme which he said he had cast, thorough the Lords great goodnes came to no effect. Where moreouer is to be noted, that during the prisonment of this ladie and princesse, one maister Edmund Tremaine was on the racke, and maister Smithwike, and diuerse other in the tower were examined, and diuerse offers made to them to accuse the giltlesse ladie, being in hir captiuitie. Howbeit all that notwithstanding, no matter could be proued by all examinations, as the the same time lieng at Woodstocke had certeine intelligence, by the meanes of one John Gaier, who vnder a colorable pretense of a letter vnto mistresse Cleue from hir father, was let in, and so gaue them secretlie to vnderstand of all this matter. Wherevpon the ladie Elizabeth at hir departing out from Woodstocke, wrote these verses with hir diamond in a glasse window verie legiblie as here followeth:

Winchesters platforme marueilous: whereof read before pa. 1787

Much suspected by me,
Nothing proued can be:
Quoth Elizabeth prisoner.

Verses written by ladie Elisabeth in the glasse window.

And thus much touching the troubles of ladie Elisabeth at Woodstocke. Wherevnto this is more to be added, that during the same time, the lord of Tame had labored to the quéene, and became suretie for hir, to haue hir from Woodstocke to his house, and had obteined grant thereof. Wherevpon preparation was made accordinglie, and all things readie in expectation of hir comming. But through the procurement either of maister Benefield, or by the owing of Winchester hir mortall enimie, letters came ouer night to the contrarie: whereby hir iornie was stopped. Thus this worthie ladie oppressed with continuall sorrow, could not be permitted to haue recourse to anie friends she had; but still in the hands of hir enimies was left desolate, and vtterlie destitute of all that might refresh a dolfull hart, fraught full of terror and thraldome. Wherevpon no maruell, if she hearing vpon a time out of hir garden at Woodstocke, a certeine milkmaid singing pleasantlie, wished hir selfe to be a milkemaid as she was, saieng that hir case was better, and life more merier than was hirs in that state as she was.

Now after these things thus declared, to proceed further where we left before, sir Henrie Benefield and his soldiors, with the lord of Tame, and sir Rafe Chamberleine, garding and waiting vpon hir, the first night from Woodstocke she came to Ricot. In which iourneie such a mightie wind did blow, that hir seruants were faine to hold down hir clothes about hir: in so much that hir hood was twise or thrise blowen from hir head. Wherevpon she desirous to returne to a certeine gentlemans house there neere, could not be suffered by sir Henrie Benefield so to do: but was constreined vnder an hedge to trim hir head as well as she could. After this, the next night they iourneied to maister Dormers, & so to Colbrooke, where she laie all that night at the George: and by the waie comming to Colbrooke, certeine of hir graces gentlemen and yeomen met hir to the number of three score, much to all their comforts, which had not séene hir grace of long season before: notwithstanding they were commanded in the quéenes name immediatlie to depart the towne, to both their and hir graces no little heauinesse, who could not be suffered once to speake with them. So that night all hir men were taken from hir saue hir gentleman vsher, three gentlewomen, two groomes, and one of hir wardrobe, the soldiors watching and warding about the house, and she close shut vp within hir prison.

Ladie Elizabeth remoued from woodstocke to Hampton court.

The next date following, hir grace entred Hampton court on the backeside, into the princes lodging, the doores being shut to hir: and she garded with soldiors, as before, laie there a fortnight at the least, yer euer anie had recourse vnto hir. At length came the lord William Howard, who marueilous honourablie vsed hir grace. Wherat she toke much comfort, & requested him to be a meane that she might speake with some of the councell. To whome (not long after) came the bishop of Winchester, the lord of Arundell, the lord of Shrewesburie, and secretarie Peter, who with great humilitie humbled themselues vnto hir grace. She againe likewise saluting them, said: My lords (quoth she) I am glad to see you: for me thinke I haue béene kept a great while from you desolatelie alone. Wherefore I would desire you to be a meane to the king and quéenes maiesties, that I male be deliuered from prison, wherein I haue béene kept a long space, as to you my lords it is not vnknowne.

Lord William Howard gentle and fauourable to ladie Elisabeth.

When she had spoken, Stephan Gardiner the bishop of Winchester kneeled downe, and requested that she would submit hir selfe to the quéenes grace, and in so doing he had no doubt but that hir maiestie would be good vnto hir. She making answer that rather than she would so do, she would lie in prison all the daies of hir life, adding that she craued no mercie at hir maiesties hand, but rather desired the law, if euer she did offend hir maiestie in thought, word, or déed. And besides this, in yeelding (quoth she) I should speake against my selfe, and confesse my selfe to be an offendor, which neuer was towards hir maiestie: by occasion whereof the king and the quéene might euer hereafter conceiue of me an ill opinion: and therefore I saie my lords, it were better for me to lie in prison for the truth, than to be abroad and suspected of my prince. And so they departed, promising to declare hir message to the quéene.

On the next date the bishop of Winchester came againe vnto hir grace, and kneeling downe, declared that the quéene marueiled that she would so stoutlie vse hir selfe, not confessing to haue offended: so that it should séeme the quéenes maiestie wrongfullie to haue imprisoned hir grace. Nate (quoth the ladie Elisabeth) it pleaseth hir to punish me as she thinketh good. Well quoth Gardiner, hir maiestie willeth me to tell you, that you must tell an other tale yet that you be set libertie. Hir grace answered, that she had as lefe be in prison with honestie and truth, as to be abroad suspected of hir maiestie: and this that I haue said, I will (said she) stand vnto, for I will neuer bélie my selfe. Winchester againe kneeled down and said: Then your grace hath the vantage of me and other the lords for your long and wrong imprisonment. What vantage I haue (quoth she) you know, taking God to record I séeke no vantage at your hands for your so dealing with me, but God forgiue you and me also. With that the rest kneeled, desiring hir grace that all might be forgotten, and so departed, she being fast locked vp againe. A seuen nights after, the quéene sent for hir grace at ten of the clocke in the night to speake with hir: for she had not séene hir in two yeares before. Yet for all that she was amazed at the sudden sending for, thinking it had béene worse than afterwards it proued, and desired hir gentlemen and gentlewomen to praie for hir, for that she could not tell whether euer she should see them againe or no.

quænes lodging, hir graces gentlewomen waiting vpon hir, hir gentleman vsher and hir gromes going before with torches, where hir gentlemen and gentlewomen being commanded to staie all sauing one woman, mistresse Clarencius conducted hir to the quænes bedchamber where hir maiestie was. At the sight of whome hir grace knéeled downe, and desired God to preserue hir maiestie, not mistrusting but that she should trie hir selfe as true a subiect towards hir maiestie, as euer did ante, and desired hir maiestie euen so to iudge of hir: and said that she should not find hir to the contrarie, whatsoeuer report otherwise had gone of hir. To whome the quæne answered: You will not confesse your offense, but stand stoutlie to your truth: I praie God it maie so fall out. If it doth not, quoth the ladie Elisabeth, I request neither fauour nor pardon at your maiesties hands. Well said the quæne, you stirlie still perseuere in your truth. Belike you will not confesse but that you haue béene wrongfullie punished. I muſt not saie so (if it please your maiestie) to you.

Talke betweene the quæne and ladie Elisabeth.

Why then (said the quæne) belike you will to others. No, if it please your maiestie (quoth she) I haue borne the burthen, and must beare it; I humblie beséech your maiestie to haue a good opinion of me, and to thinke me to be your true subiect, not onelie from the beginning hitherto, but for euer, as long as life lasteth: and so they departed with verie few comfortable words of the quæne, in English: but what she said in Spanish, God knoweth. It is thought that king Philip was there behind a cloth, and not séene, and that he shewed himselfe a verie friend in that matter, &c. Thus hir grace departing, went vnto hir lodging againe, and the seauenth night after was released of sir Henrie Benefield hir gailor (as she tearmed him) and his soldiors, and so hir grace being set at libertie from imprisonment, went into the countrie, and had appointed to go with hir sir Thomas pope, one of quéene Maries councellors, and one of hir gentlemen vshers, maister Gage, and thus strictlie was she loked vnto all quéene Maries time. But God be praised, shortlie after was fetched awaie Gardiner thorough the mercifull prouidence of the Lords goodnesse, by occasion of whose opportune deceasse (as is partlie touched in this storie before, pag. 1705) the life of this excellent princesse, the wealth of all England, was preserued. For this is credible to be supposed, that the said wicked Gardiner of Winchester had long laboured his wits, and to this onelie mark bent all his deuises, to bring this our happie and deere souereigne out of the waie, as both by his words and doings before notified maie sufficientlie appeare.

Note the wonderfull working of the Lords prouidence in sauing of ladie Elisabeth.

Ladie Elisabeth deliuered by the death of Stephan Gardiner.

But such was the gratious and fauourable prouidence of the Lord, to the preseruation not onlie of hir roiall maiestie, but also the miserable and wofull state of this whole Iland, and poore subiects of the same, whereby the proud platforms and péeuish practises of this wretched Achitophell preuailed not: but contrariwise, both he, and all the snares and traps of his pernicious counsell laid against an other, were turned to a net to catch himselfe, according to the prouerbe: Malum consilium consultori pessimum. After the death of this Gardiner, followed the death also and dropping awaie of other hir enimies, whereby by little and little hir ieopardie decreased, feare diminished, hope of comfort began to appeare as out of a darke cloud. And albeit as yet hir grace had no full assurance of perfect safetie, yet more gentle interteinment dailie did grow vnto hir, till at length to the moneth of November, and seauentéenth daie of the same, three yeares after the death of Stephan Gardiner, followed the death of quéene Marie, as heretofore at large hath béene trulie declared. Although this historie following be not directlie appertaining to the former matter, yet the same maie here not vnaptlie be inserted, for that it doth discouer and shew forth the malicious hearts of the papists towards this vertuous quéene our souereigne ladie in the time of quéene Marie hir sister, which is reported as a truth credible told by sundrie honest persons, of whome some are yet aliue, and do testifie the same. The matter whereof is this.

A note of a storie declaring the malignant hearts of the papists towards ladie Elisabeth.

Soone after the stirre of Wiat and the troubles that happened to this quæne for that cause: it fortuned one Robert Farrer a haberdasher of London, dwelling neere vnto Newgate market, in a certeine morning to be at the Rose tauerne (from whence he was seldome absent) and falling to his common drinke, as he was euer accustomed, and hauing in his companie three other companions like vnto himselfe, it chanced the same time one Laurence Shirtffe grocer, dwelling also not farre from thence, to come into the said tauerne, and finding there the said Farrer (to whome of long time he had borne good will) sat downe in the seat to drinke with him, and Farrer hauing in his full cups, and not hauing consideration who were present began to talke at large, and namelie against the ladie Elisabeth, and said: That gill hath béene one of the chiefe doers of this rebellion of Wiat, and before all be done, she and all the heretikes hir partakers shall well vnderstand of it. Some of them hope that she shall haue the crowne, but the and they (I trust) that so hope, shall hop headlesse, or be fried with fagots before she come to it.

Robert Farrer of London a sore enimie to ladie Elisabeth.

Laurence Shirtffe, sworne friend and seruant to ladie Elisabeth his mistresse.

Robert Farrer raileth against ladie Elisabeth.

The aforesaid Laurence Shirtffe grocer, being then seruant vnto the said ladie Elisabeth, & sworne vnto hir grace, could no longer forbeare his old acquaintance and neighbor Farrer in speaking so vnreuerentlie of his mistresse, but said to him: Farrer, I haue loued thée as a neighbour, and haue had a good opinion of thée, but hearing of thée that I now heare, I defie thée: and I tell thée I am hir graces sworne seruant, and she is a princesse, and the daughter of a noble king, and it euill becommeth thée to call hir a gill, and for thy so saieng, I saie thou art a knaue, & I will complaine vpon thée. Do thy worst said Farrer, for that I said, I will saie againe: and so Shirtffe came from his companie. Shortlie after, the said Shirtffe taking an honest neighbour with him, went before the commissioners to complaine: the which commissioners sat then at Boner the bishop of Londons house beside Pauls, and there were present Boner then being the chiefe commissioner, the lord Mordant, sir John Baker, doctor Werbithire chancellor to the bishop, doctor *Storie, doctor Harpsfield, and others. The aforesaid Shirtffe comming before them, declared the maner of the said Robert Farrers talke against the ladie Elisabeth. Boner answered, Peraduenture you take him worse than he meant. Yea my lord (said doctor Storie) if you knew the man as I do, you would saie that there is not a better catholike, nor an honester man in the citie of London.

The part of a good trustie seruant.

Robert Farrer complained of to the commissioners, but no redresse was had.

*I knaue.

Well, said Shirtffe, my lord, she is my gratious ladie and mistresse, and it is not to be suffered that such a varlet as he is, should call so honorable a princesse by the name of a gill: and I saw yesterdate in the court that my lord cardinall Pole méeting hir in the

the chamber of presence, kneeled downe on his knees and kissed his hand: and I saw also that king Philip meeting hir, made hir such obeisance that his knee touched the ground: and then (me thinketh) it were too much to suffer such a varlet as this is, to call hir gill, and to wish them to hop headlesse that shall wish hir grace to inioie the possession of the crowne when God shall send it vnto hir as in the right of hir inheritance. Yea! Staie there (quoth Boner.) When God sendeth it vnto hir, let hir inioie it. But trulie (said he) the man that spake the words that you haue reported, meant nothing against the ladie Elisabeth your mistresse, and no more do we: but he like an honest and zealous man feared the alteration of religion, which euerie good man ought to feare: and therfore (said Boner) good man go your waies home and report well of vs towards your mistresse, and we will send for Farrer and rebuke him for his rash and vndiscréet words, and we trust he will not do the like againe. And thus Shirtffe came awaie, and Farrer had a flap with a fox taile. Now that ye maie be fullie informed of the aforesaid Farrer, whome doctor Storie praised for so good a man, ye shall vnderstand that the same Farrer, hauing two daughters, being handsome maidens, the elder of them for a summe of monie he himselfe deliuered vnto sir Richard Cholmleie to be at his commandement; the other he sold to a knight called sir William Gwddolphin to be at his commandement: whome he made his lackie and so carried hir with him, being apparelled in mans apparell to Bullongne, and the said Farrer followed the campe. He also was a great and a horrible blasphemer of God, and a common accuser of honest and quiet men, also a common drunkard. And now I referre the life of these catholiks to your iudgement, to thinke of them as you please.

But of this matter enough and too much. Now let vs returne where we left before, which was at the death of quéene Marie. After whose decease succéeded hir foresaid sister ladie Elisabeth into the right of the crowne of England: who after so long restreinement, so great dangers escaped, such blusterous stormes ouerblowne, so manie iniuries digested and wrongs sustained by the mightie protection of our mercifull God, to our no small comfort and commoditie, hath béene exalted and erected out of thrall to libertie, out of danger to peace and quietnesse, from dread to dignitie, from miserie to maiestie, from mourning to ruling; briefflie, of a prisoner made a princesse, and placed in hir throne royall, proclamed now quéene, with as manie glad hearts of hir subiects, as euer was anie king or quéene in this realme before hir, or euer shall be (I dare saie) hereafter. Touching whose flourishing state, hir princelie reigne and peaceable gouernement, with other things diuerse and sundrie incident to the same, and especiallie touching the great stirres and alterations which haue happened in other forren nations, and also partlie among our selues here at home, forsomuch as the tractation hereof requireth an huge volume by it selfe, I shall therefore deferre the reader to the next booke or section insuing: wherein (if the Lord so please to sustéine me with leaue and life) I maie haue to discourse of all and singular such matters done and atchiued in these our latter daies and memorie, more at large.

Now then after these so great afflictions falling vpon this realme, from the first beginning of quéene Maries reigne, wherein so manie men, women, and children were burned, manie imprisoned and in prisons starued, diuerse exiled, some spoiled of goods and possessions, a great number driuen from house to house, so manie weeping eies, so manie sobbing harts, so manie children made fatherlesse, so manie fathers bereft of their wiues and children, so manie vexed in conscience, and diuerse against conscience constrained to recant; and in conclusion, neuer a good man almost in all the realme but suffered something during all the time of this bloudie persecution: after all this (I saie) now we are come at length (the Lord be praised) to the seuentéenth of Nouember, which daie as it brought to the persecuted members of Christ, rest from their carefull mourning, so it easeth me somewhat likewise of my laborsous writing, by the death I meane of quéene Marie, who being long sicke before vpon the said seuentéenth daie of Nouember, in the yeare aboue said, about three or foure of the clocke in the morning, yéelded hir life to nature, and hir kingdome to quéene Elisabeth hir sister.

Quéene Elisabeth beginneth hir reigne.

As touching the maner of whose death, some saie that she died of a timpanie, some by hir much sighing before hir death supposed she died of thought and sorrow. Whereupon hir councell séeing hir sighing, and desirous to know the cause, to the end they might minister the more readie consolation vnto hir, feared (as they said) that she toke some thought for the kings maiestie hir husband, which was gone from hir. To whome she answering againe; In deed (said she) that may be one cause, but that is not the greatest wound that pearseth mine oppressed mind: but what that was she would not expresse to them. Albeit afterward she opened the matter more plainlie to mistresse Rise and mistresse Clarentius (if it be true that they told me, which heard it of mistresse Rise himselfe) who then being most familiar with hir, and most bold about hir, told hir that they feared she toke thought for king Philips departing from hir. Not that onelie (said she) but when I am dead and opened, you shall find Calis lieng in my hart, &c. Which one supposing to be true, hath left this report:

The maner of quéene Maries death.

Q. Marie toke thought for the losse of Calis.

And here an end of quéene Marie, and of hir persecution, during the time of hir misgouernment. Of which quéene this truth may be affirmed and left in storie for a perpetuall memoriall or epitaph for all kings and quénes that shall succéed hir to be noted, that before hir neuer was read in storie of anie king or quéene of England since the time of king Lucius, vnder whom in time of peace, by hanging, heading, burning, and prisoning: so much christian bloud, so manie Englishmens liues were spilled within this realme, as vnder the said quéene Marie for the space of foure yeares was to be séene, and I beseech the Lord neuer may be séene hereafter.

More English bloud spilled in quéene Maries time, than euer was in anie kings reigne before hir.

Now, for so much as quéene Marie, during all the time of hir reigne, was such a vehement aduersarie and persecutor against the sincere professors of Christ Jesus and his gospell: for the which there be manie which do highlie magnifie and approue hir doings therein, reputing hir religion to be sound and catholike, and hir procéedings to be most acceptable and blessed of almightie God: to the intent therfore that all men may vnderstand, how the blessing of the Lord God did not onelie not procéed with hir procéedings; but contrarie, rather how his manifest displeasure euer wrought against hir, in plaging both hir and hir realme, and in subuerting all hir counsels and attempts, what soeuer she toke in hand: we will bestow a litle time therein, to perpend and surueie the whole course of hir doings and cheuances: and consider what successe she had in the same. Which being well considered, we shall find neuer no reigne of anie prince in this land, or anie other, which had euer to shew in it (for the proportion of time) so manie arguments of Gods great wrath and displeasure, as was to be séene in the reigne of this quéene Marie,

The reigne of quéene Marie how vnprosperous it was both to hir & hir realme in all respects.

How bishop Boner and Doctor Storie deale with him that railed against ladie Elisabeth.

Note the vnspotted life of these catholiks.

Ladie Elisabeth proclamed quéene the same daie that quéene Marie died.

The Lord make England thankefull to him for his great benefits.

He meaneth his owne bookes; not this volume or anie part thereof.

Queene Marie neuer had good successe in anie thing she went about.

whether we behold the shortnesse of hir time, or the vnfortunate euent of all hir purposes? Who seemed neuer to purpose anie thing that came luckilie to passe, neither did anie thing frame to hir purpose, what soeuer she tooke in hand touching hir owne priuat affaires.

A good king alwaies maketh a flourishing realme.

Of good kings we read in the scripture, in shewing mercie and pitie, in seeking Gods will in his word, and subuerting the monuments of idolatrie, how God blessed their waies, increased their honors, and mightilie prospered all their procedings: as we se in king Dauid, Salomon, Iosias, Iosaphat, Ezechias, with such others. Manasses made the streets of Hierusalem to swim with the bloud of his subiects, but what came of it the text doth testifie. Of Comparison betweene the reigne of Q. Marie and queene Elisabeth.

quéne Elisabeth, which now reigneth among vs, this we must néeds saie, which we se, that she in sparing the bloud, not onelie of Gods seruants, but also of Gods enimies, hath doubled now the reigne of quéne Marie hir sister, with such aboundance of peace and prosperitie, that it is hard to saie, whether the realme of England felt more of Gods wrath in quéne Maries time, or of Gods fauour and mercie in these so blessed and peaceable daies of quéne Elisabeth.

Gamaliels reason. Acts. 5.

Gamaliell speaking his mind in the councell of the Pharisels concerning Christes religion, gaue this reason, that if it were of God, it should continue, who soeuer said naie: if it were not, it could not stand. So may it be said of quéne Marie and hir Romish religion, that if it were so perfect and catholike as they pretend, and the contrarie faith of the gospellers were so detestable and hereticall as they make it, how commeth it then, that this so catholike a quéne, such a necessarie piller of his spouse the church continued no longer, till she had vtterlie rooted out of the land this hereticall generation? Yea how chanced it rather, that almightie God, to spare these poore heretikes, rooted out quéne Marie so soone from hir throne, after she had reigned but onelie fiue yeares and fiue moneths?

Quéne Marie prospered so long as she went not against the Lord.

Now further more, how God blessed hir waies and indeuors in the meane time, while she thus persecuted the true seruants of God, remaineth to be discussed. Where first this is to be noted, that when she first began to stand for the title of the crowne, and yet had wrought no resistance against Christ and his gospell,

Q. Maries promise to the gospellers broken.

but had promised hir faith to the Suffolke men, to maintteine the religion left by king Edward hir brother, so long God went with hir, aduanced hir, and by the means of the gospellers brought hir to the possession of the realme. But after that she breaking hir promise with God and man, began to take part with Stephan Gardiner, and had giuen ouer hir supremasie vnto the pope, by and by Gods blessing left hir, neither did anie thing well thriue with hir afterward during the whole time of hir regiment. For first incontinentlie the fairest and greatest ship she had, called great Harrie, was burned: such a vessell as in all these parts of all Europe was not to be matched.

Q. Maries mariage with a stranger. Q. Marie disappointed of hir purpose in crowning king Philip. Q. Marie stopped of hir will in restoring abbeie lands.

When would she néeds bring in king Philip, and by hir strange marriage with him, make the whole realme of England subiect vnto a stranger. And all that notwithstanding, either that she did or was able to do, she could not bring to passe to set the crowne of England vpon his head. With king Philip also came in the pope and his popish masse: with whome also hir purpose was to restore againe the monks and nunnes vnto their places, neither lacked there all kind of attempts to the vttermost of hir abilitie: and yet therein also God stopt hir of hir will, that it came not forward. After this, what a dearth happened in hir time here in hir land, the like whereof hath not lightlie in England béene seene, in so much that in sundrie places hir poore subiects were faine to féed of acorns for want of corne?

The victorie of king Edward the first in Scotland.

Furthermore, where other kings are wont to be renowmed by some worthie victorie and prowesse by them atchiued, let vs now se what valiant victorie was gotten in quéene Maries daies. King Edward the first hir blessed brother, how manie rebellions did he suppresse in Deuonshire, in Norffolke, in Oxfordshire, and else where? What a famous victorie in his time was gotten in Scotland, by the singular worke king (no doubt) of Gods blessed hand rather than by anie expectation of man? King Edward the third (which was the eleuenth king from the conquest) by princelie puissance purchased Calis vnto England, which hath béene kept English euer since, till at length came quéene Marie, the eleuenth likewise from the said king Edward, which lost Calis from England againe: so that the winnings of this quéene were verie small; what the losses were, let other men iudge.

The ill lucke of quéene Marie in hir childbirth.

Hitherto the affaires of quéene Marie haue had no great good successe, as you haue heard. But neuer worse successe had anie woman, than had she in hir childbirth. For séeing one of these two must néeds be granted, that either she was with child or not with child; if she were with child and did trauell, why was it not séene? if she were not, how was all the realme deluded? And in the meane while where were all the praiers, the solemne processions, the deuout masses of the catholike cleargie? Why did they not preuaile with God, if their religion were so godlie as they pretended? If their masses Ex opere operato be able to fetch Christ from heauen, & to reach downe to purgatorie, how chanced then they could not reach to the queens chamber, to helpe hir in hir trauell, if she had béene with child in déed? If not, how then came it to passe, that all the catholike church of England did so erre, and was so déepelie deceiued? Quéene Marie, after these manifold plagues and corrections, which might sufficientlie admonish hir of Gods displeasure prouoked against hir, would not yet ceasse hir persecution, but still continued more & more to reuenge hir catholike zeale vpon the lords faithfull people, setting fire to their poore bodies by dozens & halfe dozens together. Whereupon Gods wrathfull indignation increasing more and more against hir, ceassed not to touch hir more neare with priuat misfortunes and calamities.

Q. Marie left desolate of K. Philip hir husband.

For after that he had taken from hir the fruit of children (which chieflie and aboue all things she desired) then he bereft hir of that, which of all earthlie things should haue béene hir chiefe staie of honour, and staffe of comfort; that is, withdrew from hir the affection and companie euen of hir owne husband, by whose mariage she had promised before to hirselfe whole heapes of such ioy and felicitie. But now the omnipotent gouernour of all things, so turned the wheele of hir owne spinning against hir, that hir high buildings of such toies and felicities came all to a cast fell come downe, hir hopes being confounded, hir purposes disappointed, and she now brought to desolation: who seemed neither to haue the fauour of God, nor the hearts of hir subiects, nor yet the loue of hir husband: who neither had fruit by him while she had him, neither could now inioy him whome she had maried, neither yet was in libertie to marrie anie other whome she might inioy. Marke here (christian reader) the woefull aduersitie of this queene, & learne withall, what the Lord can do when mans wilfulnes will néeds resist him, and will not be ruled.

The ill lucke of Q. Marie with hir husband.

The finall end and death of Q. Marie.

At last, when all these faire admonitions would take no place with the quéene, nor moue hir to reuoke hir bloudie lawes, nor to staie the tyrannie of hir priests, nor yet to spare hir owne subiects; but that that the poore seruants of God were drawne dailie by heapes most pittifullie as sheepe to the slaughter, it so pleased the heauenlie maiestie of almightie God, when no other remedie would serue, by death to cut hir off, which in hir life so little regarded the life of others: giuing hir throne, which she abused to the destruction of Christs church and people, to another, who more temperatlie and quietlie could guide the same, after she had reigned here the space of fiue yeares and fiue moneths. The shortnesse of which yeares and reigne, vneth we find in anie other storie of king or quéene since the conquest or before (being come to their owne gouernement) saue onelie in king Richard the third. Which reigne was so rough and rigorous, notwithstanding the shortnesse of the same, that it became a verie spectacle to all christendome; and the maner of dealing vsed vnder hir gouernment was so detestable, that as it was rare, so it raised vp a rare report, euen among strangers, whose heads being fuller of matter than their pens full of inke, wrote in tearmes broade inough of the tumults and slaughters happening in hir vnhappie daies: among whome I will set downe for a taste a few verses drawne out of an hundred and od, presented to Henrie the French king of that name the second, touching the conquest of Calis, whereat for ioy the French were rauished. Thus therfore he saith:

And thus much here, as in the closing vp of this storie, I thought to insinuat, touching the vnluckie and rufull reigne of quéene Marie: not for anie detraction to hir place and state roiall, whereonto she was called of the Lord: but to this onlie intent and effect, that forsomuch as she would néeds set hirselfe so confidentlie to worke and striue against the Lord and his procéedings, all readers and rulers not onelie maie sée how the Lord did worke against hir therfore, but also by hir maie be aduertised and learne what a perilous thing it is for men and women in authoritie, vpon blind zeale and opinion, to stirre vp persecution in Christs church, to the effusion of christian bloud, least it prooue in the end with them (as it did here) that while they thinke to persecute heretikes, they stumble at the same stone as did the Iewes in persecuting Christ and his true members to death, to their owne confusion and destruction.]

Q. Marie left desolate of K. Philip hir husband.

Leauing quéene Marie being dead & gone, you are to vnderstand and note, that the same euening, or (as some haue written) the next daie after the said queens death, Cardinall Pole the bishop of Romes legat departed out of this life, hauing béene not long afore made archbishop of Canturburie: he died at his house ouer against Westminster commonlie called Lambeth, and was buried in Christs church at Canturburie. This cardinall was descended of the noble house of Clarence, that is to saie, of one of the yonger sonnes of Margaret countesse of Salisburie, daughter of George duke of Clarence, brother to K. Edward the fourth. ¶ So that hereby you haue a proofe of the nobleneſſe of his birth, but how barbarous he was of behauiour, and how vnnaturall in the course of his life (which blemished the honour of his descent) it maie appeare by the order and maner of his visitation in Cambridge, with the condemning, taking vp, and burning both the bones and bookes of Bucer and Paulus Phagius, as also by the despitefull handling and madnesse of the papists towards Peter Martyrs wife at Oxford, taken vp from hir graue at the commandement of the said cardinall, and after buried in a dunghill: so that in his actions he shewed himselfe (as he is noted) earnest in burning the bodies of the dead. And for further testimonie of his crueltie, it shall not be impertinent out of maister Fox, here to adioine and set forth to the eies of the world, the blind and bloudie articles set out by cardinall Pole, to be inquired vpon within his dioces of Canturburie. Whereby it maie the better appeare what pokes and snares of fond and fruitlesse traditions were laid vpon the poore flocke of Christ, to intangle and oppresse them with losse of life and libertie. By the which wise men haue to sée what godlie fruits procéeded from that catholike church and sée of Rome. In which albeit thou séest (good reader) some good articles insparsed withall, let that nothing moue thée: for else how could such poison be ministred, but it must haue some honie to relish the readers taſt?

21 Item, whether anie dŏ take vpon them to minister the goods of those that be dead, without authoritie from the ordinarie.

22 Item, whether the poore people in euerie parish be charitablie prouided for.

23 Item, whether there dŏ burne a lampe or a candle before the sacrament: and if there dŏ not, that then it be prouided for, with expedition.

24 Item, whether infants and children be brought to be confirmed in conuenient time.

25 Item, whether anie dŏ kæpe or haue in their custodie anie erronious or vnlawfull books.

26 Item, whether anie dŏ withhold anie monie or goods bequeathed to the amending of the high waies, or anie other charitable deed.

27 Item, whether anie haue put away their wiues, or anie wiues dŏ withdraw themselues from their husbands, being not lawfullie diuorsed.

28 Item, whether anie dŏ violat or breake the sundaies and holie daies, doing their dailie labors and exercises vpon the same.

29 Item, whether the tauerns or alehouses, vpon the sundaies and holie daies, in the time of masse, matins, and euensong, dŏ kæpe open their doores, and dŏ receiue people into their houses to drinke and eate, and thereby neglect their duties in comming to church.

30 Item, whether anie haue, or dŏ depraue or contemne the authoritie or iurisdiction of the popes holinesse, or the see of Rome.

31 Item, whether anie minstrels, or anie other persons dŏ vse to sing anie songs against the holie sacraments, or anie other the rites and ceremonies of the church.

32 Item, whether there be anie hospitals within your parishes, and whether the foundations of them be dulie and trulie obserued and kept; and whether the charitable contributions of the same be done accordinglie.

33 Item, whether anie goods, plate, iewels, or possessions be taken awaie, or withholden from the said hospitals, and by whome.]

Thus you see of what a malignant nature the cardinall was: neuertheless, of more lentitie than manie other popelings, sauoring of the like lewd leuen of antichristianisme. For at what time two and twentie prisoners for their conscience were appre-

Cardinall Poles vnkindnesse to king Henrie that brought him vp.

beſides his peſtilent treaſon, his vnkindneſſe againſt the kings maieſtie, who brought him vp of a child, and promoted both him, and reſtored his blood being attainted, to be of the péeres of this realme, and gaue him monie yéerelie out of his coffers, to find him honorablie at ſtudie, maketh his treaſon much more deteſtable to all the world, and him to be reputed more wild and cruell than anie tiger.

Séene more thereof before pag. 1134.

Thus much out of Cuthert Cunſtals ſermon printed Cum priuilegio ad imprimendum ſolum, by Thomas Berthelet, the yeare aboue named. Now it reſteth to conclude this diſcourſe concerning cardinall Pole with a briefe epitome of his laſt will and teſtament, which he made not long before he let his life, wherein he profeſſeth him ſelfe reſolute to die in the ſame faith and obedience of the Romiſh church wherein he liued; willing & ordeining his bodie to be buried in his cathedrall church of Canturburie (as he termeth it) in the ſame chapell where the head of the moſt bleſſed martyr Thomas Becket, whilome archbiſhop of the ſaid church was kept: with maſſes & dirges, &c. to be ſaid for his ſoule, the ſoules of his parents, and of all the faithfull departed out of this life, &c.

A traitor he liued, a traitor he died.

The diſtribution of his goods.

As for patrimoniall goods, ſith he had none whereby he ought to haue had regard of his kindred, therefore ſuch goods as he had he willed to be diſtributed among ſuch perſons as had well deſerued of him, and vpon godlie vſes. He made one Aloiſius Priolus a Venetian his heire and executor of all his goods and chattels, as well within England as without, in Spaine, Italie, Rome, Venice, or elſewhere, &c. And for dilapidations, there is no reaſon (ſaith he) that my ſucceſſor in the ſée of Canturburie ſhould demand anie thing, becauſe I haue beſtowed more than a thouſand pounds within theſe few yéeres, in repairing & making better ſuch houſes as belonged to the ſaid ſée, ſince I came to it (which was no long time by our computation.) The ouerſéers and defenders of this his laſt will he made Nicholas archbiſhop of Yorke chancellor of England, Thomas biſhop of Elie, his coſſine the lord Edward Haſtings the kings chamberleine, ſir John Boral the quéenes ſecretarie, ſir Edward Cordall maſter of the rolles, and maſter Henrie Cole his vicar generall in his ſpiritualties. All theſe he beſought to giue quéene Marie knowledge of this his laſt will, and with all reuerence to beſéech hir, that what good will and fauor ſhe ſhewed him in all cauſes and affaires whiles he was aliue; the ſame ſhe would vouchſafe to exhibit and beſtow vpon him being dead, and gratiouſlie prouide that all lets and impediments to the execution of this his laſt will & teſtament might be remoued and vtterlie taken awaie: and to euerie one of his ouerſéers for their paines taking herein, he gaue fiftie pounds a peece by will. This teſtament was ſubſcribed with his owne hand, and ſigned with his owne ſeale, in preſence of a number of witneſſes there vndernamed. All which, with the tenor of his ſaid laſt will at large, are remembred by Schardius in epitome rerum geſtarum ſub Ferdinando imperatore. And thus much of cardinall Pole.

Touching dilapidations.

He is deſirous that quéene Marie ſhould haue knowledge of this his laſt will.

Upon whoſe diſcourſe preſentlie ended, as hath béene done in the treatiſe of high conſtables * at the duke of Buckinghams beheadding, and of the lord protectors * at the duke of Summerſets ſuffering (in which two honorable perſonages thoſe two offices had their end) ſo here we are to infer a collection of Engliſh cardinals, which order ceaſed when Reginald Pole died. After which treatiſe ended, according to the purpoſed order, and a catalog of writers at the end of this quéenes reigne annexed, it remaineth that quéene Elizabeth ſhew hir ſelfe in hir triumphs at hir gratious and glorious coronation.

THis cardinall Pole being the laſt cardinall in England, and ſo likelie to be, as the ſtate of our preſent time doth earneſtlie with; doth here offer occaſion to treat of all ſuch Engliſhmen as haue poſſeſſed that honor. Which I onelie do, for that I would haue all whatſoeuer monuments of antiquitie preſerued, leaſt Pereat memoria eorum cum ſonitu. Wherefore thus I begin.

Adrian the fourth of that name biſhop of Rome (called before that time Nicholas Breakeſpeare) being borne in England about ſaint Albons (whome Onuphrius affirmeth to be borne in the towne of Malmesberie, in the dominions of ſaint Albons, in the dioces of Bath, ſomewhat like a ſtranger miſtaking the names of places and perſons, as he often doth) was for the pouertie of his father (who after became a monke in ſaint Albons) not able to be maintained here at learning. Whereupon he goeth into Prouince to the monaſterie of ſaint Rufus, whereof in time he was made a canon, and after abbat of that houſe; but in the end miſliked of the couent, they appealed him to Rome before Eugenius the third then pope: who for that time pacifieng the matter betweene them, they did after fall at variance againe, and ſo called him before the pope the ſecond time. Eugenius ſéeing theſe continuall braules, wearie to heare them, and fauoring this Nicholas, made them chooſe an other abbat, and appointed Nicholas to the biſhoprike of Alba, and to the honor of a cardinall, ſending him legat into Denmarke and Norweie: where he remained ſome yeares. But at length returning to Rome after the death of Eugenius and his ſucceſſor Anaſtaſius, this Nicholas was aduanced from a cardinall to a pope, and called Adrian the fourth. Who died in the fift yeare of Henrie the ſecond king of England, in the yeare of Chriſt 1159.

Boſa, an Engliſhman and cardinall, was not that Boſa which was biſhop of Yorke, of whome Beda maketh mention, lib. 4. cap. 13. and cap. 23. of his eccleſiaſticall hiſtorie, where he ſaith that the ſame Boſa was made biſhop of the ſame ſée, in the yeare of Chriſt 678. And therefore being long before this Boſa, our cardinall could not be the ſame man, as ſome vnconſideratlie haue ſtiflie maintained. For this our Boſa was a cardinall deacon, and the nephue to pope Adrian the fourth before named; and intituled a deacon cardinall of the title of Coſma and Damian, in the yeare of Chriſt 1155, being after made a prieſt cardinall of the title of ſaint Prudentian, by pope Alexander the third, in the yeare of Chriſt 1163, before which he was chamberleine to the church of Rome, being created to the firſt cardinalſhip and office of chamberleine by his vncle the ſaid pope Adrian the fourth.

Robert Curſon, a man excellentlie learned both in diuine & humane letters, comming from Rome, grew in ſuch eſtimation, that in the end he became a cardinall, of whom we find recorded in this ſort. At the taking of Dameta in Egypt, there was with Pelagius the popes legat, maiſter Robert Curſon an Engliſhman a moſt famous clearke, borne of a noble houſe, and cardinall of the church of Rome.

Stephan Laughton made prieſt cardinall, in the yeare of Chriſt 1213, and the ſixteenth yeare of pope Innocent the third, of the title of ſaint Chryſogon, was archbiſhop of Canturburie, for whoſe cauſe and contention betweene king Iohn and him, the realme of England was long interdicted, the nobilitie was slaine, the king deposed, his kingdome made feodarie to Rome, and Pandolph the cardinall sent hither to receiue the crowne of K. John. This Stephan departed the world, in the twelfe yeare of Henrie the third, and in the yeare of our redemption 1238.

Robert Somercot a cardinall, a man well esteemed for his vertue and learning, a graue writer, and well beloued of all men, departed from the vanities of this life, in the yeare of our saluation 1241, being the fiue and twentith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third.

Ancherus citizen and archdeacon of London, was made priest cardinall of the title of saint Pyramidis, by pope Urban the second, in the yeare that the world beginne fleth 1262, and the yeare of the long reigne of king Henrie the third, the foure and fortith.

Ancherus. Onuphrius. Matt. Parker.

Robert de Kilwarbie, whome Onuphrius calleth Robert Biliberie frier preacher, doctor of diuinitie was remoued from the archbishoprike of Canturburie to be bishop of Portus, and afterward was made cardinall of saint Rufinian by pope Nicholas the third, in the yeare of Christ as some saie 1277, and as others haue 1278, or 1273; being about the first yeare of Edward the first of that name king of England; who died vnder the same pope Nicholas, in the yeare of Christ 1280, as hath Onuphrius.

Robert de Kilwarbie. Matt. Parker. Hen. of Leceſt. Onuphrius.

Barnard de Anguiscelle was remoued from the archbishoprike of Arras, and made bishop of Portua and cardinall of saint Rufinian, being a bishop cardinall, and aduanced to that principalitie by pope Martine the fourth of that name, in the yeare of our redemption 1291, being about the nintéenth yeare of the said Edward the first: whome Onuphrius much mistaking himselfe maketh a Frenchman: and Matthew Parker rightlie setteth him downe as an Englishman.

Barnard de Anguiscelle. Matt. Parker.

Hugh Attrat priest cardinall, of the title of saint Laurence in Lucina was created cardinall by pope Martine the fourth, in the yeere of our Lord 1281: he was also called Hugh of Euesham, and died at Rome in the yeere of Christ 1287, whilest the see was vacant, being about the fiftéenth yeare of Edward the first.

Hugh Attrat. Matthew Parker. Rafe Baldocke. Onuphrius.

Berard or rather Bernard a cardinall of Pyrelina was aduanced to the dignitie of a cardinall by Nicholas the fourth of that name bishop of Rome in the yeere (as I suppose) 1298, though some saie in the yeere 1288, the error whereof I gather to be in the printer.

Bernard. Matthew Parker.

Leonard Guercine bishop, cardinall of Alba was receiued to the scarlet hat and robe by pope Bonifacius the eight, in the yéere of Christ 1300, being the eight and twentith of Edward the first.

William one of the order of the frier preachers doctor of diuinitie in Oxford, priest cardinall of the title of saint Sabina, to which place he was adopted by pope Benedict the eleuenth, in the yéere 1303, being the one and thirtith yeere of Edward the first, in which yeere he died in England.

Walter Winterborne (that came in place of William last before named) doctor of diuinitie of the order of frier preachers, confessor to Edward the first, and priest cardinall of the title of saint Sabina, was by the said Benedict the eleuenth admitted to the college of cardinals in the yeere of Christ 1304, being the one and thirtith yeere of Edward the first, which Walter small time inioied that place. For going with other cardinals into France, & so into Italie, he died at Genoa or Gene, whose bodie being carried into England, was buried in the church of the frier preachers in the yeere of Christ 1305, being the three and thirtith yeere of Edward the first.

Walter Winterborne. Matthew Parker. Nic. Triuet. Onuphrius.

Thomas Ioyze a frier preacher doctor of diuinitie of Oxford, confessor to Edward the first, priest cardinall of the title of saint Sabina was created by pope Clement the fift in the yeere of Christ 1305; being the three and thirtith yéere of Edward the first, or (as saith Walsingham) a little before Christmasse in the yéere of Christ 1306, who by him is also named Ioyza. This man (as hath Onuphrius) died in the iourneie he made as ambassador into Italie to Henrie the seuenth of that name emperour in the yéere 1311, & the seuenth yeere of the popedome of Clement the fift, who sent him in that ambassage: his bodie was carried into England, and buried at Oxford in a monasterie of the frier preachers.

Simon Langham abbat of Westminster, treasuror of England, bishop of Elie and of Canturburie, and chancellor of England, was elected to the honor of the purple hat and cardinall dignitie, in the yéere of our redemption 1368, being the two and fortith yéere of king Edward the third. And here because I would not set it downe in a distinct place, as receiuing it for truth, sith by search I find it not so, what authoritie soeuer they that wrote the same had to lead them to it: I will note an ouersight passed the fingers of Fabian, Holinshed, and Grafton, all writers of our age, who affirme that the bishop of Winchester, in the fiue and fortith yéere of king Edward the third, being a cardinall (for so I gather by the words and circumstance of the storie) with the bishop of Beauois likewise a cardinall, were put in commission by pope Gregorie the eleuenth to treat betwixt the king of England and France. But because I can not find in Onuphrius nor in Matthew Parker anie such cardinall set downe, I do not at this time imbrace it, vntill I maie find better proofe thereof than the authoritie of Grafton, Fabian, and those before named; especiallie sith that he which was then bishop of Winchester in the said fiue and fortith yéere of Edward the third, and all they which were bishops of Winchester from the first yeare of the reigne of Edward the third, vntill the yeare of Christ 1404, in which Henrie Beaufort was bishop of Winchester, were neuer cardinals: the said bishops in orderlie succession thus named: Adam Orletie, William de Edington, William Wickham, and then Henrie Beaufort, who was a cardinall. But these writers mistaking perchance the yeare of the king, and the name of the bishops see, in the fiue and fortith yeare of Edward the third (in which yeare John Thorsbie was cardinall as after followeth) haue (in setting downe Winchester for Worcester committed a fault) so easie it is for the printer or anie other to misplace and misname the one bishoprike for the other.

Simon Langham.

John Thorsbie bishop of saint Dauids in Wales chancellor of England, bishop of Worcester, and after bishop of Yorke, was made cardinall by Urban the fift then bishop of Rome (as I suppose) before the fiue and fortith yeare of Edward the third. This man surrendred his life in the yeare of our redemption 1374, being the eight and fortith yeare of king Edward the third.

John Thorsbie. Holinshed and other authors.

Adam priest cardinall of the title of saint Cecilia, was inuested with the dignitie of a scarlet hat in the yeare of our redemption 1378, about the first yeare of Richard the second. Holinshed mentioneth one Adam Eston to be a cardinall, who (considering the time when he liued) must néeds be this man, of whome he writeth in this sort. Adam Eston well seene in all the tongs, was made a cardinall by pope Gregorie the eleuenth, but by pope Urban the first he was committed to prison in Genoa (in the yeare of our redemption 1383, being about the seauenth yeare of Richard the second) and by contemplation plation of the said king Richard, was taken out of prison, but not fullie deliuered, vntill the daies of Boniface the ninth, who(in the yeare of our redemption 1389, about the thirteenth yeare of Richard the second) restored the said Adam to his former dignitie: all which Holinshed speaketh of him amongst the writers of England, except the yeares of the Lord which I haue added out of Onuphrius, and the yeares of the king which I haue ioined of my selfe. Which Onuphrius maketh this Adam to be bishop of London, and to die in Rome the third calends of Maie, in the yeere of our sauior 1397, being the one and twentith of Richard the second, vnder Boniface the ninth pope of that name, and was buried in the place whereof he was intituled to the honor of a cardinall.

Philip de Repindone. Onuphrius. Matthew Parker.

Philip de Repindone bishop of Lincolne and doctor of diuinitie, was by pope Gregorie the twelfe, then bishop of Rome, in the yeare of Christ 1408, being the tenth yeare of king Henrie the fourth created cardinall of the title of saint Nereus and Achilleus.

Thomas. Onuphrius. Matthew Parker. Liber Dunel.

Thomas bishop of Durham was made (as saith Onuphrius, in the yeare of our redemption 1411 by Iohn the two and twentith, commonlie called Iohn the three and twentith) priest cardinall. Touching which matter there is no mention made in the life of Thomas Langleie bishop of Durham, and liuing at this time that this Langleie was a cardinall: for this Thomas Langleie was made bishop of Durham in the yeare of our Lord 1406, and continued in that see one and thirtie yeares, departing the world 1437, and so the creation of this Thomas bishop of Durham mentioned by Onuphrius and Matthew Parker bishop of Canturburie, in the yeare of Christ 1411 must needes fall in the life of this Thomas Langleie bishop of Durham.

Robert. Onuphrius. Matthew Parker.

Robert bishop of Salisburie priest cardinall (although it be not shewed of what title) was preferred to that place by pope Iohn the three and twentith in the yeare of our redemption 1411, being about the twelfe yere of the reigne of king Henrie the fourth, of whom Onuphrius writeth in this sort: Roberti episcopi Sarisburiensis presbyteri cardinalis, & Egidij de campis presbyteri cardinalis gesta & exitus, quod nunquam Romanam curiam adierint, incerti & obscuri omnino sunt. Satis tamen constat, eos ante papæ Martini electionem mortuos fuisse.

Henrie Beaufort.

Henrie Beaufort, sonne vnto Iohn of Gant and Katharine Swinesord, being bishop of Winchester and chancellor of England, tooke the state of a cardinall (of the title of saint Eusebius) at Calis, being absent (as hath Matthew Parker) in the yeare of our redemption 1426: in the fift yeare of king Henrie the first. He was called the rich cardinall of Winchester, being aduanced to that honor by Martine the third, commonlie called Martine the fift then pope of Rome. This Henrie died vnder pope Nicholas the fift in the yeare of Christ 1447: being about the six & twentith yeare of the miserable reigne of king Henrie the first.

John Stafford. Onuphrius. Matthew Parker.

John Stafford bishop of Bath and Welles chancellor of England, after bishop of Canturburie, was created priest cardinall by Eugenius then bishop of Rome, in the yeare that the world became fleth 1434: being the twelfe yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the first.

John Kempe. Holinshed. Polydor. Onuphrius.

John Kempe bishop of London, twise lord chancellour of England, bishop of Yorke, and after that archbishop of Canturburie, was by Eugenius the fourth then archbishop of Rome, made cardinall of the title of saint Sabina, as saith Holinshed, otherwise by Onuphrius called Salbina: contrarie to Polydor, who in his three and twentith booke of the historie of England, affirmeth him to be cardinalited by pope Nicholas the fift. He died (as saith Onuphrius) in the yeare that the godhead was united to the manhood, to wit, one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and foure, vnder pope Nicholas the first, which yeare of our Lord met with the fiue and thirtith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the first.

Thomas Bourcher. Onuphrius. Matthew Parker. Holinshed. Polydor.

Thomas Bourcher (borne of the noble house of the earles of Essex, being chancellor of England, bishop of Worcester, from thence removed to Elie, from that Ile aduanced to the metropolitan see of Canturburie, and priest cardinall of the title of saint Sixtus (or the Baths) was honored with the scarlet hat and siluer pillers, by pope Paule the second of that name, in the yeare that the second person in trinitie toke vpon him the forme of a seruant, one thousand foure hundred sixtie fiue, being the fift yeare of the reigne of the noble prince king Edward the fourth.

John Morton. Onuphrius. Matthew Parker. Polydor. Holinshed.

John Morton bishop of Elie chancellor of England & archbishop of Canturburie, being priest cardinall of the title of saint Anastasius, was honored with a scarlet hat by Alexander the first of that name (then gouernour of the seat of Peter at Rome) in the yeare from the birth of Christ 1493, being the ninth yeare of the Salomon of England king Henrie the seauenth. He died as saith Onuphrius, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand and fiue hundred, being about the eight yeare of Alexander the first still pope of Rome, and the sixteenth yeare of the said Henrie the seauenth then king of England.

Christopher Bembridge. Matthew Parker. Onuphrius.

Christopher Bembridge a gentleman borne, was archbishop of Yorke, & priest cardinall of the title of S. Pyrrhus, was aduanced to that scarlet dignitie by pope Julius the second, in the yere that the virgin was deliuered of our sauiour one thousand fiue hundred & eleuen, being the third yeare of the triumphant reigne of king Henrie the eight. He died at Rome, (as saith Onuphrius) by poison, in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred and thirteene yeares (being the eleuenth yeare, when Leo the tenth did hold the sterne of the Romane bishoprike, & the fift yeare when the said Henrie the eight did rule the scepter of England) and was buried at Rome in the church of the holie trinitie of the English nation.

Thomas Wolsie.

Thomas Wolseie the kings almoner, deane of Yorke, abbat of saint Albons, and of saint Austins, bishop of Lincolne, Winchester, and Yorke, chancellour of England: all which or all saue two he held at one time in his owne hands, was made priest cardinall of the title of saint Cicilie, whereunto he was promoted by pope Leo the tenth, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred and sixteene, being the seauenth yeere of the reigne of the famous king Henrie the eight, of whome Onuphrius somewhat misliking the pronuntiation of his name thus writeth: Thomas Wlcer ex oppido Sufforth diœcesis Norduicensis, &c. wherein like a stranger to our countrimen he misliketh both name, towne, place, and the prouince of Suffolke for the towne of Ipswich. For this cardinall Wolseie being descended of meane parentage, was borne in the towne of Gipswich now called Ipswich in the prouince or countrie of Suffolke in the diocesse of the bishoprike of Norwich.

John Fisher.

John Fisher bishop of Rochester priest cardinall of the title of saint Vitalis, was (although he neuer came at Rome, nor for anie thing that I can learne was euer out of England) created cardinall at Rome, by Paule the third of that name, then wearing the triple crowned miter, and being bishop of Rome. But this Fisher neuer ware his scarlet hat: for after this high dignitie and before he might couer his priestlie crowne with the same, he lost his head, in the yeare from which the angels sang at the birth of the Messias one thousand fiue hundred thirtie and fiue, fiue, being the seauen and twentith of the reigne of that king Henrie the eight, which deliuered his kingdome from all subiection to the bishop of Rome Clement the seauenth of that name.

Reginald Pole. Reginald Poole, noblie borne, & yong sonne to sir Richard Poole knight of the garter, by his wife Margaret countesse of Salisburie, daughter to George duke of Clarence brother to K. Edward the fourth, was made deacon cardinall of the title of saint Marie in Colmeden, by pope Paule the third of that name, in the yeare that the mother of God brought forth the sonne of man 1536, being the eight and twentith yeare of king Henrie the eight. This man legat of pope Julius the third, comming into England in the yeare of our Lord 1554, being the second yeare of quéene Maries reigne, was after made bishop of Canturburie, on the fiue and twentith of March, in the yeare of Christ 1556, being the third yeare of the reigne of the said quéene Marie, and died the seauentéenth daie of Nouember, in the yeare of Christ 1558, being the last date of the reigne of the said quéene Marie, or rather the next daie erlie in the morning, at his house at Lambeth, and was honorablie conueied to Canturburie, where he was buried. This man was the last English cardinall that liued and inioied that title of honour in England. For although the English cardinall which followeth were created after him, yet I suppose that he died much before him: but he liued not in England at the same time that cardinall Poole died, as farre as I can lerne. Wherfore I still make this cardinall Poole the last English cardinall that was liuing in England.

Peter Peto. Peter Peto, borne of an ancient familie, and one of the order of the frier minors obseruants (whome Onuphrius calleth Angliæ legatus) was created cardinall by Paule the fourth of that name, chéefe bishop of Rome, in the yeare that the word became flesh 1557, being the fift yeare of quéene Marie. Besides this number of thirtie cardinals, there haue bin manie other to the number of ten or more, before the time that pope Innocent the first of that name did weald the charge of the Romane bishoprike, as Matthew Parker late bishop of Canturburie a worthie antiquarie doth witnesse, and I my selfe haue obserued, besides those which Onuphrius and the said Matthew Parker (in the Latine booke of the archbishops of his owne sée) haue recited. But bicause neither they nor I haue yet atteined to their names, we must and do omit them: and yet it may be that these three which follow, named by Onuphrius being English names, were Englishmen, and part of the said number of ten cardinals, whose names we do not know, which three cardinals were Hugh Foliot, Peter Mortimer, and Simon Beale. But bicause I cannot certeinlie gather out of Onuphrius that they were Englishmen, I dare not presume so to make them; though in mine owne conceit I verelie suppose that they were borne in England: for in vncerteine matters I dare not set downe anie certeintie.

Wherefore to set end to this cardinals discourse, I will knit vp this matter with one onelie note drawne out of Matthew Parkers beforenamed booke of the liues of the bishops of Canturburie, which is as followeth: That this number and remembrance of our cardinals is not so wonderfull as is that computation of the Romane bishops, which pope John the two and twentith of that name hath gathered of his predecessors. For he doth recite that out of the order of saint Benet or Benedict (whereof himselfe was) there haue issued foure and twentie popes, 183 cardinals, 1464 archbishops, 3502 bishops, and abbats innumerable. Thus concluding (that of all these our English cardinals, with the description of their liues, I will more largelie intreat in my booke intituled the Pantographie of England, conteining the vniuersall description of all memorable places and persons, aswell temporall as spirituall) I request the reader to take this in good part, till that booke may come to light. Thus much Francis Thin, who with the wheele of George Ripleie canon of Bridlington, after the order of circulation in alchimicall art, and by a geometricall circle in naturall philosophie doth end this cardinals discourse, resting in the centre of Reginald Poole, the last liuing cardinall in England, by whose death the said Francis tooke occasion to pase about the circumference of this matter of the cardinals of this realme.]

Of such learned men as had written and did liue in the reigne of quéene Marie there were manie, of whome no small number ended their liues also during that short time of hir reigne, some by fire, and others in exile. John Rogers borne in Lancashire, wrote diuerse treatises, translated the bible into English with notes, and published the same vnder the name of Thomas Matthew, he suffred in Smithfield the fourth of Februarie, in the yeare 1555. Nicholas Ridleie bishop first of Rochester, and after of London, suffered at Oxford in the said yeare 1555. Hugh Latimer borne in Leicestershire, sometime bishop of Worcester, a notable preacher, and a most reuerend father, suffered at the same place, and in the same daie and yeare with bishop Ridleie. John Hooper borne in Summersetshire, bishop first of Glocester, and after of Worcester, suffered at Glocester in the yeare of our Lord 1555. John Bradford, borne in Manchester, a notable towne in Lancashire, a sober, mild, and discréet learned man, suffered at London the first of Julie in the said yeare 1555.

Stephan Gardiner bishop of Winchester borne in the towne of saint Edmundsburie in Suffolke, of king Henrie the eights councell, and in king Edwards daies committed to ward within the tower, released by quéene Marie, made lord chancellor, and so died a stout champion in defense of the popes doctrine, and a great enimie to the professours of the gospell. John Philpot borne in Hamshire, sonne to sir Peter Philpot knight, was archdeacon of Winchester, ended his life by fire in the yeare aforesaid 1555, the 18 of December, going then on the foure & fortith yeare of his age. Thomas Cranmer borne in Nottinghamshire, archbishop of Canturburie, a worthie prelat, in sundrie vertues right commendable, suffered at Oxford the one and twentith of March, one thousand, fiue hundred, fiftie and six. Richard Morison knight, borne in Oxfordshire, wrote diuerse treatises, and deceased at Strausburge the 17 of March 1556. John Poinet borne in Kent, bishop of Rochester first, & after of Winchester, deceased likewise at Strausburgh, about the tenth or eleauenth of August, in the yeare of our Lord 1556.

Robert Record a doctor of physicke, and an excellent philosopher, in arithmetike, astrologie, cosmographie, and geometrie most skilfull, he was borne in Wales, descended of a good familie, and finallie departed this life in the daies of quéene Marie. Bartholomew Traheron descended of a worshipfull house in the west parts of England, deane of Chichester, departed this life in Germanie, where he liued in exile, about the latter end of quéen Maries reigne. Cuthert Tunstall, bishop first of London, and after of Durham, borne in Lancashire of a right worshipfull familie, excellentlie learned, as by his workes it may appeare, doctor of both the lawes, departed this life in the yeare 1559. Richard Sampson bishop of Couentrie & Lichfield wrote certeine treatises, & departed this life 1555. Lucas Shepherd borne in Colchester in Esser, an English poet. Jane Dudleie daughter vnto Henrie Oreie duke of Suffolke, wrote diuerse things highlie to hir commendation, of whome yée haue heard more before heere in this historie; William Thomas a Welshman borne, of whome yée haue likewise heard how he suffered for treason, wrote the historie of Italie, and other things verie eloquentlie; James Brookes a doctor of diuinitie, John Standish a doctor likewise of the same profession, great defenders of the popes doctrine, as by their workes appeareth; William Perine a blacke frier by profession, and a doctor also of diuinitie, wrote in defense of the masse, and preached sermons which were printed of like stuffe; John Baret borne in Lin, a doctor of diuinitie, and sometime a Carmelit frier, but reuolting from the popes religion, he became an earnest setter forth of the gospell, but e ffsones he fell off, and returned to his former opinions now in the daies of quéene Marie; Henrie lord Stafford, sonne to Edward duke of Buckingham, amongst other things which he wrote, he translated a booke out of Latine into English, intituled Vtriusque potestatis differentia, that is, The difference betwixt the two powers, which booke (as some thinke) was first compiled and set forth by Edward Fox bishop of Hereford; John Hopkins translated diuerse psalmes of the psalter into English méeter, which are to be found amongst those appointed to be sung in the churches of England.

Thus farre the troublesome reigne of Queene Marie the first of that name (God grant she may be the last of hir religion) eldest daughter to king Henrie the eight.

The resolution of the lords to declare ladie Elisabeth quéene.

The words of doctor Heath lord chancellor, vttered in the parlement house touching the proclaming of the ladie Elisabeth quéene.

The

The peaceable and prosperous regiment of blessed Queene Elisabeth, second daughter to king Henrie the eight.

AFter all the stormie, tempestuous, and blustering windie weather of quéene Marie was ouerblowne, the darkesome clouds of discomfort dispersed, the palpable fogs and mists of most intollerable miserie consumed, and the dashing showers of persecution ouerpast: it pleased God to send England a calme and quiet season, a cleare and louelie sunshine, a quittest from former broiles of a turbulent estate, and a world of blessings by good quéene Elisabeth: into whose gratious reigne we are now to make an happie entrance as followeth.

When true knowledge was had that quéene Marie was deceased, who left hir life in this world the seuentéenth daie of Nouember, as is before mentioned in the latter end of hir historie: in the time of a parlement, the lords that were assembled in the vpper house, being resolued according to the lawes of the land, to declare the ladie Elisabeth sister to the said quéene to be verie true and lawfull heire to the crowne of England, sent immediatlie to the speaker of the parlement, willing him with the knights and burgesses of the neather house, without delaie to repaire vnto them into the vpper house, for their assents in a case of great importance. Who being come thither, after silence made (as the maner is) the archbishop of Yorke chancellor of England, whose name was Nicholas Heth, doctor in diuinitie, stood vp and pronounced in effect these words following.

The resolution of the lords to declare ladie Elisabeth quéene.

The words of doctor Heath lord chancellor, mooued in the parlement house touching the proclaiming of the ladie Elisabeth quéene.

The cause of your calling hither at this time, is to signifie vnto you, that all the lords here present are certeinlie certified, that God this present morning hath called to his mercie our late souereigne ladie quéene Marie. Which hap as it is most heauie and grieuous vnto vs, so haue we no lesse cause another waie to reioise with praise to almightie God, for that he hath left vnto vs a true, lawfull and right inheritrice to the crowne of this realme, which is the ladie Elisabeth, second daughter to our late souereigne lord of noble memorie king Henrie the eight, and sister to our said late quéene, of whose most lawfull right and title in the succession of the crowne (thanks be to God) we néed not to doubt. Wherefore the lords of this house haue determined with your assents and consents, to passe from hence into the palace, and there to proclame the said ladie Elisabeth quéene of this realme, without further trac of time. Whereto the whole house answered with euident appearance of ioy, God saue quéene Elisabeth, long may quéene Elisabeth reigne ouer vs. And so this present parlement being dissolued by the act of God, the said lords immediatlie calling vnto them the kings and principall heralds at armes, went into the palace of Westminster, and directlie before the hall doore in the foore noone of the same daie, after seuerall soundings of trumpets made, in most solemne maner, proclamed the new quéene, by this name and title: Elisabeth by the grace of God queene of England, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c.: to the great comfort and reioising of the people, as by their maners and countenances well appeared. After which proclamation made at Westminster, the said lords, to wit the duke of Norfolke, the lord treasuror, the earle of Oxford, and diuerse other lords and bishops, with all spéed repaired into the citie of London, where the like proclamation was made in the presence of them, and also of the lord maior and aldermen in their scarlet gowns, at the crosse in Cheape, with no lesse vniuersall ioy and thanksgiuing to God of all the hearers. And so our most gratious souereigne ladie quéene Elisabeth began hir happie reigne ouer this realme of England, to the great comfort and gladnesse of all estates christianlie minded and disposed, vpon the foresaid seuentéenth day of Nouember,

On wednesdaie the three and twentith of Nouember, the quéenes maiestie remoued from Hatfield vnto the Charter house in London, where she lodged in the lord Noths house: in which remouing, and comming thus to the citie, it might well appeare how comfortable hir presence was to them that went to receiue hir on the waie, and likewise to the great multitudes of people that came abroad to sée hir grace, shewing their reioising harts in countenance and words, with hartie praiers for hir maiesties prosperous estate and preseruation: which no doubt were acceptable to God, as by the sequele of things it may certenlie be beleeued, sith his diuine maiestie hath so directed hir doings, that if euer the commonwealth of this land hath flourished, it may rightlie be said, that in hir most happie reigne it hath béene most flourishing, in peace, quietnesse, and due administration of iustice, mixed with mercifull clemencie, so as those which cannot content themselues with the pre-

From the which sort of men the Lord deliuer hir roiall maiestie, and all hir true and louing subiects, and preserue hir in long life to all our comforts, and continue hir in such happie proceedings as she hath begun, to the end.

Hir grace remoueth to the tower.

On mondaie the eight and twentith of Nouember, about two of the clocke in the afternoone, hir grace remoued againe, and taking hir chariot, rode from my lord Mouths house alongst Barbican, and entring by Criplegate into the citie, kept along the wall to Bishops gate, and so by blanch Chapelton vnto Parke lane. At hir entring into blanch Chapleton, the artillerie in the tower began to go off, continuallis shoting for the space almost of halfe an houre, but yet had made an end before hir maiestie was aduanced to Berkin church, and so with great ioie and preasse of people, of whom all the streets were full as she passed, declaring their inward reioisings by gesture, words, and countenance, she entered the tower, where she continued till the first of December being mondaie, on the which daie, she remoued by water vnto Summerset place in the Strond, where she arriued about ten of the clocke in the forenoone the same daie.

¶ On thursdaie betweene two and three in the morning the eight of December 1558 in the first yeare of our souereigne ladie queene Elisabeths reigne died in the tower of London, that honorable man sir Thomas Cheineie knight of the order, treasuror of hir maiesties most honorable houshold, warden of the cinque ports, & of hir highnesse priuie councell, whose pulses (by the report of his surgeon) laboured more than three quarters of an houre after his death, so stronglie as though life had not beene absent from the bodie. By the report also of the same surgeon, he had the sweetest face of death to behold for one of his yeares that euer he saw, and died so quietlie and patientlie, that neither his face, mouth, eies, hands, or feet were vncomelie vsed in the changing of this his life.

The death of sir Thomas Cheinie lord warden of the cinque ports.

His honest & honorable care for his men that serued him.

His liberalitie.

His worthie seruice which proued him to be a louer of chiualrie.

For twentie yeares before his departure, he kept in his stable continuallie winter and summer twentie great horsse at the least, and eight or nine geldings, besides sixteene or seuenteene geldings which were kept at grasse, and had in a readinesse furniture for them all to serue in the field: and no one of the same horsse or geldings but he was able and readie for anie man at armes to serue vpon. Beside this he kept so bountifull a house, and was so liberall and good to his men, that well was that noble mans son, gentlemans sonne, or other that might happen to be preferred into his seruice. And againe, the number of his seruants to whom he gaue liueries were 205, whereof in houshold were sir score, besides strangers that were dailie comming and going. And his seruants had no iust cause, either for lacke of great wages truelie paid them euerie quarter, and bordwages euerie sundaie, or plentie of meat and drinke, & lodging on good featherbeds to liue out of order. And such commoditie as might by chance fall within the iurisdiction of his office of wardenrie, being a thing fit for his men, he neuer turned the same to his owne vse; but alwaies gaue it them. Whether this realme hath not lost a worthie subiect, and specialliie his men a good maister, let all men iudge that knew him.

The like is reported of cardinall Wolsete when he was in the floure of his prosperitie.

His minstralles of his friends at his death.

But how manie be there now that will giue away the profits of their office to their seruants?

Before his departure out of this world, he seemed to haue a great care for his men, thinking least without some prouision for them, they would after his death run at random and liue disorderlie, which like a noble man he preuented after this liberall sort as followeth. In his last will and testament, to some he gaue annuities during life, and to others a whole yeares wages after his death; but both to the one sort and the other he prouided that all things which he owght them might be paid: and also so long as they vsed themselues like honest men, and were not retained in seruice, they should haue meat, drinke, and lodging at his house, till his sonne now lord Cheinie came to his lawfull age, which was the space of three yeares, in no lesse or worsse maner than they were wont and accustomed to haue in his life time. In his last will he also remembred some of his frends, as well those of nobilitie and worthip, as others, some with one gift and some with an other, desiring them to assist his executors for the performance of his last will.

His wit, experience, courtesie, and valiantnesse in seruice was such, as king Henrie the eight, and his children, to wit, king Edward the first, queene Marie, and queene Elisabeth vsed him as one of all their priuie councell, and was treasuror of all their honorable households during his life. He was brought vp in king Henrie the seuenths house, & was one of his henchmen. So that it appeareth before he died, he had serued three kings, and two queenes. His truth was such to all these princes, that he euer liued towards them Sine macula, seruing in the court three score years. And although he bare this great saile, yet prouided he to paie euerie man iustlie that he owght them. His bountifulnesse, liberalitie, and courtesie to diuerse noble men, gentlemen and others, attending in the court was such, that they were euer glad to haue him there amongst them; and his stoutnesse & haltie courage was such, and so well knowen to the Frenchmen, as they both feared and loued him wonderfullie. In the end he was so worthie a gentleman, and such a necessarie member in the commonwealth, as his want cannot but be lamented of all good and true English harts. But the almightie must be serued when his good will and pleasure is.]

Sir Thomas Cheinie an old seruitor in court. See more of him before, pag. 973, 974.

A commendation of his courtesie, bountifulnes, and sparkle stoutnesse.

The thirteenth of December being tuesdaie, the corps of queene Marie was right honorablie conueied from hir manor of S. James, vnto the abbeie of Westminster. Hir picture was laid on the coffin, apparelled in hir roiall robes, with a crowne of gold set on the head thereof, after a solemne manner. In the abbeie was a rich and sumptuous hearse prepared and set vp with wax, and richlie decked with penons, baners, and scutchions, of the armes of England and France, vnder which hearse the corpse rested all that night, and the next daie it was brought into the new chappell, where king Henrie the seuenth lieth, and was interred there in the chappell on the north side.

Queene Marie buried.

The foure and twentith of December, being the euen of the natiuitie of our Lord, was a solemne obsequie kept in the abbeie church of Westminster, for Charles the seuenth late emperour, who departed this life in September last, the one and twentith of the same moneth, in the monasterie of S. Justus in Castile, being then of age about eight and fiftie yeares, hauing gouerned the empire before he renounced the same a six and thirtie yeares; and his kingdoms of Castile, Arragon, Naples, Sicill, and others, aboue fortie yeares.

In obsequie kept for the emperour.

Moreouer in this yeare 1558 there died two of the said emperors sisters, that went with him into Spaine, after he had resigned the empire, to wit, queene Leonor, first maried vnto Emanuell king of Portugall, and after his decease vnto the French king Francis the first of that name: she deceased in Februarie last past. His other sister Marie, queene of Hungarie, late regent of the low countries, deceased on saint Lukes daie, the eightenth of October last past. And so the one preuenting him, the other tied not long after him, in so much that king Philip did celebrate the exequies in the towne of Brusels, of his father the emperour, of his aunt Marie quæne of Hungarie, and of his wife Marie quæne of England, in this present moneth of December subsequentlie, after the most pompous and solemne manner.

On sundaie the first of Januarie, by vertue of the quænes proclamation, the English letanie was read accordinglie as was vsed in hir graces chappell in churches through the citie of London. And likewise the epistle and gospell of the daie began to be read in the same churches at masse time in the English tong, by commandement giuen by the lord maior, according to the tenour of the same proclamation published the thirtith of the last month. On thursdaie the twelfe of Januarie, the quænes maiestie removed from hir palace of Westminster by water vnto the tower of London, the lord maior and aldermen in their barge, and all the citizens with their barges decked and trimmed with targets and banners of their mysteries accordinglie attending on hir grace.

The bachellers barge of the lord maiors companie, to wit, the mercers had their barge with a foist trimmed with three tops, and artillerie aboord, gallantlie appointed to wait vpon them, shooting off lustilie as they went, with great and pleasant melodie of instruments, which plaied in most sweet and beautifull manner. Hir grace shut the bridge about two of the clocke in the after noone, at the still of the ebbe, the lord maior and the rest following after hir barge, attending the same, till hir maiestie tooke land at the priuie staires at the tower wharfe, and then she said lord maior with the other barges returned, passing through the bridge againe with the flood, and landed at the wharfe of the three cranes in the Vintrie. Vpon saturdaie, which was the fourteenth daie of Januarie, in the yeare of our Lord God 1558, about two of the clocke at after noone, the most noble and christian princesse, our most dread soueraigne ladie, Elisabeth, by the grace of God quæne of England, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. marched from the tower, to passe thorough the citie of London toward Westminster, richlie furnished, and most honourablie accompanied, as well with gentlemen, barons, and other the nobilitie of this realme, as also with a notable traine of goodlie and beautifull ladies, richlie appointed.

At hir entring the citie, she was of the people receiued marvellous intierlie, as appeared by the assemblies, prayers, wishes, welcommings, cries, tender words, and all other signes, which argued a wonderfull earnest loue of most obedient subiects towards their soueraigne. And on the other side, hir grace by holding vp hir hands, & merrie countenance to such as stood farre off, and most tender and gentle language to those that stood nigh vnto hir grace, did declare hirselfe no lesse thankefullie to receiue hir peoples good will, than they louinglie offered it vnto hir. To all that wished hir grace well, she gaue heartie thanks; & to such as had God saue hir grace, she said againe God saue them all, and thanked them with all hir hart. So that on the other side there was nothing but gladnesse, nothing but prayer, nothing but comfort. The quænes maiestie reioised maruellouslie to see that so exceedinglie she wan towards hir hir grace, which all good princes haue euer desired, I meane so earnest loue of subiects, so euidentlie declared euen to hir graces owne person, being caried in the midst of them.

The people againe were wonderfullie rauished with the louing answers and gestures of their princesse, like to the which they had before tried at hir first comming to the tower from Hatfield. This hir graces louing behauiour preconceiued in the peoples heads, vpon their considerations was then throughlie confirmed, and in deed implanted a wonderfull hope in them touching hir worthie gouernment in the rest of hir reigne. For in all hir passage she did not onelie shew hir most gratious loue toward the people in generall, but also priuatlie if the baser personages had either offered hir grace anie flowers, or such like, as a signification of their good will, or moued to hir anie suite; the most gentle, to the common reioising of all the lookers on, and priuat comfort of that partie, staied hir chariot, and heard their requests. So that if a man would saie well, he could not better tearme the citie of London that time, than a stage, wherein was shewed the wonderfull spectacle of a noble hearted princesse towards hir most louing people, and the peoples exceeding comfort in beholding so worthie a souereigne, & hearing so princelike a voice, which could not but haue set the enimie on fire, sith the vertue is in the enimie alwaie commended, much more could not but inflame hir naturall, obedient, and most louing people, whose weale leaneth onelie vpon hir grace, and hir gouernment.

Thus therefore the quænes maiestie passed from the tower, till she came to Fanchurch, the people on each side ioifullie beholding the view of so gratious a ladie their quæne, and hir grace no lesse gladlie noting and obseruing the same. Nere vnto Fanchurch was erected a scaffold richlie furnished, whereon stood a noise of instruments, and a child in costlie apparell, which was appointed to welcome the quænes maiestie in the whole cities behalfe. Against which place when hir grace came, of hir owne will she commanded the chariot to be staied, and that the noise might be appeased, till the child had vttered his welcoming oration, which he spake in English as here followeth;

O peereles souereigne queene, behold what this thy towne Hath thee presented with,
at thy first entrance heere:
Behold with how rich hope she leades thee to thy crowne, Behold with what two gifts,
she comforteth thy cheere.
The first is blessing toongs, which manie a welcome saie,
Which praie thou maist doo well, which praise thee to the skie.
Which wish to thee long life,
which blesse this happie daie,
Which to thy kingdome heapes all that in toongs can lie.
The second is true hearts, which loue thee from their root, Whose sute is triumph now,
and ruleth all the game,
Which faithfulnesse haue woone,
and all vntruth driuen out,
Which skip for ioy, when as they heare thy happie name.
Welcome therefore o queene,
as much as heart can thinke,
Welcome againe o queene,
as much as toong can tell;
Welcome to ioyous toongs,
and hearts that will not shrinke,
God thee preserue we praie, and wish thee euer well.

At which words of the last line, all the people gaue a great shout, wishing with one assent as the child had said. And the quæns maiestie thanked most heartilie both the citie for this hir gentle receiuing at the first, & also the people for confirming the same.

A scaffold set vp at Fanchurch with melodie, &c.

These verses were vttered by a child to the quæne who gaue good eare to them.

Here was noted in the quéenes maiesties countenance, during the time that the child spake, besides a perpetuall attentiuenesse in hir face, a maruellous change in loke, as the childs words either touched hir person, or the peoples tongs and hearts. So that the with reioising village did euidentlie declare that the words toke no lesse place in hir mind, than they were most heartilie pronounced by the child, as from all the hearts of hir most hearttie citizens. The same verses were talkened vp in a table vpon the scaffold, and the Latine thereof likewise in Latine verses in another table, as hereafter insueth:

The verses in Latine which the child pronounced to quéene in English.

Verbs tua quæ ingressu dederit tibi munera primo,
O regina parem non habitura, vide.
Ad, diadema tuum, te sic quam diuite mittat,
Quæ duo lætitiæ det tibi dona, vide.
Munus habes primum, linguas bona multa precantes,
Quæ te quum laudant, tum pia vota sonant,

En quibus est infracta fides, falsumq perosa,
Quæq tuo audito nomine læta salit.
Grata venis igitur, quantum cor concipit vllum,
Quantum lingua potest dicere, grata venis.
Cordibus infractis, linguisq per omnia lætis
Grata venis: salnam te velit esse Deus.

Now when the child had pronounced his oration, and the quéenes highnesse so thankefullie had receiued it, she marched forward toward Gratious street, where at the vper end before the signe of the eagle, the citie had erected a gorgeous and sumptuous arch as here followeth. A stage was made which extended from the one side of the street to the other, richlie vawted with battlements conteining three parts, and ouer the middlemost was aduanced three seuerall stages in degrées.

A great stage arched and verie sumptuous at Gratious street.

Upon the lowest stage was made one seat roiall, wherein were placed two personages, representing king Henrie the seuenth, and Elizabeth his wife, daughter of king Edward the fourth; either of these two princes sitting vnder one cloth of estate in their seates, none otherwise diuided, but that the one of them which was king Henrie the seuenth, proceeding out of the house of Lancaster, was inclosed in a red rose, and the other which was quéene Elizabeth, being heire to the house of Yorke, inclosed with a white rose, each of them roiallie crowned, and decentlie apparelled, as appertaineth to princes, with scepters in their hands, and one vawt surmounting their heads, wherein aptlie were placed two tables, each conteining the title of those two princes. And these personages were so set, that the one of them ioined hands with the other, with the ring of matrimonie perceiued on the finger. Out of the which two roses sprang two branches gathered into one, which were directed vpward to the second stage or degrée, wherein was placed one representing the valiant & noble prince king Henrie the eight, which sprang out of the former stocke, crowned with a crowne imperiall, and by him sat one representing the right worthie ladie quéene Anne, wife to the said king Henrie the eight, and mother to our most souereigne ladie quéene Elizabeth that now is, both apparelled with scepters and diadems, and other furniture due to the state of a king and quéene, and two tables surmounting their heads, wherein were written their names and titles.

The vnitie of the white rose and the red.

From their seat also proceeded vpwards one branch, directed to the third and vppermost stage or degrée, wherein likewise was planted a seat roiall, in the which was set one representing the highnes most excellent maiestie Elizabeth, now our most dread souereigne ladie, crowned and apparelled as the other princes were. Out of the fore part of this pageant was made a standing for a child, which at the quéens maiesties comming declared vnto hir the whole meaning of the said pageant. The two sides of the same were filled with lowd noises of musicke. And all emptie places thereof were furnished with sentences concerning vnitie, and the whole pageant garnished with red roses and white. And in the fore front of the same pageant, in a faire wreath, was written the name and title of the same, which was; The vniting of the two houses of Lancaster and Yorke. This pageant was grounded vpon the quéens maiesties name. For like as the long warre betweene the two houses of Yorke and Lancaster then ended, when Elizabeth daughter to Edward the fourth married in marriage with Henrie the seuenth, heire to the house of Lancaster: so euen that the quéenes maiesties name was Elizabeth, & for somuch as she is the onelie heire of Henrie the eight, which came of both the houses, as the knitting vp of concord: it was deuised, that like as Elizabeth was the first occasion of concord, so the another Elizabeth, might maintein the same among hir subiects, so that vnitie was the end whereat the whole deuise shot, as the quéenes maiesties name moued the first ground.

Vnitie the marke whereat the deuise of the pageant was directed.

The pageant now against the quéenes maiesties comming was addressed with children, representing the forenamed personages, with all furniture due vnto the setting forth of such a matter well meant, as the argument declared costlie and sumptuouslie set forth, as the beholders can beare witnesse. Now the quéenes maiestie drew nére vnto the said pageant. And for so much as the noise was great, by reason of the preasse of people, so that she could scarse heare the child which did interpret the said pageant, and hir chariot was pulled so far forwards, that she could not well view the personages representing the kings & quéenes aboue named: she required to haue the matter opened vnto hir, and what they signified, with the end of vnitie and ground of hir name, according as is before expressed. For the sight whereof hir grace caused hir chariot to be remoued backe, and yet perdie could she se, because the children were set somewhat with the hir their in. But after that hir grace had vnderstood the meaning thereof, she thanked the citie, praised the faithfulnesse of the worke, and promised that she would do hir whole indeuor for the continuall preseruation of concord, as the pageant did import. The child appointed in the standing aboue named, to open the meaning of the said pageant, spake these words vnto hir grace:

The queen is desirous to know the meaning of euerie representation.

Whitte the end whereat the deuise of the pageant was directed.

These verses and other prætie sentences were drawen in void places of this pageant, all tending to one end, that quietnes might be mainteined, and all dissention displaced: and that by the quénes maiestie heire to agreement, and agreeing in name with hir, which tofore had ioined those houses, which had béene the occasion of much debate and ciuill war within this realme, as maie appéere to such as will search chronicles, but be not to be touched herein; onelie declaring hir graces passage through the citie, and what prouision the citie made therefore. And yet the quénes maiestie came within hearing of this pageant, she sent certeine as also at all the other pageants, to require the people to be silent. For hir maiestie was disposed to heare all that should be said vnto hir.

The quéne is desirous to know the meaning of euerie representation.

When the quénes maiestie had heard the childs oration, and vnderstood the meaning of the pageant at large, she marched forward to ward Cornehill, alwaie receiued with like reioising of the people. And there as hir grace palled by the conduit, which was curiouslie trimmed against that same time, with rich banners adorned, and a noise of lowd instruments vpon the top thereof, she spied the second pageant. And bicause she feared for the peoples noise, that she should not heare the child which did expound the same, she inquired what that pageant was yet that she came to it; and there vnderstood, that there was a child representing hir maiesties person, placed in a seat of gouernement, supported by certeine vertues which suppressed their contrarie vices vnder their feet, and so forth, as in the description of the said pageant shall hereafter appere.

In the front of the same pageant was written the name and title thereof, which is, The seat of worthie gouernance. Which seat was made in such artificiall maner, as to the appearance of the lookers on, the fore part seemed to haue no staie, & therefore of force was staied by liuelie personages, which personages were in number foure, standing and staieng the fore front of the same seat roiall, each hauing his face to the quéene and people, whereof euerie one had a table to expresse their effects, which are vertues, namelie Pure religion, Loue of subiects, Wisedome and Iustice, which did tread their contrarie vices vnder their feet, that is to wit; Pure religion did tread vpon Superstition and Ignorance, Loue of subiects did tread vpon Rebellion and Insolencie, Wisedome did tread vpon Follie and Vaine glorie, Iustice did tread vpon Adulation and Briberie. Each of these personages according to their proper names and properties, had not onelie their names in plaine and perfect writing set vpon their breasts easilie to be read of all: but also euerie of them was aptlie and properlie apparelled, so that his apparell and name did agree to expresse the same person, that in title he represented.

A proper moorall.

This part of the pageant was thus appointed and furnished. The two sides ouer the two side parts had in them placed a noise of instruments, which immediatlie after the childs speech, gaue an heauenlie melodie. Vpon the top or vpermost part of the said pageant, stood the armes of England, roiallie purtraitured with the proper beasts to vphold the same. One representing the quénes highnesse sat in this seat crowned with an imperiall crowne, and before hir seat was a conuenient place appointed for one child, which did interpret and applie the said pageant, as hereafter shall be declared. Euerie void place was furnished with proper sentences, commending the seat supported by vertues, and defacing the vices, to the vtter extirpation of rebellion, and to euerlasting continuance of quietnesse and peace. The quénes maiestie approching nigh vnto this pageant thus beautified and furnished in all points, caused hir charriot to be drawne nigh thereunto, that hir grace might heare the childs short oration, which was this:

How the pageant was appointed and furnished.

The quéene draweth néere the pagent to heare the childs oration.

While that religion true, shall ignorance suppresse,
And with hir weightie foot,
breake superstitions head:
While loue of subiects shall rebellion distresse,
And with zeale to the prince,
insolencie downe tread.
While iustice flattering tongs,
and briberie can deface,
While follie and vaine glorie, to wisedome yeeld their hands:
So long shall gouernment not swarue from hir right race, But wrong decaieth still,
and right wisenesse vp stands.
Now all thy subiects hearts,
o prince of peerelesse fame,
Do trust these vertues shall maintaine vp thy throne:
And vice be kept downe still,
the wicked put to shame,
That good with good may ioy, and naught with naught may mone.

Which verses were painted vpon the right side of the same pageant, and the Latine thereof on the left side in another table, which were these here insuing:

The same verses in Latine painted on a table.

Quæ subnixa abit solio regina superbo est,
Effigiem sanctæ principis alma refert,
Quam ciuilis amor fulcit, sapientia firmat,
Iustitia illustrat, religioque beat,
Vana superstitio & crassa ignorantia frontis
Pressæ sub pura religione iacent.
Regis amor domat efferos animosque rebelles,
Iustus adulantes dominorosque terret.
Cum regit imperium sapiens, sine luce sedebunt
Stultitia, atque hæres numen inane honor.

Beside these verses, there were placed in euerie void roome of the pagent, both in English & Latine, such sentences as aduanced the seat of gouernance vpholden by vertue. The ground of this pageant was, that like as by vertues (which do abundantlie appeare in hir grace) the quænes maiestie was established in the seat of gouernment: so she should sit fast in the same, so long as she imbraced vertue, and held vice vnder foot. For if vice once got vp the head, it would put the seat of gouernement in perill of falling.

The ground or morall of the pageant.

The quænes maiestie when she had heard the child, and vnderstood the pageant at full, gaue the citie also thanks therefore, & most gratiouslie promised hir good indeuor for the maintenance of the said vertues, and suppression of vices, and so marched on, till she came against the great conduit in Cheape, which was beautified with pictures and sentences accordinglie, against hir graces comming thither. Against Soper lane end was ertended from the one side of the street to the other, a pageant which had three gates all open: ouer the middlemost whereof were erected three seuerall stages, whereon sat eight children, as hereafter followeth. On the vppermost one child, on the middle three, on the lowest foure, each hauing the proper name of the blessing that they did represent, written in a table, & placed aboue their head.

The quænes promise with thanks to the citie.

A pageant at Soper lane end.

In the forefront of this pageant, before the children which did represent the blessings, was a conuenient standing cast out for a child to stand, which did expound the said pageant vnto the quænes maiestie, as was done in the other before. Euerie of these children were appointed and apparelled, according vnto the blessing which he did represent. And on the fore part of the said pageant was written in faire letters the name of the foresaid pageant in this manner:

The inscription fixed or set vpon the front of the said pageant.

The eight beatitudes expressed in the fift chapter of the gospell of saint Matthew, applied to our souereigne ladie quæne Elisabeth.

Ouer the two side posts was placed a noise of instruments. And all the void places in the pageant were furnished with prettie saiengs, commending & touching the meaning of the said pageant, which was the promises & blessings of almightie God, made to his people. Before that the quænes highnesse came vnto this pageant, she required the matter somwhat to be opened vnto hir, that hir grace might the better vnderstand, what should afterward by the child be said vnto hir. Which so was, that the citie had there erected the pageant with eight children, representing the eight blessings touched in the fift chapter of saint Matthew. Whereof euerie one vpon iust considerations, was applied vnto hir highnesse, and that the people thereby put hir grace in mind, that as hir good doings before had giuen iust occasion, why that these blessings might fall vpon hir, that so if hir grace did continue in hir goodnesse as she had entered, she should hope for the fruit of these promises due vnto them that do exercise themselues in the blessings: which hir grace heard maruellous gratiouslie, and required that the charriot might be remoued towards the pageant, that she might better perceiue the childs words, which were these, the quænes maiestie giuing most attentiue eare, and requiring that the peoples noise might be staid. The verses were as follow:

The meaning of the pageant.

The quæne giueth attentiue eare to the childs words.

Thou hast beene eight times blest,
O queene of worthie fame,
By meekenesse of thy spirit,
when care did thee beset,
By mourning in thy griefe,
by mildnesse in thy blame,
By hunger and by thirst,
and iustice couldst none get.
By mercie shewd, not felt,
by cleannesse of thine heart,
By seeking peace alwaies,
by persecution wrong.
Therefore trust thou in God,
sith he hath helpt thy smart,
That as his promise is,
so he will make thee strong.

When these words were spoken, all the people wished, that as the child had vttered, so God would strengthen hir grace against all hir aduersaries, whome the quænes maiestie did most gentlie thanke for their so louing wish. These verses were painted on the left side of the said pageant, and other in Latine on the other side, which were these here insuing:

A consent on all sides of prince, people, and children.

Qui lugent hilares fient, qui mitia gestant
Pectora, multa soli iugera culta metent:
Iustitiam esuriens sitiénsue replebitur: ipsum
Fas hominis puro corde videre Deum:
Quem alterius miseret, Dominus miserebitur huius:
Pacificus quisquis, filius ille Dei est:
Propter iustitiam quisquis patietur habétque
Demissam mentem cælica regna capit.
Huic hominum generi terram, mare, sidera, vouit
Omnipotens, horum quisque beatus erit.

Besides these, euerie void place in the pageant was furnished with sentences touching the matter and ground of the said pageant. When all that was to be said in this pageant was ended, the quænes maiestie passed on forwards in Cheapside. At the standard in Cheape, which was dressed faire against the time, was placed a noise of trumpets, with banners and other furniture. The crosse likewise was also made faire, and well trimmed. And nere vnto the same, vpon the porch of saint Peters church doore, stood the waits of the citie, which did giue a pleasant noise with their instruments, as the quænes maiestie did passe by, which on euerie side cast hir countenance, and wished well to all hir most louing people.

The standard and crosse in Cheape adorned and trimmed.

Some after that hir grace passed the crosse, she had espied the pageant erected at the little conduit in Cheape, and incontinent required to know what it might signifie. And it was told hir grace, that there was placed Time. Time, quoth she: And time hath brought me hither. And so forth the whole matter was opened to hir grace, as hereafter shall be declared in the description of the pageant.

A pageant erected at the little conduit in Cheape.

But in the opening, when hir grace vnderstood that the bible in English should be deliuered vnto hir by Truth, which was therein represented by a child: she thanked the citie for that gift, and said, that she would oftentimes read ouer that booke, commanding sir Iohn Portrat, one of the knights which held vp hir canopie, to go before, and to receiue the booke. But learning that it should be deliuered vnto hir grace downe by a silken lace, she caused him to stale, and so passed forward till she came against the alderman in the high end of Cheape before the little conduit, where the companies of the citie ended, which began at Fanchurch, & stood along the streets, one by an other inclosed with railes, hanged with cloths, and themselues well apparelled with mvnie rich rich furres, and their liuerie hoods vpon their ſhoulders in comelis and ſeemelie maner, hauing before them ſundrie perſons well apparelled in ſilks and chains of gold: as wiflers and gardes of the ſaid companies, beſides a number of rich hangings, as well of tapiſtrie, arras, cloths of gold, ſiluer, veluet, damaſke, ſattin, and other ſilks plentifullie hanged all the waie, as the queenes highneſſe paſſed from the tower thorough the citie.

The quæne promiseth the citie often to read ouer the bible.

The ſeuerall companies of the citie ſhewed their ioifull hearts at the queenes comming.

Out at the windowes and penthouſes of euerie houſe did hang a number of rich and coſtlie banners and ſtremers, till hir grace came to the vpper end of Cheape. Where by appointment, the right worſhipfull maſter Randulph Cholmelie recorder of the citie, preſented to the quéenes maieſtie a purſſe of crimſon ſattin, richlie wrought with gold, wherein the citie gaue vnto the quéens maieſtie a thouſand marks in gold, as maſter recorder did declare briefelie vnto the quéens maieſtie, whoſe words tended to this end; that the lord maior, his brethren, and communaltie of the citie, to declare their gladneſſe and goodwill towards the quéenes maieſtie, did preſent hir grace with that gold, deſiring hir grace to continue their good and gratious queene, and not to eſteeme the value of the gift, but the mind of the giuers. The quéens maieſtie with both hir hands toke the purſſe, and anſwered to him againe maruellous pithilie; and ſo pithilie, that the ſtanders by, as they imbraced intirelie hir gratious anſwer, ſo they maruelled at the couching thereof, which was in words truelie reported theſe. I thanke my lord maior, his brethren, and you all. And whereas your requeſt is that I ſhould continue your good ladie and quéene, be yée aſſured, that I will be as good vnto you, as euer quéene was to hir people. No will in me can lacke, neither doo I truſt ſhall there lacke ante power. And perſuade your ſelues, that for the ſafetie and quietneſſe of you all, I will not ſpare (if néed be) to ſpend my bloud. God thanke you all. Which anſwer of ſo noble an hearted princeſſe, if it moued a maruellous ſhout & reioiſſing, it is nothing to be maruelled at, ſith both the haltineſſe thereof was ſo wonderfull, and the words ſo ſointlie knit.

The verie words of the quéene directed to the lord maior, &c.

When hir grace had thus anſwered the recorder, ſhe marched toward the little conduit, where was erected a pageant with ſquare proportion, ſtanding directlie before the ſame conduit, with battlements accordinglie. And in the ſame pageant was aduanced two hilles or mounteins of conuenient height. The one of them being on the north ſide of the ſame pageant, was made cragged, barren, and ſtonie, in the which was erected one tree, artificiallie made, all withered and dead, with branches accordinglie. And vnder the ſame tree at the foot thereof ſat one in homelie and rude apparrell crokedlie, and in mourning maner, hauing ouer his head in a table, written in Latine and Engliſh, his name which was Ruinoſa reſpublica, A decaied commonweale. And vpon the ſame withered tree were fixed certeine tables, wherein were written proper ſentences, expreſſing the cauſes of the decaie of a commonweale. The other hill on the ſouth ſide was made faire, freſh, greene and beautifull, the ground thereof full of floures and beautie, and on the ſame was erected alſo one tree, verie freſh and faire, vnder the which ſtood vpright one freſh perſonage well apparelled and appointed, whoſe name alſo was written both in Engliſh and Latine, which was, Reſpublica bene inſtituta, A flouriſhing commonweale.

A pageant of a ſquare proportion, and what things the ſame had repreſented in it.

Reſpublica ruinoſa.

Reſpublica bene inſtituta.

And vpon the ſame tree alſo were fixed certeine tables conteining ſentences, which expreſſed the cauſes of a flouriſhing commonweale. In the middle betweene the ſaid hils, was made artificiallie one hollow place or caue, with doore and locke incloſed, out of the which, a little before the quéenes highneſſe comming thither, iſſued one perſonage, whoſe name was Time, apparelled as an old man, with a ſieth in his hand, hauing wings artificiallie made, leading a perſonage of leſſer ſtature than himſelfe, which was finelie and well apparrelled, all clad in white ſilke, and directlie ouer hir head was ſet hir name and title in Latine and Engliſh, Temporis filia, The daughter of Time. Which two ſo appointed, went forwards toward the ſouth ſide of the pageant. And on hir breſt was written hir proper name, which was Veritas, Truth, who held a booke in hir hand, vpon the which was written Verbum veritatis, The word of truth. And out of the ſouth ſide of the pageant was caſt a ſtanding for a child, which ſhould interpret the ſame pageant. Againſt whome when the quéenes maieſtie came, he ſpake vnto hir grace theſe ſweet words:

Veritas temporis filia, expounded to the quéene.

The interpretation of the pageant deliuered in ſpéech to the quéene by a child.

This old man with the ſieth, old father Time they call,
And hir his daughter Truth, which holdeth yonder booke:
Whome he out of his rocke, hath brought forth to vs all,
From whence this manie yeares ſhe durſt not once out looke.
The ruthfull wight that ſits vnder the barren tree, Reſembleth to vs the forme,
when common weales decaie:
But when they be in ſtate triumphant, you may ſee
By him in freſh attire, that ſits vnder the baie.
Now ſith that Time againe, his daughter Truth hath brought,
We truſt ô worthie queene,
thou wilt this truth imbrace,
And ſith thou vnderſtandſt,
the good eſtate and naught,
We truſt wealth thou wilt plant, and barrennes diſplace.
But for to heale the ſore,
and cure that is not ſeene,
Which thing the booke of truth, doth teach in writing plaine:
Shee doth preſent to thee
the ſame, ô worthie queene,
For that, that words doo flie,
but written doth remaine.

When the child had thus ended his ſpéech, he reached his booke towards the quéenes maieſtie, which a little before Truth had let downe vnto him from the hill, which by ſir John Parrat was receiued, and deliuered vnto the quéene. But ſhée as ſoone as ſhe had receiued the booke, kiſſed it, and with both hir hands held vp the ſame, and ſo laid it vpon hir breſt, with great thanks to the citie therefore: and ſo went forward towards Paules churchyard. The former matter which was rehearſed vnto the quéenes maieſtie, was written in two tables, on either ſide the pageant eight verſes, and in the middeſt, theſe in Latine:

The quéene receiueth Verbum Dei, kiſſeth it, and laieth it in hir lap.

Ille, vides falcem læua qui ſuſtinet vncam,
Tempus is eſt, cui ſtat filia vera comes:
Hanc pater exeſa deductam rupe reponit
In lucem, quam non viderat antè diu.
Qui ſedet à læua cultu malè triſtis inepto
Quem durùs creſcens cantibus orbis obit,
Nos monet effigie quæ ſit reſpublica, quando
Corruit, at contra quando beata viget.
Ille docet iuuenis forma ſpectandus, amictu
Scitus, & æterna laurea fronde virens.

The ſentences written in Latine and Engliſh vpon both the trées, declaring the cauſes of both eſtates, and firſt of a ruinous commonweale were theſe:

theſe: Want of Gods feare, diſobedience to rulers, blindneſſe of guides, briberie in magiſtrats, rebellion in ſubiects, ciuill diſcord, flattering of princes, vnmercifulneſſe in rulers, vnthankefulneſſe in ſubiects. Cauſes of a flouriſhing commonweale are theſe: Feare of God, a wiſe prince, learned rulers, obedience to officers, obedient ſubiects, louers of the commonweale, vertue rewarded, vice chaſtened.

The meaning in briefe of this pagent.

The matter of this pageant dependeth of them that went before. For as the firſt declared hir grace to come out of the houſe of vnitie, the ſecond that ſhe is placed in the ſeat of gouernement ſtaid with vertues, to the ſuppreſſion of vices; and therefore in the third, the eight bleſſings of almightie God might well be applied vnto hir: ſo this fourth now is, to put hir grace in remembrance of the ſtate of the commonweale, which Time with Truth his daughter doth reueale: which Truth alſo hir grace hath receiued, and therefore cannot but be mercifull and carefull for the good gouernement thereof. From thence, the queenes maieſtie paſſed toward Paules churchyard, and when ſhe came ouer againſt Paules ſchole, a child appointed by the ſchoolemaiſter thereof, pronounced a certeine oration in Latine, and certeine verſes, which alſo were there written as followeth:

A ſcholer of Paules vttereth an oration in Latine to the queene.

Which the queenes maieſtie moſt attentiuelie hearkened vnto. And when the child had pronounced, he did kiſſe the oration which he had there faire written in paper, and deliuered it vnto the queenes maieſtie, which moſt gentlie receiued the ſame. And when the queenes maieſtie had heard all that was there offered to be ſpoken, then hir grace marched toward Ludgate, where ſhe was receiued with a noiſe of inſtruments, the fore front of the gate being finelie trimmed vp againſt hir maieſties comming. From thence by the way as ſhe went downe toward Flæt-bridge, one about hir grace noted the cities charge, that there was no coſt ſpared. Hir grace anſwered, that ſhe did well conſider the ſame, and that it ſhould be remembred. An honorable anſwer, worthie a noble prince, which may comfort all hir ſubiects, conſidering that there can be no point of gentleneſſe, or obedient loue ſhewed towards hir grace, which ſhe doth not moſt tenderlie accept, and gratiouſlie weie. In this maner, the people on euerie ſide reioiſing, hir grace went forward towards the conduit in Flætſtreet, where was the fift and laſt pageant erected in forme following.

The queenes maieſtie conſidered the cities charge.

From the conduit, which was beautified with painting, vnto the northſide of the ſtreet was erected a ſtage, imbatteled with foure towers, and in the ſame a ſquare plat riſing with degrees; and vpon the vppermoſt degree was placed a chaire, or ſeat roiall, and behind the ſame ſeat, in curious artificiall maner was erected a tree of reaſonable heigth, and ſo farre aduanced aboue the ſeat, as it did well and ſemelie ſhadow the ſame, without indamaging the ſight of anie part of the pageant: and the ſame tree was beautified with leaues as greene as art could deuiſe, being of a conuenient greatneſſe, and conteining thereupon the fruit of the date. And on the top of the ſame tree in a table was ſet the name thereof, which was a palme tree, and in the aforeſaid ſeat or chaire was placed * a ſeemelie and meet perſonage richlie apparelled in parlement robes, with a ſcepter in hir hand, as a queene, crowned with an open crowne, whoſe name and title was in a table fixed ouer hir head, in this ſort: Deboza the iudge and reſtorer of the houſe of Iſraell: Iudic. 4. And the other degrees on either ſide were furniſhed with ſir perſonages, two repreſenting the nobilitie, two the cleargie, & two the communaltie. And before theſe perſonages was written in a table: Deboza with hir eſtats conſulting for the good gouernment of Iſraell. At the feet of theſe, and the loweſt part of the pageant was ordeined a conuenient rome for a child to open the meaning of the pageant. When the queenes maieſtie drew neare vnto this pageant, and perceiued, as in the other, the child readie to ſpeake; hir grace required ſilence, and commanded hir chariot to be remoued nigher, that ſhe might plainlie heare the child ſpeake, which ſaid as hereafter followeth:

Which verses were written vpon the pageant, & the same in Latin also fixed in the face of the people:

Quando Dei populum Canaan, rex pressit Iaben, Mittitur à magno Debora magna Deo:
Quæ populum eriperet, sanctum seruaret Iudan,
Militè quæ patrio frangeret hostis opes.
Hæc Domino mandante Deo lectissima fecit

Hæc quater denos populum correxerat annos

Sic, ô sic populum bellóque & pace guberna,

The void places of this pageant were filled with prettie sentences concerning the same matter. The ground of this last pageant was, that for somuch as the next pageant before had set before hir graces eies the flourishing and desolate states of a commonweale, she might by this be put in remembrance to consult for the worthie gouernement of hir people, considering God oftentimes sent women noblie to rule among men, as Debora, which gouerned Israell in peace the space of fortie yeares: and that it behoueth both men and women so ruling to vse aduise of gods councell. When the queenes maiestie had passed this pageant, she marched toward Temple bar. But at S. Dunstans church, where the children of the hospitall were appointed to stand with their gouernors, hir grace perceiuing a child offered to make an oration vnto hir, staied hir chariot, and did cast vp hir eies to heauen, as who should saie; I here see this mercifull worke toward the poore, whome I must in the middest of my roialtie needs remember: and so turned hir face toward the child, which in Latine pronounced an oration to this effect: That after the queenes highnesse had passed through the citie, and had seene so sumptuous, rich, and notable spectacles of the citizens, which declared their most hartie receiuing, and solous welcomming of hir grace into the same: this one spectacle yet rested and remained, which was the euerlasting spectacle of mercie vnto the poore members of almightie God, furthered by that famous and most noble prince king Henrie the eight hir graces father, erected by the citie of London, & aduanced by the most godlie & vertuous prince king Edward the first, hir graces deare and louing brother, doubting nothing of the mercie of the queenes most gratious clemencie, by the which they may not onelie be relieued and helped, but also stated and defended: and therefore incessantlie they would praie and crie vnto almightie God, for the long life and reigne of hir highnesse, with most prosperous victorie against hir enimies.

The child after he had ended his oration, kissed the paper wherein the same was written, & reached it to the queenes maiestie, which receiued it gratiouslie, both with words and countenance, declaring hir gratious mind toward their reliefe. From thence hir grace came to Temple bar, which was dressed finelie with the two images of Gogmagog the Albion, & Corineus the Briton, two giants, big in stature, furnished accordinglie, which held in their hands aboue the gate, a table, wherein was written in Latine verses the effect of all the pageant which the citie before had erected, which verses were these insuing:

Ecce sub aspectu iam contemplaberis vno
(O princeps populi sola columna tui)
Quicquid in immensa passim perspexeris vrbe,
Quæ cepere omnes vnus hic arcus habet.
Primus te solio regni donauit auiti,

Quæ florens staret te docuere tui.
Quinto magna loco monuit te Debora, missam

Quinque arcus quam significationem implicitam teneant.

Which verses were also written in English méeter, in a lesse table as hereafter plainelie followeth:

Behold here in one view, thou maist see all that plaine,
O princesse vnto this thy people th'onlie staie:
What eachwhere thou hast seene in this wide towne, againe,
This one arch whatsoeuer
the rest conteind, doth saie.
The first arch as true heire vnto thy father deere,
Did set thee in thy throne where thy grandfather sat.
The second did confirme thy seat as princesse heere, Vertues now bearing swaie, and vices bet downe flat.
The third, if that thou wouldst go on as thou began, Declared thee to be blessed on euerie side.
The fourth did open truth, and also taught thee whan
The commonweale stood well, and when it did thence slide.
The fift, as Debora declard thee to be sent From heauen, a long comfort to vs thy subiects all.
Therefore go on ô queene,
on whom our hope is bent,
And take with thee this wish of thy towne as finall.
Liue long, and as long reigne,
adorning thy countrie
With vertues, and mainteine thy peoples hope of thee.
For thus, thus heauen is woone, thus must thou perse the skie,
This is by vertue wrought, all other needs must die.

On the southside was appointed by the citie a noise of singing children, and one child richlie attired as a poet, which gaue the queenes maiestie hir farewell in the name of the whole citie, by these sweet words:

As at thine entrance first,
ô prince of high renowne, Thou wast presented with toongs and hearts for thy faier:

So now sith thou must needs depart out of this towne,
This citie sendeth thee
firme hope and earnest praier.
For all men hope in thee,
that all vertues shalt raine,
For all men hope that thou
none error wilt support,
For all men hope that thou wilt truth restore againe,
And mend that is amisse,
to all good mens comfort.
And for this hope they praie,
thou maist continue long,
Our queene amongst vs here,
all vice for to supplant,
And for this hope they praie,
that God maie make thee strong,
As by his grace puissant,
So in his truth constant.
Farewell ô worthie queene,
and as our hope is sure,
That into errors place,
thou wilt now truth restore:
So trust we that thou wilt our souereigne queene endure,
And louing ladie stand,
from henceforth euermore.

While these words were in saieng, and certeine wishes therein repeated for maintenance of truth, and roting out of errour, she now and then held vp hir hands towards heauen, and willed the people to saie, Amen. When the child had ended, she said; Be ye well assured I shall stand your good queene. At which saieng, hir grace departed forth through Templebarre toward Westminster, with no lesse showting and crieng of the people, than she entered the citie with a noise of ordinance which the tower shot off at hir graces enterance first into Towerstreet. The childs saieng was also in Latine verses written in a table verie faire which was hanged vp there:

The last words of the queene to the citie by waie of promise.

Carmen valedictorium a puero recitatum.

O regina potens, quum primam vrbem ingredereris,
Dona tibi linguas fidáq; corda dedit.
Discedenti etiam tibi nunc duo munera mittit,
Omnia plena spei, votáq; plena precum.
Quippe tuis spes est in te, quod prouida virtus
Rexerit, seruare nec locus vllus erit.
Quippe tuis spes est, quod tu verum omni reduces Solatura bonas, dum mala tollis, opes.
Hac spe freti orant, longum vt regina gubernes,
Et regni excindas crimina cuncta tui.
Hac spe freti orant, diuina vt gratia fortem
Et veræ fidei te velit esse basin.
Iam regina vale, & sicut nos spes tenet vna,
Quod vero inducto, perditus error erit:
Sic quóq; speramus quòd eris regina benigna
Nobis per regni tempora longa tui.

Thus the queenes highnesse passed through the citie, which without anie forreigne person, of it selfe beautified it selfe, and receiued hir grace at all places as hath beene before mentioned, with most tender obedience and loue, due to so gratious a queene and soueraigne a ladie. And hir grace likewise of hir side in all hir graces passage, shewed hir selfe generallie an image of a worthie ladie and gouernour. But priuatlie these especiall points were noted in hir grace, as signes of a most princelike courage, whereby hir louing subiects maie ground a sure hope for the rest of hir gratious doings hereafter.

Certein notes of the queenes maiesties great mercie,

About the nether end of Cornehill toward Cheape, one of the knights about hir grace had espied an ancient citizen, which wept, and turned his head backe, and therewith said this gentleman; Ponder is an alderman (for so he tearmed him) which weepeth, and turneth his face backeward; how maie it be interpreted that he so doth, for sorrow, or for gladnesse? The queens maiestie heard him, and said, I warrant you it is for gladnesse. A gratious interpretation of a noble courage, which would turne the doubtfull to the best. And yet it was well knowne, that as hir grace did confirme the same, the parties cheare was moued for verie pure gladnesse for the sight of hir maiesties person, at the beholding whereof he take such comfort, that with teares he expressed the same. In Cheape side hir grace smiled, and being thereof demanded the cause, answered, for that she heard one saie; Remember old king Henrie the eight. A naturall child, which at the verie remembrance of hir fathers name, toke so great a ioy, that all men maie well thinke, that as she reioised at his name whome this realme doth hold of so worthie memorie: so in hir doings she will resemble the same.

Of one that wept for ioy and turned gladnesse.

When the cities charge without partialitie, and onelie the citie was mentioned vnto hir grace, she said it should not be forgotten. Which saieng might moue all naturall Englishmen hartilie to shew due obedience, and intiernesse to their so good a queene, which will in no point forget anie parcell of dutie louinglie shewed vnto hir. The answer which hir grace made vnto maister recorder of London, as the hearers know it to be true, & with melting hearts heard the same; so maie the reader thereof conceiue what kind of stomach and courage pronounced the same. What more famous thing do we read in ancient histories of old time, than that mightie princes haue gentlie receiued presents offered them by base and low personages. If that be to be wondered at (as it is paslinglie) let me see anie writer that in anie princes life is able to recount so manie presidents of this vertue, as hir grace shewed in that one passage thorough the citie.

The humblenesse of the queene intertaining base trifles of the poore subiect thankefullie.

How manie nosegales did hir grace receiue at poore women's hands? How oftentimes staid she hir chariot, when she saw anie simple bodie offer to speake to hir grace? A branch of rosemarie giuen hir grace with a supplication by a poore woman about Fleetbridge, was seene in hir chariot till hir grace came to Westminster, not without the maruellous wondering of such as knew the presenter, and noted the queens most gratious receiuing and keeping the same. What hope the poore and needie maie take for at hir graces hand, she as in all hir iournie continuallie, so in hir hearkening to the poore children of Christs hospitall with eies cast vp into heauen, did fullie declare: as that neither the wealthier estate could stand without consideration had to the pouertie, neither the pouertie be dulie considered, vnlesse they were remembred, as commended vnto vs by Gods owne mouth.

"where hir mind then was no doubt in heauen vpon God

As at hir first entrance she as it were declared hir selfe prepared to passe through a citie that most interlie loued hir: so she at hir last departing as it were bound hir selfe by promise, to continue good ladie and gouernor vnto that citie, which by outward declaration did open their loue vnto their so louing and noble prince, in such wise, as she hir selfe wondered thereat. But because princes be set in their seat by Gods appointing, and therefore they must first and chiefle tender the glorie of him, from whom their glorie issueth: it is to be noted in hir grace, that for somuch as God hath so wonderfullie placed hir in the seat of gouernement ouer this realme, she in all hir doings doth shew hir selfe most mindfull of his goodnesse & mercie shewed vnto hir. And among all other, two principall signes thereof were noted in this passage. First in the tower, where hir grace before she entred hir chariot, lifted vp hir eies to heauen, and said as followeth.

The queenes maiestie is not forgetfull to glorifie God who glorifieth hir.

The

The praier of queene Elisabeth as she went to hir coronation.

O Lord almightie and euerlasting God, I giue thee most hartie thanks, that thou hast beene so mercifull vnto me, as to spare me to behold this ioifull date. And I acknowledge that thou hast delt as wonderfullie and as mercifullie with me, as thou didst with thy true and faithfull seruant Daniell thy prophet, whome thou deliueredst out of the den from the crueltie of the greedie and raging lions: euen so was I ouerwhelmed, and onlie by thee deliuered. To thee therefore onlie be thankes, honor, and praise, for euer; Amen.

The second was the receiuing of the bible at the litle conduit in Cheape. For when hir grace had learned that the bible in English should there be offered, she thanked the citie therefore, promised the reading thereof most diligentlie, and incontinent commanded that it should be brought. At the receipt whereof, how reuerendlie did she with both hir hands take it, kisse it, and laie it vpon hir brest, to the great comfort of the lokers on? God will vndoubtedlie preserue so worthie a prince, which at his honor so reuerendlie taketh his beginning. For this saieng is true, and written in the book of truth; He that first seeketh the kingdome of God, shall haue all other things cast vnto him. Now therefore all English hearts, and hir naturall people must needs praise Gods mercie, which hath sent them so worthie a prince, and praie for hir graces long continuance amongst vs. On sundaie the fiue and twentith of Januarie, hir maiestie was with great solemnitie crowned at Westminster in the abbeie church there, by doctor Oglethorpe bishop of Carleill. She dined in Westminster hall, which was richlie hung, and euerie thing ordered in such rotall maner, as to such a regall and most solemne feast apertained.

In the meane time, whilest hir grace sat at dinner, sir Edward Dimmocke knight, hir champion by office, came riding into the hall in faire complet armor, mounted vpon a beautifull courser, richlie trapped in cloth of gold, entred the hall, and in the midst thereof cast downe his gantlet: with offer to fight with him in hir quarell, that should denie hir to be the righteous and lawfull queene of this realme. The queene taking a cup of gold full of wine, dranke to him thereof, and sent it to him for his fee, together with the couer.

Now after this, at the serning vp of the wafers, the lord maior of London went to the cupbord, and filling a cup of gold with ipocrasse, bare it to the queene: and kneeling before hir tooke the assaie, and she receiuing it of him, and drinking of it, gaue the cup with the couer vnto the said lord maior for his fee, which cup and couer weied sixteene ounces Troie weight. Finallie, this feast being celebrated with all rotall ceremonies, and high solemnities, due and in like cases accustomed, tooke end with great ioy and contentation to all the beholders. On wednesdaie the fiue and twentith of Januarie the parlement began, the queenes maiestie riding in hir parlement robes, from hir palace of Whitehall, vnto the abbeie church of Westminster, with the lords spirituall and temporall, attending hir likewise in their parlement robes. Doctor Cox sometime schoolemaister to king Edward the first, and now latelie returned from the parties of beyond the seas, where during the daies of queene Marie he had liued as a banished man, preached now before the estates there assembled in the beginning of the said parlement. John Stow.

In this parlement the first fruits and tenths were restored to the crowne, & also the supreame gouernment ouer the state ecclesiasticall, which queene Marie had giuen to the pope. Likewise the booke of common praier and administration of the sacraments in our mother tong was restored. The first fruits and tenths restored to the crowne.

But before this good worke was agreed vpon, there was much debating about matters touching religion, and great studie on both parties imploied, the one to retaine still, the other to impugne the doctrine and faction which before in queene Maries time had beene established. But speciallie here is to be noted, that though there lacked no industrie on the papists side, to hold fast that which they most cruellie from time to time had studied, and by all meanes practised to come by; yet notwithstanding, such was the prouidence of God at that time, that for lacke of the other bishops, whom the Lord had taken awaie by death a little before, the resdue that there were left could do the lesse: and in verie deed, God be praised therefore, did nothing at all in effect; although yet notwithstanding there lacked in them neither will nor labor to do what they could, if their cruell abilitie there might haue serued. But namelie amongst all others, not onelie the industrious courage of doctor Storie, but also his words in this parlement are worthie to be knowne of posteritie, who like a stout and furious champion of the popes side, to declare himselfe how lustie he was, and what he had, and would do in his maisters quarell, shamed not openlie in the said parlement house to burst out into such impudent sort of words, as was wonder to all good eares to heare, and no lesse worthie of historie. Abr. Fl. ex Iohan. Foxi martyrologio. Doctor Storie impudent and sawcie.

The summe of which his shameles talke was vttered to this effect. First beginning with himselfe, he declared, that whereas he was noted commonlie abroad, and much complained of, to haue beene a great doer, & a setter forth of such religion, orders, & proceedings, as of his late soueraigne that dead is queene Marie were set forth in this relme, he denied nothing the same: protesting moreouer that he had done nothing therein, but that both his conscience did lead him thereunto, and also his commission did as well then command him, as now also both discharge him for the same: being no lesse readie now also to do the like, and more, in case he by this queene were authorized likewise, and commanded thereunto. Wherefore as I see (saith he) nothing to be ashamed of; so lesse I see to be sorie for: but rather said that he was sorie for this, because he had done no more than he did, and that in executing those lawes, they had not beene more vehement & seuere. Wherein he said, there was no default in him, but in them whome he both oft and earnestlie had exhorted to the same, being therefore not a little greeued with them, for that they labored onelie about the twig and little sprigs and twigs, while they should haue stroken at the rot, and cleane haue roted it out: &c. And concerning his persecuting and burning them, he denied not, but that he was once at the burning of an earewig (for so he termed it) at Vrbridge, where he tost a fagot at his face as he was singing psalmes, and set a wispe full of thorns vnder his feet, a little to pricke him, with manie other words of like effect. In the which words he named moreouer sir Philip Hobbie, and an other knight of Kent, with such other of the richer and higher degree, whome his counsell was to pluck at, & to bring them vnder Coram; wherein (said he) if they had followed my aduise, they had they done well and wiselie. clemencie, and wisdome vttered in this speech.

if by great sute made to the councell by the lord maior of London, he had not beene pardoned and released out of prison. This penance was assigned to him by the queenes owne appointment, when to hir grace his trespasse was revealed. Whereby she gaue a taste to the people of a zealous mind to haue iustice dulie ministred, and faults accordinglie punished, namelie of those which vnder pretense of hir graces authoritie should go about to wrong and oppresse hir loving subiects.

This yeere in the Easter holidaies on the monday preached at the Spittle doctor Bill, on the tuesdaie doctor Cox, & on the wednesdaie doctor Horne: the first was hir maiesties chapleine, the other two had remained at Geneua, and in other places beyond the seas all queene Maries time. On low sundaie maister Samson made the rehearsall sermon: but when the lord maior and aldermen came to their places in Paules churchyard, the pulpit doore was locked, & the keie could not be heard of. Whervpon the lord maior sent for a smith to open the locke, which was done; and when the preacher should enter the place, it was found verie filthie and vncleanlie. Moreouer, the verger that had the custodie of the keie, which opened the doore of the place where the prelats and other vse to stand at the sermon time, would not open the doore; but the gentlemen with a some brake it open, and so came in to heare the sermon. This disorder chanced by reason that since Christmasse last past there was not a sermon preached at Paules crosse, by meanes of an inhibition sent from the councell vnto the bishop of London, that he should admit no preacher, because of the controuersie betwixt the bishops and other of the clergie that were now returned into the realme, from the parties of beyond the seas.

The last of March the parlement yet continuing, was a conference begun at Westminster concerning certeine articles of religion betwixt the bishops and other of the clergie on the one part, and certeine learned preachers of whome some had beene in dignitie in the church of England before that time on the other part. The declaration of the proceeding therin, and the cause of the breaking vp of the same conference by default and contempt of certeine bishops, parties of the said conference was published in a little treatise, and imprinted by Richard Iug and John Cawood, printers to the queenes maiestie, as here followeth. The queenes most excellent maiestie, hauing heard of diuersitie of opinions in certeine matters of religion amongst sundrie of hir louing subiects, and being verie desirous to haue the same reduced to some godlie & christian concord, thought it best by the aduise of the lords, and other of hir priuie councell, as well for the satisfaction of persons doubtfull, as also for the knowledge of the verie truth in certeine matter of difference, to haue a conuenient chosen number of the best learned of either part, & to confer togither their opinions and reasons, and thereby to come to some good and charitable agreement.

And hereupon by hir maiesties commandement certeine of hir priuie councell declared this purpose to the archbishop of Yorke (being also one of the same priuie councell) & required him that he would impart the same to some of the bishops, and to make choise of eight, nine, or ten of them: and that there should be the like number named of the other part: and further also declared to him (as then was supposed) what the matters should be. And as for the time, it was thought meet to be as soone as possible might be agreed vpon. And then after certeine daies past, it was signified by the said archbishop, that there was appointed by such of the bishops, to whome he had imparted this matter, eight persons, that is: to sate, foure bishops, and foure doctors, who were content at the queenes maiesties commandement to shew their opinions; and (as he termed it) render account of their faith in those matters which were mentioned, and that specialls in writing, although he said they thought the same so determined, as there was no cause to dispute vpon them.

It was hereupon fullie resolued by the queenes maiestie, with the aduise aforesaid, that according to their desire, it should be in writing on both parts, for auoiding of much altercation in words; and that the said bishops should, bicause they were in authoritie and degree superiors, first declare their minds and opinions in the matter, with their reasons in writing: and the other number being also eight men of good degree in schooles, and some hauing beene in dignitie in the church of England, if they had anie thing to sate to the contrarie, should the same date declare their opinions in like manner. And so ech of them should deliuer their writings to the other, to be considered what were to be improued therein, and the same to declare againe in writing at some other conuenient date, and the like order to be kept in all the rest of the matters. All this was fullie agreed vpon with the archbishop of Yorke, and also signified to both parties. And immediatlie hereupon, diuerse of the nobilitie and states of the realme, vnderstanding that such a meeting and conference should be, and that in certeine matters, whereupon (the court of parlement consequentlie following) some lawes might be grounded: they made earnest meanes to hir maiestie, that the parties of this conference might put and read their assertions in the English tong, and that in the presence of them of the nobilitie, and others of the parlement house, for the better satisfaction and inabling of their owne iudgements, to treat and conclude of such lawes as might depend hereupon.

This also being thought verie reasonable, was signified to both parties, and so fullie agreed vpon, and the date appointed for the first meeting to be the fridaie in the forenoone, being the last of March at Westminster church, where both for good order, and for honour of the conference, by the queenes maiesties commandement, the lords and others of the priuie councell were present, and a great part of the nobilitie also. And notwithstanding the former order appointed, and consented vnto by both parts, yet the bishop of Winchester and his colleagues, alleging that they had mistaken that their assertions and reasons should be written, and so onelie recited out of the booke, said their booke was not readie they written: but they were prouided to argue and dispute, and therefore would for that time repeat in speech that which they had to sate vnto the first proposition. This variation from the order, and specialls from that which themselues had by the said archbishop in writing before required, adding thereto the reason of the apostle, that to contend with words is profitable to nothing, but to subuersion of the hearer; seemed vnto the queenes maiesties councell somewhat strange: & yet was it permitted without anie great reprehension, bicause they excused themselues with mistaking the order, and agreed that they would not faile but put it in writing; and according to the former order, deliuer it to the other part. And so the said bishop of Winchester and his collegues appointed doctor Cole deane of Paules, to be the vtterer of their minds, who partlie by speech onelie, and partlie by reading of authorities written, and at certeine times being informed of his colleagues what to sate, made a declaration of their meanings, & their reasons to their first proposition. Which being ended, they were asked by the priuie councell, if anie of them campe, trauelled most earnestlie to doo good betwixt the parties, and to bring them to a finall accord, whose endeuor therein was to the great good liking & contentation of all the said parties. After that this treatie had continued a long time, and now rested nothing to staie them frō concluding a generall peace, but onelie the article touching Calis, at length that matter was also accorded by a speciall treatie betwixt the quéenes maiestie of England, & the French king, Guido Canalcanti a gentleman of Florence being the meane to bring the same to effect. The substance of which articles was, that Calis should rest in the Frenchmens hands, for the terme of eight yéres, and at the end of that terme, they couenanted to render the same: or else for default, to forfeit vnto the quénes highnesse the summe of fiue hundred thousand crownes; and for suertie hereof, to deliuer foure hostages, such as hir maiestie should thinke sufficient. And in case the towne were not deliuered at the end of the said eight yéres, though the monie were paid according to the couenants: yet notwithstanding the right and title to the said towne and countrie adioining, should alwaies remaine and be reserued vnto the crowne and realme of England. It was further concluded also, that a peace should be firmed and had betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland, such fortresses to be rased as had bæn built and made by the Scots and French on the borders towards England, as Haimouth and others.

Sir John Mason knight, secretarie for the French tong, was sent ouer in post with instructions vnto the English commissioners, after whose comming, within two or three daies, a generall peace was concluded betwixt all the parties, the articles whereof not touching England, we haue of purpose omitted. But now after the conclusion of this peace, the said sir John Mason returned in post with the same: and so thereupon, the seuenth of Aprill, the said peace was proclamed; to wit, betwixt the quénes maiestie on the one part, and the French king on the other, their realmes, dominions, and subiects; and likewise betwixt hir said maiestie and the king Dolphin and quéne of Scots his wife, their realmes, dominions, and subiects. This proclamation was made by Garter Norreie king at armes, accompanied with three other heralds, & fiue trumpettors: the lord maior of London & the aldermen in their scarlet gowns being also present, & riding in companie of the said heralds.

The same time also was another proclamation made vnder the quénes hand in writing, inhibiting, that from thenseforth no plaies nor interludes should be exercised, till Allhallowes tide next insuing. Upon saturdaie the two and twentith of Aprill, the lord Wentworth, late deputie of Calis, was araigned at Westminster, vpon an indictment of treason found against him, in the late quéne Maries daies, for the losse of Calis: but he was acquited by his péeres, the lord marquesse of Northampton sitting that daie as cheefe steward of England, vnder the cloth of estate. The eight of Maie, the parlement brake vp; in which parlement, beside other things before recited, concluded, and passed in the same; a subsidie was granted to the quénes highnesse, of two shillings eight pence the pound of moueable goods, and foure shillings of lands, to be paid at two seuerall paiments, of euerie person spirituall and temporall, towards the better furnishing of hir maiestie with monie, for the necessarie charges which she was presentlie occasioned to sustaine, finding the treasure of the realme greatlie consumed, and the reuenues of the crowne sore diminished, and the same crowne much indebted, by taking vp of notable summes of monie by waie of loane vpon interest, as well in the daies of hir brother K. Edward, as hir sister quéne Marie. The fourtéenth of Maie being Whitsundaie, the seruice in churches began according to the booke of cómon praier, set forth and established in this last parlement, correspondent to that which was vsed in the daies of hir brother king Edward. Upon sundaie the second of Julie, the citizens of London set forth a muster before the quénes maiestie at Greenwich in the parke there, of the number of 1400 men, whereof 800 were pikes, armed in fine corselets, faire hundred shot in shirts of male, with morians, & two hundred halbarders armed in Almaine riuets: these were furnished forth by the crafts and companies of the citie. Foure hundred two withers were assigned, richlie appointed and apparelled for the purpose. There were also twelue wardens of the best companies mounted on horsebacke in coats of blacke veluet, to conduct them, with drums and fifes, and six ensignes, all in ierkins of white sattin of Bridges, cut and lined with blacke sarsenet, and caps, hosen, and scarfs according. The sergeant Maiors, capteine Constable, and capteine Sanders, brought them in order before the quénes presence, placing them in battell arraie, euen as they should haue fought; so as the shew was verie faire, the emperours and the French kings ambassadors being present.

In this moneth also, the archbishop of Yorke, the bishops of Elie, London, and others, to the number of thirtéene or foureténe, being called before the quénes councell, and refusing to receiue the oth touching hir maiesties supremasie, and other articles, were deprined from their bishopricks: in whose romes and places, first for cardinall Pole, succéeded doctor Matthew Parker, archbishop of Canturburie. In the place of Heth, succeeded doctor Young. In stéed of Boner, Edmund Grindall was bishop of London. For Hopton, Thurlbie, Cunstall, Pates, Chyttoherson, Peto, Coats, Morgan, Feasie, White, Dglethorpe, &c: were placed doctor John Parkhurst in Norwich. D. In like maner, were diuerse deans, archdeacons, parsons, & vicars, remoued from their benefices, and some of them committed to prison in the Tower, Fléet, Marshalsea, and Kings bench.

Bishops deprined and other succeeding. John Fox.

Moreouer, about the same time were commissioners appointed to visit in euerie diocesse within the relme, for the establishment of religion, according to the order appointed by act and statute, passed and confirmed in the last parlement. For London were appointed sir Richard Sackuill knight, Robert Horne doctor of diuinitie, doctor Haie a ciuilian, and maister Sauage; who calling before them diuerse persons of euerie parish, sware them to inquire and make presentment accordinglie, vpon certeine iniunctions drawne and deuised, for the better accomplishment and execution of that which they had in charge. Furthermore, about the same time, by vertue of an act established in parlement, all such religious houses as were againe erected and set vp, were now suppressed, as the abbeies of Westminster, the houses of the nuns and brethren of the Sion and Shéene, the blacke friers of Grēenwich, &c. And on the twelfe of August being saturdaie, the high altar in Paules church, with the rood & the images of Marie and John, standing in the rood loft, were taken downe, & the prebendaries and petie canons commanded to weare no more their graie amises, but to vse onelie a surplice in seruice time. This was done by commandement brarie in Cambridge, with manie notable both written and printed bookes: compiling also manie other bookes, aswell of diuinitie as of other sciences, whereof at this daie his arithmetike is of great estimation through Europe) but did also for the flesh & outward man build from the ground a most beautifull porch or gatehouse (with a chappell annexed thereunto) of faire stone in the castell of Durham, withall adding vnto the said castell certeine gates with iron bars and portcullices supported with strong walles of stone on each part for the more strength against the enimie: not forgetting to make a water-conduit for the ease of washing (and to serue the other offices in the house) on the left side of the entrance into the said castell. To which these sumptuous deeds (for they are verie heroicall) may be added, the gatehouse built at Alnewike, and the tolbooth in the market of Durham all of stone, with the rest of the houses of office next vnto the hinder part of the said tolbooth, which afterward (with other great liberalities) he gaue to the citizens of Durham.

Buildings framed by Tunstall, &c.

Lastlie (at his owne charge) he new repared with stonewoorke the third part of Cinbridge, which his predecessour Thomas Langleis recouered against the manor of Newcastell: and which, others his predecessors (as occasion was offered therefore) did from time to time most statelie repare. In the end about the latter reigne of Edward the sixt (being by Kinian or Ninian, Menuile or Menille, accused, for that he somewhat fauoured the Romane religion, and was not so forward in furthering of the gospell as that time required) he was for that cause depriued from his bishoprike, from all other ecclesiasticall gouernment, and committed to the tower: where he remained all the time of K. Edward. Afterward (by the benefit of quæne Marie) in the first yeare of hir reigne, he was reinuested into his see of Durham, which he possessed all the time of hir gouernement: during which he was not so seuere an executor of the Romane canons against the protestants, as the other bishops of England were.

Tunstall deprined from his bishoprike.

Tunstall restored.

But she not continuing long (such are the inconstancies of our estates & vncerteinties of our troubles) he was againe (by the noble quæne Elisabeth) depriued of his bishoprike, after disputation and conference had at Westminster: in which he defended the Roman religion, in the first yeare of the said Elisabeth, about the truth of Christs gospell: and was committed to Matthew Parker bishop of Canturburie, who vsed him verie honourablie, both for the grauitie, learning and age of the said Tunstall. But he not long remaining vnder the ward of the said bishop, did shortlie after the eighteenth of Nouember in the yeare 1559 depart this life at Lambeth, where he first receiued his consecration, being a man of such age, as that he atteined to the number of foure score & fiue years when he died. He was buried in the quære of the church of Lambeth, whose funerall sermon was done by Alexander Nowell, then (& now in the yeare 1586) deane of Poules. Who taking this theame to intreat vpon, Blessed are they which die in the Lord, did there deliuer such liberall & singular commendation of this man for his vertuous life, lerning, grauitie, and good seruice done to manie princes of England, that more could not be said of anie man, being spoken trulie. Such force hath vertue, that we ought to commend it euen in our enimies, ouer whose dead carcase in the said church of Lambeth is laid a faire marble, in which is ingraued this epitaph of his, deuised by doctor Walter Haddon:

Anglia Cutbertum Tunstallum mœsta requirit,

This man was (as it should appeare in stories) full of contumacie and selfe will, vntractable he was and of nature rebellious. For saith maister Fox in the reigne of king Edward, being cast into the tower for his disobedience, where he kept his Christmasse three yeares together, more worthie of some other place without the tower, if it had pleased God otherwise not to haue meant a further plague to this realme by that man. Yoiwbeit he was indued with such excellencie of lerning, and that of sundrie sutes, that of the learned he is noted for a mirror of that age wherein he liued: and albeit a papist, yet not depriuable of the praise which it pleased God to prouide for him (being an enimie vnto the truth, perhaps through feare as manie more) by those rare and manifold good meanes wherewith he was adorned. Insomuch that Leland, a man of a cleare iudgement and great insight to discerne betweene substantiallie and superficiallie learned, comparing this bishop Tunstall with prosound Budeus, saith as foloweth:

In this meane time, through controuersie raised betwirt the Scotish nobilitie, and the quæne Dowager of Scotland, which chanced especiallie about matters of religion, certeine of the lords there minding a reformation therein; and the quæne resisting them to hir power, in purpose to mainteine the old popish religion, which some name catholike; diuerse companies of souldiers and men of war were sent out of France into Scotland to aid the said quæne, where they were placed in diuerse townes and forts, to the high displeasure of the more part of the Scotish nobilitie: who lothing to be oppressed with strangers in that sort, were forced to sue vnto the quæne of England for aid to expell the French, who sought to subuert the ancient state of that realme, and to annex the same vnto the crowne of France.

Anno Reg. 2. Trouble in Scotland.

Frenchmen sent into Scotland.

The Scots sue to the quæns maiestie of England for aid against the French.

Their sute was the better liked of, for that it was doubted, least the Frenchmen (vnder pretense of bringing an armie into Scotland to appease the Scots) might attempt some inuasion here in England, considering that by procurement (as was thought) of the duke of Guise, vncle to the quæne of France and Scotland, a title should seeme to be pretended by his neece, the foresaid quæne, as might be gathered by manifest coniectures of the disturping of armes, and so forth. The names of the lords of Scotland that made sute for aid against the Frenchmen at this season, were these: the duke of Chateau le reault, the earle of Arraine his sonne, the lord James prior of saint Andrews, the earle of Argile, the earle of Glencarne, the earle of Rothouse, the earle of Southerland, the earle of Mounteith, the earle of Huntleie, the earle of Cathnes, the earle of Erroll, the earle Marshall, the earle of Morton, the earle of Cassils, the earle of Eglenton, the earle of Montros, the lord Ruthuen, the lord Bold, the lord Ogletree, the lord Erskin, the lord Drmond, the lord Hume, the lord Rose, the lord Creighton, the lord Leuingston, the lord Somerwell, the maister of Lindseie, the maister of Parwell.

The lords of Scotland that were confederat togither against the French.

The quænes maiestie, with aduise of hir graces councell, considering of this weightie businesse, and withall horsemen, the vantgard and battell, were commanded to march forth, who accordingtie passing forward alongst by the place where the duke & Scotish lords stood, held vpon their waie, till they approched neere to Lesserike.

At their comming thither, Tromboll, the quæne regents trumpet, came to my lord lieutenant, and brought with him a safe conduct, giuen vnder hir hand & seale, for the safe repaire of sir James Croft, sir George Howard, and sir others to accompanie them. Whereupon they preparing themselues to go to hir (after they had talked with my lord lieutenant, and the duke Chateau le reault) they departed towards Edenburgh, where the said quæne as then laie within the castell. There went with them maister Summerset, maister Pelham, and foure other gentlemen. Whilest they were in conference with the quæne, although an abstinence of all hostilitie by appointment taken betwixt my lord Grete and the said quæne ought to haue ceassed, the Frenchmen to the number of nine hundred, or a thousand foot, backed with fiue hundred corselets and pikes, & about fiftie horsemen, were come forth of Leith, vnder the conduction of monsieur Doisell, and the counte Martigues, coronell of the French footmen. My lord Grete vnderstanding thereof, came vp to the hill, appointed an officer at armes called Rouge Croslle, to go vnto them, with commandement from him, that they should retire their forces forth of the field into the towne of Leith: for if it were not for the promise which he had made to the quæne Dowager, he would cause them to depart, not much to their ease.

The herald doing his message, receiued answer, that they were vpon their maister and mistresse ground, and therefore meant not to remoue from it. Rouge Crosse returning with this answer, was sent againe from my lord lieutenant, to command them effsoons to go their way backe to Leith: for if they did not, he would suerlie send them awaie with a mischiefe. But scarse had the herald done this second message, when the Frenchmen stepping forth, discharged a whole volee of their shot into the field against my lord Grete and his companie. Hereupon, the Englishmen and they fell in skirmish, which continued for the space of foure houres and more, so hot & earnestlie maintained on both parts, that the like had not lightlie beene seene manie a day before. Yet at length, the Englishmen droue the French footmen ouer the hill, wan the crag from them, and put them from a chappell, where they had stood a great while, vsing it for a couert and safegard for them against the Englishmens shot.

Then the enimies that were in Leith shot off diuerse peeces of their great artillerie out of the towne against the Englishmen, who on the other part brought forth two field peeces, and couered them with a troope of horsemen; and hauing planted them to some aduantage, discharged the same among the enimies: who perceiuing that, gaue place, & suddenlie the English demilances gaue a charge, brake in amongst them, and slue diuerse. To conclude, they were put from their ground, and forced to retire backe into Leith, being followed vnhæere to the verie gates of that towne. There were slaine in this skirmish of the French, about a seuen score, and amongst them twelue men of name, beside some of them that remained prisoners. Of the Englishmen, there were also diuerse slaine, and manie hurt. But if the ground had bin knowen to the Englishmen, and what aduantage was offered to them by that presumptuous comming of the enimies so far from their hold, it was thought their whole power might easilie haue beene cut off, and vtterlie distressed. After that this skirmish was ended, and the Frenchmen driuen into Leith, the armie incamped at Lesserike. The same daie the Scotish hostages were imbarked to passe into England. Towards euening, sir James Croft, and sir George Howard, returned from the quæne regent, after they had spent a long time in talke with hir.

On sundaie the seuenth of Aprill, a new trench was cast beside the crag, and thereon two peeces of ordinance planted. The same daie, sir James Croft, sir George Howard, and sir Henrie Persie, went againe vpon assurance, to talke with the quæne Dowager. Mondaie the eight of Aprill, the Frenchmen shot at the English campe verie sore out of S. Nicholas steeple, where there were two great peeces placed for to annoie them, although they did no great hurt. But the same night, the Englishmen cast a trench beyond the crag, and placed in the same trench certeine small peeces of artillerie, which went off the next daie against the enimies: and they likewise shot off againe at the Englishmen; and so likewise on wednesdaie the tenth of Aprill, on which daie, a great part of the carriages for the great ordinance, and diuerse bullets for the same, were landed, and much thereof remoued, and brought to the innermost trench. Thursdaie the eleuenth of Aprill, the great ordinance was landed, and two peeces thereof mounted into their carriages.

The twelfe of Aprill being good fridaie, a bullet of a great peece of ordinance, being shot out of Leith earlie in the morning, did light in the campe, and slue three men. The same night, they were answered againe with foure or fiue canons, and demicanons. Saturdaie was spent in warding the trenches, and mounting the great artillerie. Sundaie the fourteenth of Aprill, being Easter daie, the Englishmen shot off in the morning all their great ordinance, and the Frenchmen answered them againe, and so they continued most part of that day, in shooting one at another. The footmen also skirmished so, that diuerse were hurt on both parts. The same day, the pile of Blacknesse was surrendred to maister Winter, vpon sight of the canon. There were within it eightæne Frenchmen, who were brought awaie prisoners, and the house deliuered to maister James Hamilton. The same daie, nine Frenchmen apparelled like women, came forth of Leith, and counterfeiting some like demeanor to the apparell wherein they were disguised, trained one of the English skouts within their danger, whome they tooke, and chopped off his head, which they set vpon the top of one of their church steeples.

Mondaie the fiftæenth of Aprill about none, there issued out of Leith a fiftie horsemen, and about fiue hundred harquebusiers: who making to the new trenches, were vpon the Englishmen that warded in such wise vpon the sudden, before they could be brought into anie order; that so entring the trenches, they slue and wounded no small number: and possessing the trenches a while, stopped and cloied the touch holes of three peeces of the artillerie, take maister Maurice Barkeleie prisoner, and his ensigne. Brian Fitz Williams was sore wounded, and a soule fright there was. The alarum being brought to the campe, sir James Croft and other repaired toward the trench with all expedition, and perceiuing the Frenchmen to be maisters of one of the trenches, he called to capteine Vaughan, commanding him with his band to enter the trench, and to relieue those that were hardlie beset of the Frenchmen.

This was done with great manhood shewed by the said Vaughan and others, who entring the trench, repelled the enimies, and slue fifteene of them that were in the trench. Capteins Summerset and capteine teine Read with their bands followed them also, as they retired, and maister Arthur Greie, with certeine of his demilances, of whome he had the conduction, suddenlie came vpon them, and charging them with great courage, draue them into the towne, and made no small slaughter of them. In which charge maister Arthur Greie was shot through the shoulder. The great artillerie in Leith was not idle, during this skirmish, discharging to the number of an hundred shot, greatlie to the annoiance of the English, and hinderance of the seruice, which else might by them haue beene atchiued. This night the Englishmen drew backe their ordinance, which the Frenchmen had cloied with nailes and wiers in the touch-holes, but the same were planted againe before daie. Moreouer, our pioners cast a new trench along by the old chapell.

Maister Arthur Greie hurt in the shoulder.

A new supplie commeth to the armie, the capteines names.

Tuesdaie the sixteenth of Aprill, a supplie of two thousand & two hundred footmen came to the campe, ouer whome were capteins, sir Andrew Corbet, sir Rowland Stanleie, sir Thomas Hesketh, sir Arthur Manwering, sir Laurence Smith, maister Francis Tunstall, maister Edward Littleton, capteine Caruell, Philip Sturleie, and Dauid Morris. They were garded with fiue hundred horsemen: sir Rafe Sadler, sir Francis Leake, sir John Forster, and sir Nicholas Strange hauing charge to see them safelie conducted: who after they had brought them past all danger of enimies, left them in safetie by the waie, & were come a daie or two before them to the campe.

A hot alarum of an houres continuance.

Wednesdaie the seuententh of Aprill, it rained sore the more part of the daie; but yet the same night maister Winter caused diuerse of the shipbotes, being verie well manned, to giue a great alarum at the side of the towne towards the water, discharging manie basses and harquebusiers of Croke into the towne: the alarum was verie hot for the space of an houre. During this businesse there was a right pitifull crie made by the women and children within the towne. The pioners being applied in worke to make trenches, on fridaie all daie at night they placed certeine peeces of the ordinance in the trenches beside the chappell.

Saturdaie the twentith of Aprill, manie peeces were shot off out of the trenches into the towne. There issued notwithstanding out at the gates an hundred shot, which placed themselues in the holes of the bankes, to hailse such of the Englishmen as came forth to offer the skirmish. All this daie also the pioners, both Scots and English were occupied in making of a new trench nere to the towne. Sir Gernis Clifton & capteine Read with their bands garded them, and two hundred lances. The same daie the residue of the great ordinance with armour was brought on land. Sundaie the one and twentith of Aprill, the bishop of Valence named Monluc, accompanied with sir Henrie Persie, and three hundred light horsemen came to Lesserike: the lord lieutenant, sir James Croft, the lord Scrope, and sir Rafe Sadler met him at the further end of the ward that was set of purpose for his entring into the campe. After they had receiued him with salutations according vnto the manner, he was conducted by Rouge Croise the officer of armes from the campe into Edenburgh, and so went vp to the castell to conferre with the queene Dowager. He was no sooner entred into the castell, but that there issued forth of Leith the number of two hundred Frenchmen about twelue of the clocke, and began a hot skirmish, which continued two houres, at the which diuerse were slaine on both parts.

More ordinance planted.

The same night the lord lieutenant caused nine peeces of the great ordinance to be planted in the new trench: so that the next daie being mondaie, the same peeces were shot off verie earlie, directlie towards the steeple of saint Anthonies church. And although those peeces late a quarter of a mile off, the peeces of ordinance that late in the same steeple were dismounted by them; and likewise those that late in the steeple of saint Nicholas church, at the which diuerse peeces were leuied, and within six or seuen time the peeces that late in that steeple were also displaced, and a gunner slaine that stood at one of them, the peece and the gunner comming tumbling downe both together. In this church (as was reported) their store of victels and munition was laid, so that batterie was made against the same all that daie, and a great peece of the church wall beaten downe, and the steeple defaced. The bishop of Valence, after he had talked with the quéene Dowager, returned to commune with the lords of the congregation.

The enimies ordinance displaced.

A fort raised.

Tuesdaie the three and twentith of Aprill, being saint Georges daie, the pioners Scotish and English were busilie applied in worke about the casting of trenches to make a fort; and still the artillerie went off against the towne. Wednesdaie the foure and twentith of Aprill about three of the clocke in the after noone, there issued out of Leith seauenténe horsemen, who offered the skirmish: and vnder the place called little London, where they were busie in fortifieng all that daie, three or foure hundred of their shot were placed readie to breake out, if occasion serued. At length certeine of the English lances gaue a charge vpon their horsemen, who therewith retiring, drew the Englishmen within danger of their shot. But although the Frenchmen that daie shewed themselues verie valiant in skirmishing euen in the face of the English artillerie: yet being now egerlie pursued by those lances, they were forced to retire without anie great hurt done to the Englishmen, although the skirmish continued nere hand two houres. In this last charge yong maister Browne was hurt.

A skirmish.

The French repelled.

Thursdaie the fiue and twentith of Aprill, the pioners laboured sore for the most part of the daie in finishing the new fort named Montpelham: to the gard whereof capteine Vaughan was appointed gouernor, with twelue hundred soldiors. This fort was raised on the south side of the towne, the plot whereof was cast square, with foure bulworks at euerie corner, and twelue battering peeces planted in places conuenient within the same. This thursdaie also, about fiue of the clocke in the after noone, there issued out of Leith on the east side seauentie or eightie horsemen, and two hundred harquebusiers, offering the skirmish, towards whome certeine of the English light horsemen roundlie made, and charging them, drone them backe to their footmen, who with their shot receiued the light horsemen so sharplie, that they were forced to retire. In which retire James Hamilton a Scotishman was taken prisoner, for the rescue of whome the horsemen made forward againe: but the enimies shot was so hot, that they were not able to recouer him; but yet they slue two of the French horsemen in sight.

The new fort called Montpelham.

Another skirmish.

James Hamilton taken prisoner.

During the time of this skirmish, there was great shooting off with the great ordinance on both sides, & much hurt done as well to the English as French. This daie capteine Perith, and capteine Yaies, hauing charge of a troope of light horsemen vnder sir Henrie Persie, and the lord of Grange were taken prisoners before Dunbar; and to the number of twentie or thirtie others were likewise taken or slaine the same time. The same night also, two thousand footmen with the pioners were sent to the other side of the towne, beyond the canon milles, where the pioners cast a trench for the safe lodging of the the armie, which remoued the next day being fridaie, and the xx and twentith of Aprill from Lesserike downe into the valle by the said ranon milles called the red Braes, neere to the riuer side on the south part of the towne of Leith. As the armie was thus remouing from Lesserike towards the said place called the red Braes, the Frenchmen within Leith shot off manie of their great peeces of artillerie, but without doing anie great hurt. As the armie was incamping, certeine of the enimies horssemen and footmen skirmished with the English lances and light horssemen a long time, there were tvvo French men slaine and their horsses also. In the time of this skirmish two canons were conueied and planted in the new trench, which discharged diuerse shots at the enimies.

The planting of the great artillerie.

Saturdaie the seauenand twentith of Aprill, the great artillerie was planted aloft on the hill aboue the campe, within lesse than a curriers shot of the towne walles, and the pioners were set a worke to cast new trenches from the place where the same ordinance was lodged vnto Montpelham, drawing so neere vnto Leith, as the harquebus might reach them that watched and warded within the greene bulworke. There issued out of Leith vnder the west bulworke certeine of the Frenchmen, the which were chased into the towne by the lard of Grange and others. The French kept the same daie a trench which they had made without the towne, continuallie shooting at the Englishmen in the campe: but the same night the Englishmen won that trench from them, slue diuerse of them therein, togither with their scout. And this done, they gaue a great alarum to the towne both by land and water, the shipbotes shooting off against the towne verie hotlie, and they within the towne likewise at the Englishmen. The same night was the great ordinance planted, and maister Markham hurt. On sundaie the eight and twentith of Aprill the said great ordinance went off, and shot continuallie the more part of that daie. The bishop of Valence departed the same daie towards Berwike: and this night sir George Howard that had beene sent backe to Berwike, to signifie to the duke of Norffolke the state of the siege, returned with sir Richard Lee, being conducted with fiue hundred horssemen.

A skirmish.

Mondaie the nine and twentith of Aprill, the peeces of the great artillerie were occupied in shooting off verie hotlie, and the French likewise shot off theirs, and comming forth of the towne skirmished with the Englishmen. This night the pioners made new trenches toward the south bulworke. Tuesdaie the last of Aprill was spent in shooting off the great artillerie into the towne. About fiue of the clocke in the after none, a sudden fire was raised within the towne, which hugelie increased and continued the most part of that night. At the beginning when it first appeered, the English ordinance was shot off to the place where the fire was, which shot togither with helpe of the wind, and being verie great at that present, did maruellouslie augment the same fire: yet nevertheless the French at that present time offered a skirmish, and continued the same neere hand for the space of two houres, manned their walles, and made the best prouision they might for doubt of some assault. It was indeed appointed, that certeine bands should make an alarum to the towne: in so much that captaine Vaughan with diuerse of the soldiors of Montpelham entred the ditch, and approching the walles, discouered the height of them. And notwithstanding that the French did what they could to annoie them in the diches with currier shot, yet did captaine Vaughan staie in the ditch a prettie while, and retired with his men without receiuing anie great hurt.

Captaine Vaughan.

Wednesdaie the first of Maie, the Frenchmen set vp verie earlie in the morning their Maie poles in certeine bulworks, and fourteene ensignes: the which being discouered of them in the campe, they saluted them with a peale of great ordinance, and likewise the Frenchmen answered them againe, and so continued the most part of that daie. The same daie

Maie poles set vp in Leith on Maie daie.

A trench won from the French.

Iohn Brian lieutenant to captaine Capell, won a trench frō the French at the west side of the towne, and in despite of them kept it all that daie with the losse onelie of one man. Thursdaie the second of Maie, the pioners made the trenches for the artillerie to be planted in batteris. The night following they remoued and placed the same artillerie in the new trench: and the next morning being fridaie and the third of Maie, about foure of the clocke, the same batterie went off, and continued all that daie. In the after none of the same daie certeine Frenchmen issued out of the west bulworke, and skirmishing with the Englishmen on that side the water, returned without anie great hurt.

The night insuing the pioners made a new trench by the citadell wherein they might lodge some shot, and captaine Vaughan with diuerse of the bands in Montpelham gaue two false assaults to the towne, entred the ditches, and viewed the slankers: whereupon the French shot off the same slankers, and manning their walles, shot off two or three volees of their small artillerie, slaieng and hurting to the number of twentie of the Englishmen. Amongother, little Norton lost his life that night, and so at length the residue returned. Saturdaie the fourth of Maie, there were three ensigns appointed to gard the new trenches, and towards night, when the ward should be releeued, and the watch set, the Frenchmen that were in the trench vnder the citadell, made a sallie vpon the sudden. Whereupon the Englishmen that garded the said trench were constreined to abandon a great part thereof for a time: but yet the Englishmen efsoons taking courage, laid to them afresh, repelled them againe, & draue them backe into their owne trenches, slue foure of them in fight, and hurt manie others. This was the lot of warre, to be ouerthrowne by force of the enimie, as the poet saith:

Qui Martem experti, per vim subiguntur ab hoste.

Whilest this was in doing, the French had stuffed their bulworks and rampiers with curriers and harquebusiers of Croke, as thicke as was possible, which went off without ceassing at the Englishmen, for the space of an houre and more. The English artillerie planted in the trenches did answer them againe continuallie, and the great peeces did much hurt among them, in sight of them that watched in the same trenches. The same night the Englishmen conueied two culuerings ouer the water to scowre the mils: and before the breake of the daie they had burnt one of the same mils. Sundaie the fift of Maie earlie in the morning at the releeuing of the watch, and entring of the ward, foure souldiors that belonged to the great ordinance issued out, and set fier on the other mill, which burnt verie outragiouslie without ceassing, for the space of an houre or more. The French began to assemble towards the mill, in hope to haue quenched the fire, but they were deceiued: for suddenlie the Englishmen cut two holes through their trenches, & placing in the same the two demiculuerings, shot them off at the Frenchmen, so that they were driuen to forsake the mill, and in their retire some of them were slaine.

This daie also, as foure French gentlemen came forth to discouer the English trenches, captaine Read commanded one of his souldiors to shot at them, but through mishap his peece burst, and a shiuer conuenient armor and weapons, as it is at this preſent. The one and twentith of March a notable Grammar ſchole was founded by the maiſter, wardens, and aſſiſtants of the right worſhipfull companie of the merchant tailors of London, in the pariſh of S. Laurence Pountneie in the ſame citie, the right worſhipfull Emanuell Lucar, Robert Roſe, William Merike, John Sparke, & Robert Duckington then maiſter and wardens of that companie.

The merchat tailors free ſchole.

The tenth of Aprill was one William Geffreie whipped, from the Marſhalſea in Southwarke, to Bedlem without Biſhops gate of London, for that he profeſſed one John Moze to be Chriſt our ſauior: on his head was ſet a paper, wherein was written as followeth: William Geffreie a moſt blaſphemous heretike, denieng Chriſt our ſauiour in heauen. The ſaid Geffreie being ſtaied at Bedlem gate, John Moze was brought forth, before whome William Geffreie was whipped, till he confeſſed Chriſt to be in heauen. Then the ſaid John Moze being examined, and anſwering ouerthwartlie, was commanded to put off his cote, doublet, and ſhirt; which he ſeemed to do verie willinglie, and after being tied to the cart, was whipped an arrowes ſhot from Bedlem, where at the laſt he alſo confeſſed Chriſt to be in heauen, and himſelfe to be a ſinfull man. Then was John Moze ſent againe into Bedlem, and Geffreie to the Marſhalſea, where they had laine priſoners nigh a yeare and a halfe, the one for profeſſing himſelfe to be Chriſt, the other a diſciple of the ſame Chriſt. On wedneſdaie the 4 of June, betweene foure & fiue of the clocke in the afternoone, the ſteeple of Paules in London being fired by lightning, braſt forth (as it ſeemed to the beholders) two or three yards beneath the fot of the croſſe, and from thence burnt downe the ſpire to the ſtonewoorke and bels, ſo terriblie, that within the ſpace of foure houres the ſame ſteeple with the roofes of the church, ſo much as was timber or otherwiſe combuſtible, were conſumed, which was a lamentable ſight and pitifull remembrance to the beholders therof. After this miſchance, the queens maieſtie being much grieued for the loſſe of ſo beautifull a monument, directed hir highneſſe letters to the maior of the citie of London, willing him to aſſemble the citizens to take ſome order for ſpeciall aid and helpe for the reparing againe of the ſaid monument. And the of hir moſt gratious diſpoſition, to giue a comfort to others for the furtherance thereof, did preſentlie giue and deliuer in gold one thouſand markes, and a warrant for a thouſand lode of timber, to be taken out of hir maieſties woods or elſewhere: and the citizens of London granted one beneuolence, and three fifteens to be forthwith paied. The clergie vnder the prouince of Canturburie granted the fortith part of the value of their benefices charged with firſt fruits, & not charged with firſt fruits the thirtith part. The clergie of the dioceſſe of London granted the thirtith part of their benefices in firſt fruits, and the twentith part out of firſt fruits. Now immediatlie by commandement of the quenes highneſſe, hir priuie councell toke order that ſix citizens of London, and two of the cleargie of the church of Paules, had charge and commandement to ouerſee and ſet forward this worke, who made ſuch erpedition, that within one moneth next following the burning thereof, the whole church, that is to ſaie, all the foure great roofes of the ſame were couered with boords and lead, after the maner of a falſe roofe. And the greatneſſe of the worke diſpatched in ſo ſhort time could ſcarſelie be credited of anie, but of ſuch as ſaw and knew the ſame. And the cauſe of this great haſt was for feare of raine, which might haue periſhed the bawtes, to the deſtruction of the whole church, & the people that were therein. And before the ſaid yeare was fullie ended, all the ſaid ſles of the ſaid church were made & framed of new timber, & couered with lead, & fullie finiſhed. And the ſame yeare alſo, the great roofe of the weſt end was framed, and made of new & great timber in Yorkeſhire, & brought to London by ſea, and ſet vp & couered with lead, and fullie finiſhed. And in like maner within the ſaid yeare, the whole roofe and frame of the eaſt end of the ſaid church was made in Yorkeſhire, & brought by ſea to London, and there laid readie to be raiſed when the ſeaſon of the yeare ſerued. This one thing reſteth to be told, that by eſtimation of wiſe men, 10000 pounds more than is yet granted vnto it, will not perfect & finiſh the church and ſteeple in ſuch ſort as it was before the burning there of.

All the ſles of Paules made and framed of new timber.

Ten thouſand pounds inſufficient to repare Paules as it was at the firſt.

In this meane time alſo, by reaſon of the quenes maieſties letters directed to the maior and his brethren of the citie of London about the burning of Paules, there were certeine aldermen and commoners of the ſaid citie named and called togither by the authoritie of the maior, to deuiſe ſome good order and ſpedie remedie for the reliefe and comfort of the ſaid citie, whenſoeuer anie chance of fire hereafter ſhould happen (as God forbid) within the ſaid citie or liberties thereof. And the perſons ſo called after ſundrie meetings, and with good aduiſement and deliberation, agreed and penned a certeine order for the ſpedie remedie thereof, as well for the readie knowledge of the place, whereſoeuer the ſame fire ſhould happen, and for the ſudden extinguiſhment & ſuppreſſing of the ſame, as alſo for the ſafe keeping of the goods of ſuch perſons in whoſe houſe anie fire ſhould chance. Which orders and rules vndoubtedlie would be to the great comfort & ſafetie of the citie and citizens of the ſame, if they were publiſhed and made knowen in time, and executed accordinglie. But what ſhould I ſaie? I can but lament, not onelie for this, but alſo for manie ſuch painefull and profitable labors, which for good gouernement of this citie had beene taken. For as ſone as the talking thereof is done, and the bookes framed and deliuered, ſo ſone is it put in oblition, and nothing at all thought vpon, vntill an houre after the miſchiefe be paſt.

God orders nothing worth if they be not put in execution.

This yeare was choſen lord maior of London a worthie citizen named William Harper, one of the companie of the merchant tailors. This man wiſhing in his life time to benefit his countrie, founded a free ſchole in the towne of Bedford where he was borne, and now lieth buried, prouiding a competent ſtipend and lining for a ſcholemaiſter, there to traine vp and inſtruct children in vertue and learning forener. The fiftenth of Nouember, the quenes maieſtie publiſhed a proclamation, wherein ſhe reſtored to the realme diuerſe ſmall peeces of ſiluer monie, as the peece of ſix pence, foure pence, three pence, two pence, and a penie, three halfe pence, and three farthings. She alſo forbad all forren coines to be currant within the ſame realme, as well gold as ſiuer, calling them to hir maieſties mints, except two ſorts of crownes of gold, the one the French crowne, the other the Flemmiſh crowne. Thus did hir maieſtie in all hir actions directed to common vtilitie ſhoot at a certeine perfection, pureneſſe, and ſoundneſſe, as here in hir new ſtamps and coines of all ſorts; ſo alſo in Gods religion, ſetting the materiall churches of hir dominions free from all popiſh trath: which one hath aptlie noted by waie of compariſon, ſaieng:

Monstruous births in diuerse places of England.

This yeare in England were manie monstruous births. In March a mare brought forth a foale with one bodie and two heads, and as it were a long taile growing out betweene the two heads. Also a sow farowed a pig with foure legs like to the armes of a manchild with armes and fingers, &c. In Aprill a sow farrowed a pig with two bodies, eight feet, and but one head: manie calues and lambs were monstruous, some with collars of skin growing about their necks, like to the double ruffes of shirts and neckercthers then vsed. The foure and twentith of Maie, a manchild was borne at Chichester in Sussex, the head armes, & legs whereof were like to an anatomie, the breast and bellie monstruous big, from the nauill as it were a long string hanging: about the necke a great collar of flesh and skin growing like the ruffe of a shirt or neckercher, comming vp aboue the eares pleited and folded, &c.

France at diuision in it selfe by ciuill warres.

The realme of France being in great trouble about this season, by the means of ciuill dissention and warres that rose betwixt the house of Guise and other of that faction vpon the one side, and the prince of Conde and other that toke part with him on the contrarie side: the quéenes maiestie informed how that the duke of Guise and his partakers hauing got into their possession the person of the yong king, vnder pretext of his authoritie, sought the subuersion of manie noble men and good subiects of the crowne of France, namelie such as were knowne or suspected to be zealous for a reformation to be had in matters of religion: hir maiestie ther vpon considering, that if their purpose might be brought to effect, it was to be doubted that they would not so rest, but séeke to set things in broile also within this hir realme of England, and other countries nére to them adioining: first as one that had euer wished quietnesse, rather than the troubles of warre, sent ouer sir Henrie Sidneie at that present lord président of Wales (a man of such estimation as his word ought to haue deserued credit) to trie if he might doo anie good to bring the parties to some attonement. But such wilfull headinesse séemed to rest in some that were chiefe of the one faction, that their desire séemed altogither bent to enter into wars. Hir maiestie yet hoping the best, appointed to send another honourable ambassage, which by their wisedoms and good aduise might persuade the parties vnto concord, whereby all due authoritie, honor, & dignitie might be restored to the king, and euerie other degrée kéepe their romes and places as to them apperteined, but all in vaine. For this motion of a pacification to be had could take no place, neither might the will of the yong king, or of his timorous mother, as it then séemed, be regarded, otherwise than as stood with the pleasure & appointment of those that were knowne to be the chiefe authors and furtherers of all those troubles.

The quéenes maiesties mistrust of inconuenience, and the same remedied.

Sir Henrie Sidneie sent ambassador into France.

In other ambassage in Iulie directed into France.

Whilest the quéenes maiestie therefore did thus trauell in respect of the suertie which hir grace bare to hir welbeloued brother the said king, and to the commoditie and quietnesse of both the factions, an open iniurie was offered to hir maiestie: so as it might appeare what minds they bare towards hir, that had thus excluded and refused all offers & meanes to grow to some good and indifferent conclusion of peace. For whereas manie merchants, as well of London as of Excester, and other the west parts of hir realme, were sojourning for cause of traffike, in diuerse ports and hauens of Britaine; and hauing dispatched their businesse, and got their lading aboord, their ships were readie to hoise vp sailes, and to returne each one towards the place from whence he came, they were suddenlie arested, their goods seized vpon, and they themselues cast in prison: and some that in reuenge of such offered iniurie attempted to make resistance, were cruellie slaine, their ships conueied awaie, their goods confiscat, without other pretense, but onelie that it was said to them that they were Huguenots. Neither was this done by priuat persons, but by open violence of the gouernors & magistrats of those places where the same disorder was executed: so that it appeared from whence they had their commission to vse such wrongfull dealing, and how farre the same would extend, if they might once haue time and occasion to accomplish their purposed intentions.

Ships of London, Excester, & Falmouth, spoiled by the French in Britaine, the thirtith of Iulie, and nineteenth of August.

Moreouer, when complaint of such iniuries was made vnto the lawfull magistrats there, they found no redres at all. For what might the poore merchants profit by their plaints, when the packets of the ambassadors leters, directed to hir maiestie, were taken from the bearer, & no punishment had against those that committed so vnciuill an outrage? A thing that offended hir maiestie so much more, for that as she toke the matter, there wanted no good will, either in the king, or his mother, or in the king of Nauarre, the kings generall lieutenant, to sée such a presumptuous and vnrulie part punished of their people: but rather that there lacked in them authoritie to haue it redressed. Furthermore, it greatlie greeued hir, that the yong French king, hir déere brother was brought to such a streict, that he was nether able to defend the libertie of his people, nor the authoritie of his lawes, nor to deale vprightlie with other princes and potentats accordinglie, as by the bonds of leagues and of couenanted aliances had bene requisite. Neither did such disorder in gouernement of the kingdome of France touch anie so much and particularlie, as the queens maiestie of England.

Letters taken from the quéens ambassadors seruants.

The French troubles touch most & quéene of England.

She therefore lamenting that the king and quéene mother should be thus in the hands of them that procured all these troubles, and led vp and downe at their pleasures, and driuen to behold the spoile and sacking of diuerse his cities, and miserable slaughter of his subiects: and againe hir grace thinking it expedient to preuent that such as were knowne to beare no good will, either to hir or hir realme, should not get into their possessions such townes and hauens as late against the sea coasts of hir said realme, whereby they stuffing the same with garrisons and numbers of men of warre, might easilie vpon occasions séeke to make inuasions into this hir said realme, to the great annoiance of hir and hir louing subiects: at the request of the French themselues, thought it expedient to put in armor a certeine number of hir subiects, to passe ouer into Normandie, vnto such hauens as nére approched vnto this hir realme of England, as well for the safegard of the same, as also for the releise and preseruation of the inhabitants there: and other that professed the gospell, liuing in continuall danger to be murthered and oppressed, and therefore craning hir aid to saue and deliuer them out of the bloudie hands of their cruell aduersaries, that sought their hastie destruction.

The chiefe causes that moued the quéenes maiestie to send a power into France.

For the conduction therefore of such forces as she meant to send ouer at that present, she ordeined the lord Ambrose Dudleie earle of Warwike to be hir principall lieutenant, capteine generall, chiefe leader and gouernor of hir said subiects, that should in such wise passe ouer into Normandie. Herevpon, the said erle the seuenteenth of October, in this fourth yeare of hir maiesties reigne, toke shipping at Portesmouth in the hauen there, at one a clocke in the after none, being aboord himselfe in the quéens ship, called the New barke, and setting forward, sailed all that after none, and the night following, directlie towards wards Newhauen, but in the morning about eight a clocke, when his lordship was within twentie miles of the town of Newhauen, the wind suddenlie changed cleane contrarie to his course: so that being driuen to returne about the next midnight, he arriued in the downes, and there remained at anchor, till about eight of the clocke in the next morning being mondaie, and then was set on land by bote at Sandon castell besides Deale, and the same daie at night came to Douer, & there late till fridaie at three of the clocke at after noone; and then taking ship againe, sailed forth: but finding the wind nothing prosperous for his course, after he had lien all that night & the daie following, tossing & tumbling on the seas, he was constreined to come backe againe, and arriued in the hauen of Douer, about ten of the clocke on saturdaie at night, and so remained there till tuesdaie next insuing at three of the clocke in the after noone, and then went to shipboord againe in the said ship called the New barke: and directing his course forwards, on thursdaie morning about eight of the clocke, his lordship landed at Newhauen, where he was most ioyfullie receiued with a great peale of artillerie.

The next daie, being fridaie, & the thirtith of October, there came to Newhauen from Diepe, fiftie light horsemen Scots, brought by one of maister Killigrues seruants. On saturdaie the last of October, the earle of Warwikes commission was proclamed in Latine, English, and French, by Blewmantell, pursuant at armes: which being ended, his lordship went into the church, and there sir Adrian Poinings knight marshall gaue him his oth, and then my lord gaue the said sir Adrian his oth. And after him were sworne Cutbert Vaughan controllor, John Fisher knight porter, William Bromfield maister of the ordinance, William Robinson water bailife, and capteine Thomas Wood clearke of the councell. On mondaie the second of Nouember, the earle of Warwike, with the knight marshall, and the controllor, rode out of Newhauen to Hauteuille, and so towards Mondeuille, accompanied with all the horsemen English and Scotish, and a thousand footmen. The Scotishmen & Montgomeries band passed forth, and skirmished with them of Mondeuille, and the Scots brought awaie with them a bootie of three hundred sheepe: but in the morning, they were returned backe againe by commandement of the earle of Warwike.

Skirmish betweene the Scotishmen and them of Mondeuille.

The chiefe causes that mooued the quéenes maiestie to send a power into France.

Maister controllors souldiors went as far as Harflue, and there skirmished with them of that garrison, but without anie hurt to either part. My lord lieutenant riding all about the hils, viewed the countrie, and at night returned. On wednesdaie the fourth of Nouember, a barke of Newhauen, belonging to Francis Clearke, brought into the hauen of the same towne, foure Britons laden with wines, to the quantitie of two hundred tuns of good Gascoigne wines, which they ment to haue brought to the enimies: but being thus taken as a good prise, it was discharged in Newhauen, and sold the Englishmen and others of that towne in good stead. On fridaie the first of Nouember, about nine of the clocke in the morning, a great alarum rose in the said towne of Newhauen: for vpon the hils on the north side of the towne, the Reingraue, and the sonne of the viceadmerall of France, shewed themselues, accompanied with two thousand footmen, and fiue hundred horsemen. And herewith, the Reingraue sent a trumpetor to the towne, to aduertise the lord lieutenant, that he was on the hils there at hand; and that vnderstanding his lordship was come into the countrie, and entred into Newhauen, if it would please him to promise vpon his honor, and by the faith of a gentleman, that he might come, and returne in safetie, he would be glad to come & see him. Whereupon the lord lieutenant, taking with him certeine capteins and gentlemen, rode forth of the towne, and sent before him sir Adrian Poinings the marshall, with Stephan Medcalfe his maiesties trumpetor vnto the Reingraue, who talking with him, returned, and met with the lord lieutenant: who therewith passed forward, and meeting with the Reingraue, they imbraced each other, and conferred togither as they had occasion. And the Reingraue told the lord lieutenant (among other talke) that he was come to be his neighbor, and so with such merie speech they communed togither: and after taking their leaue either of other, they returned vnto their homes.

Stephan Medcalfe trumpetor.

The earle of Warwike and the Reingraue talke togither.

The counte Montgomerie and monsieur Beauuois had some talke also with the Reingraue, casting out bitter and sharpe words in reproch of the duke of Guise, and others that were of his faction. The Reingraue comming backe to his armie the same afternoone, forraied all the countrie, and droue awaie the most part of all the cattell that they might meet with: and comming to the church of Hauteuille, where an hundred and fiftie of Montgomeries band late, they skirmished with them, and in the end Montgomeries souldiors were forced to retire, and abandon the place, leauing it to the enimies; and comming awaie, withdrew the same night into Newhauen. The Almans the same euening, diuiding their armie into two parts, the one halfe of them went and lodged at Mondeuille, and the other halfe at Harflue. The morrow after, the Frenchmen that had abandoned the church of Hauteuille the night before, went thither againe, tooke and kept it against the enimies, in like manner as they held it before.

The church of Hauteuille recouered.

The eleuenth of Nouember, a proclamation was made in the name of the lord lieutenant, by the officer at armes Blewmantell, as well for good orders to be kept by the souldiors against the French inhabitants of the towne, & reforming of certeine grée uances, whereof the French had made complaint: as also for their comming to church to heare common praier and preaching at due times, for the auoiding of vnlawfull games, whordome, wicked othes, and other blaschemies; and likewise concerning diuerse other good orders to be obserued, and disorders to be eschewed, as was thought necessarie to giue warning of, with condigne paines apointed for punishment of such as should transgresse in the same.

A proclamation for good orders to be kept by the souldiors.

On thursdaie the twelfe of Nouember, there went out of the towne of Newhauen towards Harflue, three bands of Frenchmen, conteining about six hundred footmen; and suddenlie they were beset by the Almans and Frenchmen of the garrison of Harflue: so that the French protestants were driuen to take a village called Graville, where they maintained the skirmish for the space of two houres, till the lord lieutenant, hearing of the perill in which they stood, sent forth with the controllor the number of a thousand footmen, and monsieur Beauuois with diuerse French horsemen: who comming before Harflue, fell in skirmish with the enimies, to whose succor there issued forth of Harflue a great number of the Almans, both horsemen and footmen. But the Englishmen behaued themselues so valiantlie, that they beat them out of the field, and droue them in the end to the verie gates of their towne, with such lionlike courage, as was wonderfull: choosing rather to die in battell (if hap had so cut their cards) in an honest cause, than in their sicke beds: as moued by the poets reason not amisse for a souldior to

Absumpti longis animam cruciatibus edunt
Languentes morbis: in bello pulchra paratur
Mors, homo momento pugnans extinguitur hora,
Evolat in tenues lætus cito spiritus auras.

This skirmish was stoutlie maintained and continued for the space of three long houres. Their great artillerie was shot off freshlie from the wals and bulworks. At length, when the night drew on, the retire was sounded, and the Englishmen came their waie backe to Newhauen with honor, hauing lost not past eight of their souldiors, that were slaine and sir other hurt: whereas there was one of the enimies capteins slain in sight, with twentie souldiors, and another of their capteins, with diuerse others of their numbers grieuouslie wounded. Monsieur Beauuois shewed himselfe that daie verie forward and valiant, & so likewise did the Scotishmen. The thirteenth of Nouember, a pinnesse of the Frenchmen that belonged to Newhauen, being gone forth the night before, brought into the hauen a ship laden with Rochell wines, fiue and twentie tuns, that was bound to passe vp to the enimies, and so esteemed a good prise. On the fourteenth of Nouember, another ship fraught with twentie tuns of Gascoigne wines was brought in as a prise, likewise taken by a barke of Newhauen, that belonged to a Frenchman, called Iehan de Bois, an earnest aduersarie to the papists.

The seuenth of Nouember, a proclamation was made by Blewmantell, concerning orders taken and passed by the lord lieutenant, that no Englishman nor Frenchman should shot off anie harquebuse within the towne; nor that anie Frenchman, except monsieur Beauuois, or monsieur Bicquemault, or their companies, should be out of their lodgings after nine of the clocke at night till the next morning on paine of death: except in cases of alarums. The twelfe of Nouember, about six of the clocke at night, one of the mils without the gate was set on fire by some of the papists (as was thought) whereof rose a great alarum. The thirteenth of Nouember, the Reingraue was seene on the north hils of the towne, with foure score horsemen: whereupon the Scotish horsemen, and three bands of footmen issued out, marching vp towards the same hils, in hope to meet with their enimies, but they were retired towards Mondeuille, and so nothing was done. It was reported for a certeine truth, that the duke Daumale was there at that present with the Reingraue.

On wednesdaie, the fiue and twentith of Nouember, one of capteine Cocksons souldiors was hanged in the market place: and an other that was brought thither likewise to be executed had his pardon, at the suit of certeine French gentlemen. And herewith was proclamation made, that where it had beene proclamed afore, that none should take anie thing forceablie from the French on paine of death, for breach whereof, such execution was presentlie done: the lord lieutenant did by this proclamation eftsoons charge and command, that none vpon like paine should breake or spoile anie house or ship: or take anie timber, wood, or anie other thing from the French, without their good will, consent, and agreement. The same afternoone came into the hauen hoies and botes laden with wine, cider, perrie, wheate, beefe, bisquet, meale, and other prouision of vittels. Two French shallops of Newhauen had taken them besides Hunflue, and beaten backe a shallop of the enimies, slaieng ten or twelue Frenchmen that came forth of Hunflue to haue succored the hoies. The fiue and twentith of Nouember, there landed at Newhauen six hundred souldiors Esterlings, vnder the leading of Auerie Darsie, Reginald Higate, and William Twedie, each of them hauing his appointed number of two hundred to his ensigne.

Moreouer, where as well diuerse prentises, as other Englishmen were come ouer, since the placing of the garrison in that towne of Newhauen, not offering their seruice anie waie, other than by straggling abroad to seeke pillage, whereby they fell oftentimes into the hands of the enimies, both to the dishonor of their countrie, & losse of their owne lines. For reformation hereof proclamation was made the last of Nouember, that all Englishmen within the said towne, aboue the age of sixteene yeares, and vnder three score, being not reteined in the queens maiesties paie, should at one of the clocke that present daie repaire to the bulworke called the bulworke of saint Andrewes, there to present his name & person to the comptrollor, that order might be taken how to employe them in some certeintie of seruice, vpon paine to euerie one failing hereof to suffer ten daies imprisonment, & also to be banished the towne.

The French men beaten into Harflue.

The same daie the queenes ship called the Hare, comming from Portsmouth, arriued at Newhauen; and in hir came sir John Portinarie, whose ripe skill, deepe iudgement, and great experience in matters of fortification had bred in him such knowledge, as he may worthilie be called a maister in that science. They were by the waie assailed by a French ship of foure score and ten tuns and better: but they that were aboord in the Hare, so manfullie acquited themselues, that they vanquished the enimies, tooke the same ship, & brought hir with them being laden with wines, which they meant to haue conueied to the aduersaries in some garrison. The same daie sir John Poyer landed at Newhauen, bringing ouer with him fiue hundred souldiors out of Denshire, for a supplie of the garrison there. He himselfe returned backe into England, but the souldiors were appointed to the leading of other capteins: so that Francis Summerset, brother to the earle of Worcester had three hundred of them; Oliuer Manners an hundred, and Edward Dymsbie the other hundred. On tuesdaie the eight of December monsieur de Beauuois, capteine Francis Summerset, and capteine Edward Horsleie, with diuerse other capteins, officers and gentlemen, rode to the Reingraue, lieng at a faire house not farre from Mondeuille, where they dined with him, had great and hartie cheere, and after returned againe to Newhauen. The same daie the Reingraue sent for a present vnto my lord of Warwike, a great horse, verie faire, with saddle and bridle; esteemed to be well worth an hundred pounds.

The death of the lord Greie of Wilton.

Moreouer, the same daie at night, the Double Rose with certeine other botes and French shallops, passed forth of the hauen: Edward Dudleie, and capteine John Ward being aboord in the said Double Rose, with diuerse other Englishmen & Frenchmen, to the number of a hundred good souldiors, who sailing downe the riuer landed beside Tankeruille, and late close all that night in the wood. And in the morning about nine of the clocke monsieur Bimar, ensignebearer to the counte Montgomerie, with six or seauen Frenchmen vnarmed went to the castell gate, and there fell in talke with monsieur Dimenè, who was capteine of that fortresse, hauing with him about ten souldiors that were appointed to remaine with him vpon the gard of the same castell. Whilest they were thus in talke, the Englishmen and other Frenchmen comming forth of the wood that was there at hand, reared vp their ladders, which they had brought with them for that purpose, at the breach which was made the summer before by the duke Daumale;

Daumale; and entring by the same, came downe into the base court. Which thing when the French soldiors that kept talke with them within at the castell gate perceiued, they began to laugh. The capteine of the castell therwith turning his face, & beholding as good as three score armed men within the castell at his backe, he suddenlie said: Ha, ie suis vóstre, I am yours sirs, and so yéelded with his ten soldiors. And in this sort was the castell taken, & the capteine brought prisoner to Newhauen.

On the twelfe of December, at ten of the clocke in the morning, the earle of Warwike, monsieur de Beauuois, and monsieur de Brícquemault, with all their horsemen & three thousand footmen, passed forth of Newhauen vnto Harflue, out of which towne there issued seauen hundred Reisters of the retinue of the counte Reingraue, and three hundred footmen, who fell in skirmish with the French and Englishmen verie hotlie: but at length the Englishmen draue them to the verie gates of Harflue, and slue them euen at the same gates, and vpon the walles of the towne; insomuch that they were constreined to shut their gates, and off went the ordinance from the gates and bulworks, discharging bullets amongst the English soldiors frælie. But yet there were not slaine past seuen of the English part, albeit diuerse were hurt and wounded, & amongst other was monsieur de Beauuois shot into the side of the necke through his gorget, and capteine Antwisell through the arme. Moreouer, whereas they carried forth with them foure barrels of gunpowder to mainteine the skirmish, through negligence by setting fire in the same, there were to the number of twentie grœuouslie burned. Of the enimies were slaine that daie aboue thirtie, and hurt aboue fiftie. Manie of their horsses were also slaine in this skirmish, which continued aboue three houres. As the Englishmen were returning backe, the Reingraue with two hundred horsses, and a certeine number of footmen, was laid fast by in an ambush, thinking to haue cut off part of their men: but he failed of his purpose. For the lord lieutenant marching with his men in battell araie, brought them home in safetie, without other impeachment. The seauentéenth of December, the counte Montgomerie, and sir Hugh Paulet arriued at Newhauen in one of the quœnes ships called the Aid.

The nintéenth of December a proclamation was made for orders to be obserued, conterning the imbarking of such soldiors as were licenced to depart by passeport or otherwise: and likewise prohibiting the taking into anie vessell anie victs fish, wine, sugar, or anie houshold stuffe without spetiall licence of the lord lieutenant. Whilest things passed thus in Normandie at Newhauen & thereabouts, where the earle of Warwike & other valiant capteines were readie to make proofe of their high prowesse in time & place as occasion might serue, there ended his life at home that honorable baron, and right famous capteine in his daies William lord Greie of Wilton, knight of the most noble order of the garter, and at that present gouernor of Werwike, and warden of the east marches against Scotland. He deceased the fiue and twentith of December, in the yeere 1562, at Chelhunt in Hertfordshire, then the house of Henrie Denie esquier that had married mistresse Honor Greie, the said lord Greies onelie daughter. ¶ The six and twentith of December the counte de Montgomerie tooke shipping at Newhauen rode, accompanied with foure hundred harquebutters Frenchmen, and sailed to Dœpe, there to be gouernor of that towne. He went in an English barke belonging to Nicholas Malbie secretarie to the earle of Warwike lord lieutenant.

The third of Januarie a shallop that was sent the same morning from Newhauen, laden with bœre and other victels to passe vnto Tankeruille, was assailed about Harflue, by a shallop of Hunflue, which droue the hoie to the shore: so as the Englishmen forsoke their hoie, and came running to Newhauen, to declare what had happened. Herevpon the lord lieutenant sent forth foure French shallops by water, and the horsemen with six hundred footmen passed forth by land, and vsed such diligence, that they came euen as the Frenchmen were haling vp the hoie towards Harflue: and skirmishing with the Frenchmen (being foure score good harquebutters) for the space of a long houre, at length recouered the hoie, and toke three of their shallops with their ordinance, which they brought to Newhauen, with the losse of one onelie man, an harquebutter of capteine Zouches band. The fourth of Januarie in the morning, the English scout, being thirtie good harquebutters, were set vpon by the enimies that droue them vnto the verie gates. They shot also with their harquebusses into the towne, and ouer the mount rotall among the English soldiors. They hurt at that present three of the scouts; but when they perceiued the Englishmen were in a readinesse to approch them, they departed, being in number three hundred horsemen and a thousand footmen, soldiors of Dondeuille and Harflue. The fift of Januarie were apprehended capteine Blondell, capteine Poucombell, monsieur Dimense, and Vitanna with others, for some conspiracie or traitorous practise which they went about, and had maliciouslie contriued. The same daie capteine Edward Horseie with his two hundred soldiors, & capteine Francis Blunt with his hundred toke shipping at Newhauen rode, and sailed to Dœpe, there to remaine with the counte Montgomerie, whose wife the countesse Montgomerie went also with them to hir husband the same time.

On the saturdaie following, the twelfe daie after Christmasse, being the ninth of Januarie, a great tempest of wind and thunder happened in the towne of Leicester, which vncouered two and fortie baies of houses, and ouerthrew manie, renting and tearing them in peeces, in a strange and marueilous maner. The people that were assembled that daie in the market place to buie and sell their vsuall chafer, wares, and commodities, were sore amazed and astonied with the hidiousnesse of that most outragious & violent tempest. On thursdaie the 14 of Januarie at one of the clocke in the morning, there issued forth of Newhauen three score horsemen, and a thousand footmen, all English; & comming to Dondeuille, where the Reingraue laie, gaue to them within an alarum, but neither the Reisters, nor the Almane footmen, nor French that were within that towne would come forth: and therefore after the Englishmen had tarried there the space of foure houres, they returned backe againe to Newhauen.

The fiftéenth of Januarie, at one of the clocke in the afternoone, there issued forth of Newhauen three score horsemen, and fiftéene hundred footmen, which comming to Harflue, gaue a like alarum to that towne, but none of the garrison there would come forth: whereupon the Englishmen returned home againe to Newhauen. The sixteenth of Januarie, the castell of Tankeruille was surrendred to the Reingraue, after he had laine about it eight daies, with two thousand horsemen and footmen. It was now yeelded by composition (after it had béene kept by the space of thirtie eight daies) that those within should depart with bag and baggage, the gallie being sent from Newhauen to fetch them awaie. The 19 of Januarie, there landed at Newhauen capteine Tremaine, with 50 horssemen verie well appointed to serue the quænes maiestie there. The foure and twentith of Januarie, Francis Clerke Frenchman arriued at Newhauen, with two tall ships of his owne, right well appointed for the wars, bringing with him three rich prises, valued at about fiftie thousand crownes, one of them was a mightie great hulke, laden with wood & allume. The 26 of Januarie, capteine Tremaine with all his horssemen, & capteine Clerke with his Scotish horsmen, and 600 footmen, went forth of Newhauen towards Pondeuille, & by the waie in a little village, there was a French capteine came forth of Pondeuille, named monsieur Emerie, hauing with him thirtie souldiers, where falling in hand to spoile the same village, the pezzants about gathered themselues togither, and set vpon him and his souldiers. Now whilest they were thus in fight, the Scotish horssemen came suddenlie vpon them, toke the said capteine sore wounded, slue twelue of his soldiers, & toke fouretæne other of them prisoners, whome with their capteine wounded (as he was) they brought home the same night vnto Newhauen.

The fift of Februarie, two ships of Britons laden with Gascoigne wines, butter, bakon, lard, salt, and other vittels, were brought into Newhauen by a shallop of Billebeuf, that was resiant with other Frenchmen in Newhauen, serning against the papists, and had taken those two vessels, as they were going to victell the enimies.

The first of Februarie three faire mightie ships of warre, belonging to Francis Clerke, brought into Newhauen three rich prises, laden with sackes, bastards, sugar, orenges, graines, and other merchandizes. This Clerke had not beene forth past six weeks at this time, and yet he had got aboue eighténe prises, well worth by iust valuation the summe of fiftie thousand pounds. On saturdaie the first of Februarie, a souldier of capteine Appleyards band was executed in the market place; for that contrarie to order taken and published afore that time by proclamation, he had not onelie drawen his weapon against another souldier, but also maimed him, and plated other lewd parts in contempt of the lord lieutenants commandements. There was another also condemned to die, and two others adiudged to lose their hands: but the lord lieutenant of his mercifull clemencie granted to those three his pardon, for their passed offenses. On sundaie the seuenth of Februarie, was Hunflue summoned by an herald, sent from the French admerall, monsieur de Chatillon. On mondaie the eight of that moneth, the said admerall came before Hunflue, with six thousand horssemen Reisters, and other of his owne retinues, beside footmen, and a thousand horssmen of the countries thereabout. And about six of the clocke at night there was a great peale of ordinance shot off at Newhauen for a welcome to the said admerall.

The admerall of France commeth Hunflue.

The twelfe of Februarie, the French gallies of Newhauen passing forth, and wafting about Hunflue to seeke aduentures, in hope of suertie, by reason the lord admerall of France laie therbi at Touque, rode at an anchor: whilest some of them that were aboord in hir went on land, to gaine somwhat of the enimies. But they within Hunflue perceiuing this, made out their great gallies, with fiftie good mariners and souldiers, who comming vpon the gallies of Newhauen lieng at anchor, put hir in great danger of taking. For there were but fifténe men left aboord in hir at that present, whereof three of them were Englishmen, who perceiuing in what danger they stood, waied anchor with all speed, and drew towards the shore, to take in the rest of their companie; and getting them aboord vnto them, they manfullie stood to their defense, being in all but foure and twentie men. Neuertheless, they so behaued themselues, that continuing in fight aboue a long houre, at length they ouercame their enimies, slue seuen of them outright, wounded seuen and thirtie, toke their gallie and brought hir to Newhauen, with thirténe bels, diuerse copes, and church ornaments, sheepe, and other spoiles, which they had got abroad in the countrie, togither with three and fortie good prisoners, and the artillerie which was found aboord in the foresaid great gallie, wherewith she was verie well appointed and furnished.

Of the French protestants there were but three slaine and six hurt, and one of the three Englishmen was also hurt. As it hath béene crediblie reported, the French protestants might thanke those three Englishmen that were with them in their gallies for that their good hap: for if they had not manfullie stood to it at the first, and bestowed such artillerie as they had aboord with them freshlie against the enimies, the French had yælded. But by Gods good helpe, and their worthie courage, the victorie remained on their side. The fouretéenth of Februarie there came from the lord admerall of France, lieng then at Touque, monsieur de Rohen, and monsieur de Grandemont, a knight of the order, monsieur Telegnie the admerals sonne in law, and diuerse other French gentlemen, to confer with the lord lieutenant, who receiued them right gladlie, and made them great cheere. They remained in Newhauen till the eightéenth of Februarie, and then departed and went to Caen, whither the said lord admerall was remoued, & had entred the towne, & laie within it, preparing with all speed to besiege the castell.

There were sent to him from Newhauen the five & twentith of Februarie, seuen canons, two demie culuerings, & one minion. On the morrow following being fridaie, and six and twentith of Februarie, sir Nicholas Throckmorton knight, monsieur Briquemault, and monsieur Beaupuis, with a thousand souldiers French, and as manie English, to wit, capteine Zouch, capteine Twedie, capteine Vigate, each of them with two hundred: capteine Iohn Ward, captsine Parkinson, capteine Saule, maister Wheeler, and capteine Fisher with his band, each of them with his hundred, and capteine Pelham with the labourers were imbarked in the rode at Newhauen, and sailed forth towards Caen, to come to the siege which the admerall of France had laid to the castell there.

A proclamation to be packing out of Newhauen.

The eight and twentith of Aprill, proclamation was made, that all the papists, and the wiues and children of all them that were departed forth of Newhauen, and made their abode at that present in Montreuilliers, Harflue, or elsewhere abroad in the countrie, and likewise all other, whome the last proclamation for their auoiding out of the towne in anie wise touched, should depart on saturdaie then next insuing, on paine to haue their bodies arrested as prisoners, and their goods to be confiscate. Other articles were conteined in the same proclamation, as well for the forreners that should come forth of the countrie to the market, as for the behauiour and demeanor of the French inhabitants of the towne, with promise of reward to such as should discouer and apprehend anie espiall, either dwelling in the towne, or comming and going to or from it. The first of Maie, Garter principall king of armes arriued at Newhauen, bringing with him the garter to the lord lieutenant, chosen on S. Georges daie last past to be one of the confréers of that most honorable order. The fourth of Maie proclamation was made, that all the French burgesses & others should bring and deliuer all their armour and weapon into the towne hall of Newhauen, which commandement was incontinentlie obeied and accomplished.

A proclamation for auoiding.

The seauenth of Maie, proclamation was made for the auoiding of all such, whome the former proclamations had in anie wise touched, for their departure forth of the towne, that they should depart by tuesdaie next (the ministers of the church excepted) and that none should enter into the towne, of what condition or estate soeuer he should be, without licence of the lord lieutenant, except he were a burgesse of the towne, and of the number of those that had their names inrolled, as by the rols lastlie made it might appeare, on paine to be apprehended as good and lawfull prisoners. The twelfe of Maie it was prohibited by proclamation to all burgesses, inhabitants, and others, not to go vnto Harflue, or Montreuilliers, or elsewhere out of sight of the towne of Newhauen, on paine to be taken as lawfull prisoners. The fifteenth of Maie, a marriner of the great gallie suffered in the market place of Newhauen, for robbing and pilfering of ships there in the hauen, and three other that were condemned for the like offense had their pardons.

Ministers excepted.

Places forbidden by proclamation to be resorted vnto.

Execution for pilfering.

A proclamation for the auoiding of the French out of Newhauen.

The sixteenth of Maie was proclamation made, that all Frenchmen, being within the towne of Newhauen, otherwise called Haure de Grace, as well men, women, as children, should depart the towne, betwixt that present time and six of the clocke at night on the next daie being mondaie, except surgians, apothecaries, bakers, butchers, smiths, masons, locksmiths, carpenters, and other such artificers, vpon paine to be attached as good and lawfull prisoners, and their goods to be confiscat. By the tenor of these seuerall proclamations it maie appeare, that the lord lieutenant proceeded nothing rigorouslie against the French, in remouing them forth of the towne; although it maie be, that some which had to deale therein, dealt hardlie inough with them. But in such cases there must of necessitie be some diligent heedfulnesse vsed, for otherwise in such packing away, some might peraduenture carie with them too much, & others too litle. But howsoeuer this mater was handled, true it is, that it was thought expedient to auoid the French out of the towne. For after the duke of Guise was slaine before Orleance, and that the parties were agreed, as by edict of the pacification published in March last past it maie appeare, the whole deuises as well of them of the one religion as the other tended to this end, how to recouer the towne of Newhauen out of the Englishmens hands, either by practise or open force. And such intelligence was vsed betwixt the French within that towne, and the enimies without to bring this to passe, that the English could assure themselues no more of the one than of the other, and so were driuen for their owne safeties, to rid the towne of so doubtfull partakers.

The Englishmen for their owne securitie were forced to double their watch nightlie.

The seuen and twentith of Maie, proclamation was made, that all maner of furniture and apparell, apperteining to ships within the garrison, hauen, or rode of the towne of Newhauen, should be brought in: or a note to be giuen therof in writing to the lord lieutenant and councell there, before twelue of the cloke the next day. Saturdaie the two and twentith of Maie, about one of the clocke in the morning, the Reingraue with fiue hundred horsemen, and twentie two ensignes of footmen, came downe to the village called Lheure, neere vnto the new fort, which by order of the lord lieutenant was latelie before begun to be built, sir John Portinarie being chiefe deuiser of the fortifications about the same. The enimies meaning was, to haue taken the same fort by a sudden assault: but the English scouts looking well to their charge, gaue intelligence to the lord lieutenant thereof, who incontinentlie going to the bulworke royall, set out by the posterne capteine John Ward with his hundred souldiers, and capteine Parkinson with his hundred, to passe to the fort, there to be an aid and defense to them that laie in the same.

The Reingraue with his forces.

About three of the clocke in the morning, the Reingraue suddenlie with his bands of horsemen and footmen gaue them in the fort an hot alarum; and immediatlie the earle of Warwike gaue in charge to these capteins, Read, Apleyard, Cottie, Couch, Antwisell, Ward, Morton, and Parkinson, hauing with them a thousand footmen, and twentie horsemen, to set vpon the enimies in the village of Lheure, neere adioining to the said new fort, where the valiant English souldiers shewed well the wonted valure of their worthie ancestors, giuing such an hardie onset vpon their aduersaries, that greater manhood had not lightlie apeared in any incounter than was vsed by those martiall capteins, and their warlike bands at that present, to the high honor of their countrie: insomuch that they beat backe their enimies, slue and tooke of them to the number of foure hundred, beside thirtie faire horses, and an ensigne, which one Gallwike lieutenant to capteine Antwisell got.

The hardie onset of the Englishmen made vpon their aduersaries.

Amongst the numbers of them that were slaine, there were found aboue thirtie handsome gentlemen and verie well appointed. To conclude, the Englishmen behaued themselues so manfullie on each side, that by plaine force of armes they drone the enimies quite out of the village, & after set it on fire, because the enimies should not come to incampe therein, as their purpose was to haue done at that present. The six and twentith of Maie, the Frenchmen in number about three thousand horsemen and footmen came downe towards the windmils, neere to the bulworke called saint Andzelles, against whom the English horsemen and footmen issued forth of the towne, giuing them a right hot skirmish, which continued for the space of two houres, insomuch that there were slaine of the French to the number of 200; beside an hundred and aboue that were hurt. On the English side that daie were lost about a dozen zen or thirteene persons, and amongst others, was capteine Tremaine slaine, and manie hurt. To conclude, the Englishmen like hardie and worthie souldiers wan and kept the field, so as the Frenchmen in the end were driuen to retire, and besides other losses which they receiued, they had aboue fiftie of their horsses killed and hurt.

The Frenchmen driuen to retire.

In this skirmish, being one of the notablest that had beene lightlie seene manie a date before, capteine Horsleie shewed worthie proofe of his most valiant courage, winning to himselfe such commendation, as the same will not be forgotten, whilest anie shall remaine aliue that beheld his manfull dealings: being such at that present, as deserue to be registred in the booke of fame, & to continue with posteritie for euer. On saturdaie the fift of June at seuen of the clocke at night, the Reinsgraue hauing laid in the village of Lheure an ambush of six hundred horssemen, and fiftéene hundred footmen, there came downe also betweéns the abbeie and the village called Englesield towards the towne, the number of a thousand footmen, which began a verie hot skirmish, first at the new fort, comming euen hard to the ditches, where the Englishmen manfullie incountered them. Herewith also the Reinsgraue apointed other to come downe, and approch the bulworks of saint Addresses, saint Francis, & saint Michaell, and to (conclude) round about the towne: so that there were of them to the number of six thousand that were imploied in this skirmish, which was maintained right fercelie for the space of two hours, with verie sharpe and cruell fight: in the end the enimies were forced to giue place, with the losse of fiue hundred of their men, Almans, Frenchmen, Gascoignes, and Spaniards.

The Englishmen verelie in this seruice shewed, that they were nothing degenerat from the ancient race of their noble progenitors. Besides those that were slaine on the French part, amongst whom was one of their capteins of good account amongst them, they tooke also Ballompeere an Almane, colonell ouer ten ensignes of footmen. The presence of the lord lieutenant was not wanting that date, both to incourage his worthie souldiers, and also to see them aplied with weapon and munition, so as they should not be vnprouided of anie thing that was needfull for seruice. Of Englishmen there was hurt capteine Gilbert, and capteine Pelham, and about fiftéene other hurt and slaine. The seuenth of June capteine Edward Dudleie arriued at Newhauen, with an hundred souldiers. The morrow after, the first canon shot light within the towne of Newhauen, neére to the bulworke of saint Addresses, striking into the house where capteine Wheéler was lodged, which shot being brought to my lord of Warwike by Blewmantell pursuant at armes, his honor beholding it, reioised thereat, and said, by Gods grace he would answer them againe.

The hardie onset of the Englishmen made vpon their aduersaries.

The ninth of June arriued at Newhauen three capteins with their bands, of an hundred a peece, being of the garrison of Berwike: to wit, capteine Tremaine, capteine Cotnewall, & capteine Carew. Edward Randoll also landed there the same date, apointed to be knight marshall. For ye must vnderstand, that sir Adrian Poinings, being knight marshall vpon his returne into England, was otherwise emploid, and went not backe againe: and then was sir Thomas Finch of Kent apointed to go ouer to supplie the roome of knight marshall: who making his prouision readie, sent ouer his brother Erasmus Finch to haue charge of his band; and his kinsman Thomas Finch to be his prouost marshall, whilest staieng till he had euerie thing in a readinesse to passe ouer himselfe. At last, he imbarked in one of the quéenes maiesties ships called the Greiehound, hauing there aboord with him, besides three score and six of his owne retinue, fourteéne other gentlemen, two of them being brethren to the lord Wentworth, James Wentworth, and John Wentworth, with diuerse others, who in the whole (accounting the mariners) amounted vnto the number of 200 persons and vpward. And as they were on the furthest coast toward Newhauen, they were by contrarie wind and foule weather driuen backe toward the coast of England; and plieng towards Rie, they forced the capteine of the ship, a verie cunning seaman named William Maline, and also the maister and mariners, to thrust into the hauen before the tide, and so they all perished, seuen of the meaner sort onlie excepted, where of three died shortlie after they came to land.

Sir Thomas Finch drowned.

The dead bodie of sir Thomas Finch amongst others was cast on shore, & being knowne, was conueied home to his house, and there buried in his parish church. After this mischance, and losse of that worthie gentleman, the said Edward Randoll was appointed knight marshall, who ordeined a right sufficient personage, capteine John Shute, to be his prouost marshall. The fiftéenth of June, capteine Richard Sanders, and capteine William Saule, with their bands of an hundred souldiers a peéce, and capteine Drurie, with two hundred, arriued at Newhauen: and the morrow after arriued capteine Roberts with another hundred of souldiers. And on the seuenteenth of June, being thursdaie, sir Francis Knolles, vicechamberleine of the quéenes maiesties house landed there, béeing sent ouer by hir maiestie and hir councell, to view the state of the towne.

A supplie of souldiers arriue at Newhauen.

Sir Francis Knolles arriuall.

On fridaie the eightéenth of June, a sergeant of capteine Blunts band, and a souldior of capteine Darcies band, were executed in the market place of Newhauen, for drawing their weapons against their capteins, and forsaking their appointed places of warding, and such other lewd parts which they had committed. The fiue and twentith of June, proclamation was made, that no souldior of the new fort should resort to the towne of Newhauen, without licence of his capteine, or some of his principall officers, on paine of death: or that anie man should presume to passe the limits of the said new fort, except vpon occasion of seruice, in companie of his capteine or lieutenant, on like paine. And this order was taken, because diuerse straggling abroad, had béene taken prisoners, and slaine by the enimies, to their owne reproch, & hinderance of the princes seruice. The eight and twentith of June, the Frenchmen came downe to the village of Lheure, & there verie neére to the fort began to skirmish with the Englishmen. There were of them ten ensignes of footmen, and two hundred horssemen. This skirmish lasted three houres, and yet there were not past foure slaine. The night following, they placed fiue canons betwixt the towne and the brickehils, and likewise they placed other péces of their artillerie at the foresaid village of Lheure, so that they shot both into the towne and fort.

A long skirmish without anie great hurt.

Canons placed to beate the towne.

The first of July about midnight, they issued forth of their trenches, and skirmished with the English scouts, drone them vnder the bulworke of saint Addresses, and there perceiuing that the Englishmen had a priuie sallie out, after a long skirmish they retired. They had meant to haue set the mils belonging to the towne on fire: but they had such plate made them, that about three of the clocke in the morning, they became to be quiet, and left the Englishmen in rest, hauing done to them little or no hurt at all. The great ordinance on both sides was not idle, whilest this skirmish was in hand. The second and third of Julie, there landed nine hundred souldiors that came forth of Northfolke and Suffolke, yellow clokes and blew clokes verie well appointed, having to their capteins Ferdinando Liggens, Philip Sturlete, John Highfield, and Edward Dyuer. Also there came the same time fiftie carpenters, sixteene sawyers, and eight smiths in hir woorks. Moreouer, on the third daie of Julie, about ten of the clocke at night, the French gaue a great alarum to the towne, beat in the scouts: but incontinentlie issued forth fiue hundred souldiors out at the salliens place, vnder the greene bulwoorke, and beat the Frenchmen backe into their trenches, and kept them waking all that night.

Capteine Sanders hurt and dieth.

The same time, capteine Sanders was hurt with a shot in the leg, whereof he shortlie after died: other losse at that time the Englishmen receiued not. The fift of Julie, a proclamation was made for souldiors to resort in time of alarums, vnto that part & quarter, which was assigned to their capteins, and not to absent themselues from their ensignes, whether it were at alarums, watch, ward, or other seruice. The sixt of Julie, about three of the clocke in the morning, the enimies planted three canons, and three culuerings, discharging that morning to the number of foure score and ten shots: but perceiuing they did little hurt, they staied their shoting, sauing that now and then they shot into the bulwoorke, and ouer it into the towne: they also leuelled a peece, and shot it off towards the new gallie, slue therein two men, and hurt three or foure other. The same daie, a canon and a culuering were sent forth of the towne to the new fort. The twelfe of Julie, about foure of the clocke in the morning, the French laid batterie to the bulwoorke of saint Andrewes, continuing the same all that daie. They also dismounted the same daie the ordinance in the steeple of Newhauen, and beat downe the great bell, cleane defacing the steeple. They discharged that daie against the towne (as was gathered by due estimation) to the number of twelue hundred canon shot.

Ordinance planted and discharged in great numbers.

The ordinance in the steeple dismounted.

William Robinson killed. William Bromfield hurt.

The same euening was William Robinson esquier, waterbailife of the towne of Newhauen slaine with a shot; and also William Bromfield maister of the ordinance hurt with the same, and being conueied ouer into England, he shortlie after died of that hurt. The fourteenth of Julie, sir Hugh Paulet knight landed at Newhauen, bringing with him eight hundred souldiors out of Wiltshire and Glocestershire. The same daie came the Frenchmen downe to the number of three thousand, euen hard to the gates of the towne, beating the Englishmen out of their trenches: but yet in the end, they were forced to retire, and of Englishmen there were not past twentie slaine, and about an hundred hurt. But the Frenchmen (as was esteemed) lost aboue foure hundred horssemen and footemen, albeit they toke from the Englishmen at that present a culuering, which was set forth to annoie them. But their force at that time was such, as they preuailed, & so retired with that peece, though they well paied for it. The same daie also in the after noone, the little galeasse called the Fox, went out of the hauen, fraught with fiftie men, to flanke alongst the shore, and to beate the Frenchmen with hir shot; but as she was shoting off at them, a linnen stocke fell into a barrell of powder and set it on fire together with the vessell, so that she suddenlie sanke, and all that were aboord in hir were lost, sauing fifteene that saued themselues by swimming.

The galeasse burnt by casualtie.

The one and twentith of Julie, the constable of France, accompanied with the marshals Montmorancie and Burdillon, and manie other lords and knights of the order, came to the abbeie of Grauslle, where the marshall Brissacke was lodged, who had the generall charge in the armie, before the comming of the said constable. They dined togither there in the said Brissacks lodging, and after dinner they sat in councell togither how to proceed in the siege. Frisdaie the three and twentith of Julie, the constable came into the trench that was cast ouer against the bulwoorke of saint Andrewe, alongst by the sea side, and sent his trumpet to summon the towne. The lord lieutenant appointed sir Hugh Paulet to go forth, & make the answer in his name: which was in effect, that the queens maiestie of England had appointed him and others to keepe that towne; and therefore they meant not to deliuer it to anie other person, without hir graces especiall commandement. In the meane time, there were diuerse of the English capteins and gentlemen, which accompanied the said sir Hugh, offered the wine which they had brought out of the towne with them in flagons of siluer and guilt, vnto such capteins and gentlemen as accompanied the trumpet by commandement of the constable, to surueie the state of the trenches, and Palisad, as the French writers themselues confesse. Amongst others, there was capteine Monines the lieutenant of one of the ensignes coronels of monsieur Dandelot, with whom capteine Leighton, being of acquaintance, had some talke.

The Englishmen and Frenchmen were no sooner departed, they to their trenches, and the Englishmen into the towne, but that the enimies hauing planted that morning eight canons in batterie against the castell, and the bulwoorke of the hauen, caused the same to be shot off, continuing the same till wednesdaie at noone, being the eight and twentith of Julie. There were six other canons also planted by them in the meane space, which likewise made batterie to the castell, and to the townegate. In this meane time also, Cuthert Vaughan comptrollor, departed out of this life, a skilfull man of warre, and no lesse circumspect than hardie, both to preserue those which he had vnder his conduction, and to incourage them to doo manfullie, when time thereto serued. Saturdaie, the foure & twentith of Julie, the batterie still continuing as before, certeine peeces were bent also to beat and trauerse the hauen. The Englishmen therefore setting fire on two windmils that stood there, abandoned a trench which they kept: and the Palisad, capteine Poiet, lieutenant of an other of the ensignes coronels of the French footmen vnder monsieur Dandelot, entred with his band, and toke possession of a tower that stood at the end of the said Palisad. The French yet had hot abiding there, notwithstanding all the diligence and policie which they could vse to lodge there in safetie. Among others, capteine Richlieu maister of the campe, was hurt in the shoulder with an harquebuse shot.

The marshall Montmorancie caused a platforme to be raised, ioining to the Palisad, where about euening the same daie he planted foure peeces of artillerie. On sundaie the fiue and twentith of Julie, monsieur de Estrée, great maister of the artillerie, accompanied with the seneschall of Agenois, vsed all diligence that might be to place the artillerie for batterie: whereunto also, monsieur de Caillac applied himselfe by the constables commandement, who had compounded a matter in variance betwixt him and monsieur de Estrée. This sundaie and mondaie following, they were verie buse to bring their purpose in that behalfe to passe, & likewise to aduance their trench vnto the side of the breach. shall Montmorencie, accompanied with diuerse lords & knights of the order, remained all mondaie in the trenches, to prepare things readie for the batterie, not without some danger of his person. For the stones that were beaten with the bullets comming out of the towne flew verie fast about his eares, of the which there was one that hit him a blow on the shoulder, an other of them philipped him on the fingers, and lighting also in other parts of his bodie, if his armor had not defended him the better, he had not escaped without further harme. The same daie, the prince of Conde and the duke of Montpensier came to the campe, and alighting at the constables lodging, went from thence to the trenches, to relieue the marshall Montmorencie, and to supplie his rome, whilest he might in the meane time go to supper with his father, and so take his rest. Monsieur Destrée, and the other that had charge about the planting and ordering of the artillerie, vsed such diligence, and were so earnestlie called vpon and incouraged by the prince of Conde, continuallie remaining in the trenches, that on tuesdaie in the morning, the artillerie began to batter the bulwarke of saint Adreffes, and other places.

The place of Conde and the duke of Montpensier.

The bulwarke of saint Adreffes battered.

This was done not without great danger of the pioners and men of warr that garded them, for as the French desperatlie made their approch, so they were made by English gunners to tast the bitter fruit that the canon & culuerings yeelded. But such was the multitude of the Frenchmen that were now assembled togither, in hope to recouer that towne, which being possessed by the English, cut off all traffike from Rouen and Paris, and so consequentlie from the cheefe parts of the whole realme of France, that with their generall aid, and drawing the water downe to the sea, the marishes were made passable and firme ground, which to men of great experience was thought a thing vnpossible. The castell, the walles, and other defenses of the towne were battered, breaches made, and the trench which before the comming of the constable, was but brought to the point ouer against the bulwarke of saint Adreffes, was now within foure daies aduanced neere hand the space of two miles, vpon the causeie or breach which was all of stone, without anie earth to couer them: so that they were driuen to make the best shift they could with woolsacks, sandbags, baskets and fagots. Yet all this had neuer come to passe, nor could haue beene wrought without infinit slaughter, and far more losse of French blood, that necessarilie should haue beene spilt, if the great mortalitie of pestilence which entred the towne about the beginning of the summer, through a malicious infection, had not so greatlie increased, that it slue & toke awaie dailie great numbers of men, beside those that being sicke thereof, escaped with life; but were yet so feeble and weake, that they were not able to helpe themselues, nor to doo anie seruice available at all.

Thus we see things in opinion impossible, by industrie possible.

The castell battered.

Cuthert Maughan departeth this life, his worthie praise.

The great inclination of pestilence in Newhauen.

There died so manie dailie through the vehemencie of the infection, that the streets laie euen full of dead corpses, not able to be remoued or buried, by reason of the multitude that perished. Herewith they were greeuouslie annoied for want of fresh vittels; but cheeflie of fresh waters, which the enimie by long siege had cut off. And now the shot of the canon, lieng within six and twentie pases of the towne, was so terrible, as the like had not lightlie beene heard of: and sundrie breaches therewith were alreadie made; namelie two verie great and easie for the enimies to enter. All these dangers and miseries notwithstanding, the worthie earle of Warwike with his captains and soldiors in couragious order stood at those seuerall breaches, readie to defend the same, if the enimies had presumed to haue giuen the assault, nothing afraid of death nor bloudie wounds; before which he preferred the seruice of his prince. And albeit the aduenture was great, yet by his owne example he incouraged other to cast awaie all dread of danger, and to shew themselues bold, which to a soldior in battell is a whetstone to set him on edge. And surelie in this point he was warriorlike minded, if a man may allow the poets words in the like sense:

Res magnæ non absque graui discrimine fiunt,
In dubijs prodest ingenerosa audacia rebus.

The high valiancie of the earle of warwike.

Which when the constable perceiued, he caused a trumpet to sound the blast of imparlee, that talke might be had for the concluding of a composition betwixt both the parties. This offer, considering that sore contagious mortalitie wherwith the towne was most grieuouslie infected, hauing so greatlie infeebled the English forces within the same, was thought not vnmet to be receiued. Hereupon, after a sallie made by the Englishmen, and a faire skirmish betwixt them and the Frenchmen that laie afore the fort de Lheure, on the tuesdaie the seauen and twentith of Julie maister William Pelham capteine of the fort, with anocher gentleman and a trumpetter, went forth by appointment, and was receiued first by monsieur de Rosses, who brought him to the marshall Montmorencie, and after by his appointment went with him by the Reingraues campe to the constable: and till his returne a truce was accorded on that side of the fort. After that maister Pelham had talked a space with the constable, the matter was put ouer till the next daie, and so he returned.

Capteine Pelham went forth to talke with the commissioners.

The commissioners appointed to talke with the constable.

The morrow after being wednesdaie, and the eight and twentith of Julie, the constable about seauen of the clocke came to the end of the trenches next to the towne, where sir Maurice Denis treasuror of the towne, sir Hugh Paulet, capteine Horsele, capteine Pelham, capteine John Shute prouost marshall, and Nicholas Malbie secretarie to my lord lieutenant came forth, and passed ouer the hauen to commune with him. And during the parlee betwixt them, a truce was accorded and assented to by both parts: the which neuertheless was broken two seuerall times through the vnrulie insolencie of certeine harquebutters. And though by the good diligence of the capteins they were incontinentlie quieted and staied: yet the valiant earle of Warwike, shewing at a breach in his hose and dublet in sight of his enimies, was by a lewd soldior of the French (contrarie to the law of armes) shot through the thigh with an harquebuse. The constable and the English commissioners appointed, had long conference togither; and before they concluded, the marshals Montmorencie and Burdellion (and at length the marshall Brissac also) came to the place where they were thus in parlee: but the constable toke vpon him to haue onelie authoritie to accept or refuse such conditions as should be offered, or agreed vnto by the English commissioners in this treatie. And so at length they passed certeine articles in forme as followeth.

Additions to Lanquet. The earle of Warwike hurt.

The constable toke vpon him to be chiefe in authoritie on the French part.

The articles of agreement touching the surrender of Newhauen.

First, that the earle of Warwike should render againe the towne of Newhauen into the hands of the said constable of France, with all the artillerie and munitions of war then being in that towne, and belonging to the French king and his subiects.

2 Item, that he should leaue the ships that were in the said towne at that present, belonging either to the king or his subiects, with all their furniture: and generallie, all such merchandize and other things, being likewise at that present within that towne, as either belonged to the king or his subiects.

3 Item, for the more suertie of the premisses, the said earle should presentlie deliuer into the hands of the said conestable, the great tower of the said hauen, so that the soldiors which were placed therin enter not into the towne: and that the said earle of Warwike should cause the gates there towards the towne to be warded, till it were in the possession of the said conestable, without planting anie ensigns on the said tower, according to the said agréement; and also that the said earle should deliuer foure such hostages as the said conestable should name.

4 Item, that the next daie, by eight of the clocke in the morning, the said erle should withdraw his soldiors which are in the fort, & deliuer it immediatlie into the hands of the said conestable, or such as should be by him appointed to receiue the same at the said houre.

5 Item, that all prisoners which haue béene taken before the said hauen, should be deliuered on either side, without paieng anie ransome.

6 Item, that the conestable should for his part suffer the said earle of Warwike, and all those that are in garrison in the said Newhauen to depart with all things whatsoeuer that belonged to the queene of England and hir subiects.

7 Item, that for the departure as well of the said earle, as the removing of his soldiors, and other things before rehearsed, the said conestable agreed to giue them six whole daies, beginning the morrow then next following; to wit, the nine and twentith of Julie: during which six daies, they might franklie and frelie take and carrie awaie all the said things. And if wind or foule weather shuld hinder, that their passage could not be made within the said terme; in this case the said conestable should grant them such further time of delaie, as might be thought reasonable.

8 Item, the said conestable did likewise permit, that all the ships and English vessels, and all other that should be appointed for the portage and conueieng awaie of the said things, should safelie and frelie passe into and fro the said hauen, without anie stais or impeachment, either by the French armie or anie other. The said foure hostages were appointed to be maister Oliuer Mahers, brother to the earle of Rutland, capteine Pelham, capteine Horsleie, and capteine Leighton. In witnesse whereof, the said lords, the conestable of France, & the earle of Warwike signed these articles the eight and twentith of Julie, 1563.

Additions to Lanquet.

The earle of Warwike commended.

Thus the earle of Warwike, as he had during the whole time of his abode there in that towne of Newhauen) shewed himselfe a right hardie & valiant capteine; so now in the end he proued himselfe to be both prudent and politike. For by accepting of these honorable conditions to go with all armor, munition, ships, goods, bag and baggage, in anie wise appertaining or belonging either to the quéenes maiestie, or to anie of hir graces subiects, he saued the liues of a great number, which otherwise scaping the scourge of the infectiue plague, must néeds haue fallen vnder the edge of the sword. The conestable, during the time of the parlée, sent his yongest sonne monsieur de Thorre to the king and queene mother, to aduertise them of the treatie of this peace. And after it was once concluded and signed by the erle of Warwike, he sent his eldest sonne the marshall Montmorencie, to present the same vnto them at Criquetot, halfe waie betweene Newhauen and Felcampe, who were right ioifull of the news: and the next daie they came to the campe, shewing great signes of their conceiued gladnesse, for the recouering of that towne thus out of the Englishmens hands.

The French king commeth to the campe before Newhauen.

On saturdaie the most part of the Englishmen tooke ship and departed homewards: for glad might he thinke himselfe that could get foorth out of that vnwholesome and vnsauorie aire. Manie sicke persons yet were left behind, impotent and not able to helpe themselues. The miserie whereof Edward Randoll esquier, high marshall of the towne, who was appointed to tarrie and sée the vttermost of the composition accomplished) perceiuing, moued with naturall pitie of his countreimen relinquished without comfort, caused the said sicke persons to be caried aboord, not sparing his owne shoulders, at that time feeble and subiect to the plague, himselfe and his men still bearing & helping the poore creatures on shipboord. A rare saiid of this reward, and no doubt in remembrance with God, the trew reuender of mercifull deserts. Thus was the towne of Newhauen redoced againe into the hands of the French, more vndoubtedlie through the extreme mortalitie that so outragiouslie afflicted the soldiors and men of warre within the same, than by the enimies inforcements, although the same was great, and aduanced to the vttermost of the aduersaries power.

John Stow. Maister Edward Randall full of pitie and commiseration.

Besides the meaner sort of those that died of the pestilence during the siege, these I do find noted as chiefe: Cuthert Vaughan comptroller of the towne, Francis Sumerset coline to the earle of Worcester, Aucrie Darcie brother to the lord Darcie, John Zouch brother to the lord Zouch, Edward Dymelbie, Thomas Dzurie alias Polgnard, Richard Croker, John Cookson, Thomas Remish, John Proud, William Sanle, Willsted Antwisell. Besides these being capteins & chiefe dieng there in that towne, or else sickening there and dieng vpon their returne into England, there were diuerse other gentlemen, and such as had charge, which likewise ended their liues by force of that cruell and most grieuous pestilent infection. There were diuerse also that were slaine, as well by cannon shot, as otherwise in the field in skirmish; as both the Tremains brethren of one birth, Nicholas and Andrew, capteine Richard Sanders, with maister Robinson, and maister Bromfield, of which two before ye haue heard: also one Leighton a gentleman, & diuerse mo whose names I know not, worthie neuertheles to be remembred & placed in ranke with such worthie men, as in their countries cause haue lost their liues, and are therefore by writers registred to liue by fame for euer.

Chiefe personages that died of the plague at Newhauen.

Diuerse of name by cannon shot, &c. slaine.

But now to passe to other matters at home. As ye haue heard, the plague of pestilence being in the towne of Newhauen, thorough the number of souldiors that returned into England the infection therof spread into diuerse parts of this realme: but especiallie the citie of London was so infected, that in the same whole yeare, that is to saie, from the first of Januarie 1562, vntill the last of December, in 1563, there died in the citie and liberties thereof (conteining one hundred & eight parishes) of all diseases twentie thousand, three hundred, three score and twelue: and of the plague being part of the number aforesaid, seuenteene thousand, foure hundred, and foure persons. And in the outparishes adioining to the same citie, being eleuen parishes, died of all diseases in the whole yeare, three thousand, two hundred, foure score and eight persons: and of them, of the plague two thousand, seuen hundred, thirtie and two. So that the whole number of all that died of all diseases, as well within the citie and liberties, as in the outparishes, was twentie three thousand six hundred and three score: and of them there died of the plague, twentie thousand one hundred thirtie and six.

John Stow. Pestilence transported from Newhauen to London.

Tempest at London by lightning and thunder.

Couent

Couent garden neere to Charingcrosse. At the same time in Essex a man was torne all to peeces as he was carieng haie, his barne was borne downe, and his haie burned: both stones and trees were rent in manie places. The councell of king Philip at Burels commanded proclamation to be made in Antwerpe and other places, that no English ship with anie cloths, should come into anie places of the low countries: their colour was (as they said) the danger of the plague, which was at that time in London, & other places of England. Neuertheless they would gladlie haue gotten our woolles, but the quéenes maiestie thorough sute of our merchant aduenturers caused the woll fleet to be discharged, and our cloth fleet was sent to Emden in east Friseland, about Easter next following, in the yeare of our Lord 1564. Forsomuch as the plague of pestilence was so hot in the citie of London, there was no tearme kept at Michaelmasse. To be short, the poore citizens of London were this yeare plagued with a threefold plague, pestilence, scarsitie of monie, and dearth of victels, the miserie whereof were too long here to write: no doubt the poore remember it, the rich by slight into the countries made shift for themselues, &c.

An earthquake was in the moneth of September in diuerse places of this realme, speciallie in Lincolne & Northamptonshires. After the election of the maior of London by the councels letters, the quéens maiesties pleasure was signified vnto sir Thomas Lodge then maior, that forsomuch as the plague was so great in the citie, the new maior elected should kéepe no feast at the Guildhall, for doubt that thorough bringing togither such a multitude, the infection might increase. For that wéeke there died within the citie and out parishes, more than two thousand: wherefore sir John Whight, the new maior, toke his oth at the vttermost gate of the tower of London. From the first daie of December, till the twelfe, was such continuall lightning and thunder, especiallie the same twelfe daie at night, that the like had not béene séene nor heard by anie man then liuing.

In the moneth of December was driuen on the shore at Grimsbie in Lincolnshire a monstrous fish, in length ninetéene yards, his taile fiftéene foot broad, and six yards betwéene his eies, twelue men stood vpright in his mouth to get the oile. For that the plague was not fullie ceassed in London, Hilarie tearme was kept at Hertford castell beside Ware. This yeare the thirteenth of Aprill, an honorable and joifull peace was concluded, betwixt the quéenes maiestie and the French king, their realmes dominions and subiects: and the same peace was proclamed with sound of trumpet, before hir maiestie in hir castell of Windsor, then being présent the French ambassadors. And shortlie after, the quéenes grace sent the right honourable sir Henrie Careie lord of Hunnesdon, now lord chamberleine (of whose honourable and noble descent it is thus written

——cuius fuerat mater tera pulchra Regina genitrix Henrici nobilis vxor) accompanied with the lord Strange, beside diuerse knights and gentlemen, vnto the French king, with the noble order of the garter, who finding him at the citie of Lions, being in those parties in progresse, he there presented vnto him the said noble order: and Garter king at armes inuested him therewith, obseruing the ceremonies in that behalfe due and requisit. The plague (thanks be to God) being cleane ceassed in London, both Easter and Midsummer tearmes were kept at Westminster. ¶ And here by the waie to note the infection of this plague to haue béene dispersed into other countries beside England, it is read in Schardius In epitome rerum gestarum sub Ferdinando primo imperatore; that the pestilence did so rage in Germanie, and poisoned such peopled places, namelie Norimberge, Francford, Magdburge, Danske, Hamburgh, and their borders, that by estimation (saith he) there died of that contagion to the number of three hundred thousand. A grieuous scourge of God (saith mine author) howbeit verie few thereby so terrified, that they reformed their wicked liues. Which plague in Germanie I therefore doo here repeat, bicause by all likelihoods it is to be gathered, that as it raged in the same yeare both there and here; so the cause maie be all one that bred so venemous an effect.]

There was on the vigill of S. Peter a watch in the citie of London, which did onelie stand in the highest streets of Cheape, Cornehill, and so forth to Algate: which watch was to the commons of the same citie as chargeable, as when in times past it had béene commendablie done. The fift of August, the quéenes maiestie in hir progresse came to the vniuersitie of Cambridge, and was of all the students (being inuested according to their degrées taken in the schooles) honourablie and ioifullie receiued in the kings college, where she did lie during hir continuance in Cambridge. The daies of hir abode were passed in scholasticall exercises of philosophie, physicke, and diuinitie: the nights in comedies, and tragedies, set forth partlie by the whole vniuersitie, and partlie by the students of the kings college, to recreat and delight hir maiestie, who both heard them attentiuelie, and beheld them chéerefullie.

At the breaking vp of the diuinitie act, being on wednesdaie the ninth of August (on the which daie she rode thorough the towne, and viewed the colleges, those godlie and ancient monuments of kings of England hir noble predecessors) she made within saint Maries church a notable oration in Latine, in the presence of the whole learned vniuersitie, to the students great comfort. ¶ A copie whereof I haue set downe, as I receiued it in writing at the hands of one that then was present, and noted the same as hir maiestie vttered it. Whose words vnto me in a letter, wherewith the same oration was sent, I doo here set downe Bona fide. This hir maiesties extemporall oration (saith he) lieng among my papers these twentie yeares and more, I thought good now to send to you, that if anie occasion be fitlie offered in the discourse of hir highnesse reigne, you maie (if you please) insert it. In truth, I my selfe neuer elsewhere read it, which hath made me euen religiouslie to preserue it. Walter Abraham Hartwell in his Regina literata, dwelling vpon this onelie argument of hir comming and doings at Cambridge, glanceth in a distich or twaine at the effect hereof. But this is the thing it selfe, as I my selfe (as most vnworthie) being both an eare and also an eie witnesse, can testifie.

tio. Quod ad propagationem spectat, vnum illud apud Demosthenem memini: Superiorum verba apud inferiores librorum locum habent, & principum dicta legum authoritatem apud subditos retinent. Hoc igitur vos omnes in memoria tenere velim: quòd semita nulla præstantior est, siue ad bona fortunæ acquirenda, siue ad principum gratiam conciliandam, quàm vt gnauiter (vt cœpistis) studijs vestris exhibeatis operam: quod vt faciatis, vos omnes oro obsecròque. De secundo stimulo, vestra nimirum expectatione, hoc vnum dico, me nihil lubenter prætermissuram esse, quod vestræ de me animæ beneuolæ concipiunt cogitationes.

Regia maiestas pollicetur se aliquod monumentum in academia relicturam.

Iam ad academiam venio. Tempore antemeridiano vidi ego ædificia vestra sumptuosa, à meis maioribus, clarissimis principibus literarum causa extructa. Et inter videndum, dolor artus meos occupauit, atque eamentis suspiria, quæ Alexandrum quondam tenuisse feruntur. Qui cum legisset multa à principibus posita monumenta, conuersus ad familiarem seu potius ad consiliarium, multùm doluit se nihil tale fecisse. Hæc tamen vulgaris sententia me aliquantùm recreauit, quæ etsi non auferre, tamen minuere potest dolorem. Quæ quidem sententia hæc est: Romam non vno ædificatam fuisse die: tamen non est ita senilis mea ætas, nec tam diu fuit, ex quo regnare cœpi, quin ante redditionem debiti naturæ (si non nimis citò Atropos lineam vitæ meæ amputauerit) aliquod opus faciam: & quandiu vita hos regit artus, nunquam à proposito deflectam.

Si non ante saltem post mortem profiteur se præstituram quod pollicetur.

Et si contingat (quàm citò futurum sit, nescio) me mori oportere, priusquam hoc ipsum quod polliceor complere possim: aliquod tamen egregium opus post mortem relinquam, quo & memoria mea in posterum celebris fiat, & alios excitem exemplo meo, & vos omnes alacriores faciam ad studia vestra. Sed iam videtis quantum interfit inter doctrinam lectam, & disciplinam animo non retentam. Quorum alterius sunt complures satis sufficientes testes: alterius autem vos omnes nimis quidem inconsyderatè testes hoc tempore effeci, quæ meo barbaro orationis genere tam diu doctas vestras aures detinuerim. Dixi.

The next daie, the went forward on hir progresse to Finchinbrooke by Huntington. The thirtith daie of August was enacted by a common councell of the citie of London, that all such citizens as from thence forth should be constreined to sell their houshold stuffe, leases of houses, or such like, should first cause the same to be cried through the citie by a man with a bell, and then to be sold by the common outcrier appointed for that purpose, and he to reteine one farthing vpon the shilling for his paines. The twentith of September arose great floods in the riuer of Thames, where through the marshes néere adioining were ouerflowed, and manie cattell drowned.

Creation of a baron name-ite sir Robert Dudleie barõ of Denbigh.

¶ The creation of sir Robert Sutton alias Dudleie knight of the garter, and maister of the horsse, to the quænes maiestie, who was created baron of Denbigh, and after earle of Leicester on Michaelmasse daie at saint James, with the gift of the manour of Killingworth, and other things there to him and his heires, to the yerlie value of foure and twentie pounds & better. First, the said lord attended on the quænes highnesse, to the chappell, and from the chappell to seruice, and when he was returned to the chamber of presence, the said lord with other departed to the lord chamberleins chamber, and shifted them: the said lord Robert in his surcot with the hood, his mantle borne before him by the lord Hunsdon, and led by the lord Clinton lord admerall by the right hand, and the lord Strange on the left hand, in their parlement robes, Garter bearing the patent, & before him the officers of armes, and so proceeded into the chamber of presence, where the quénes highnesse sat vnder the cloth of estate with the noblemen on ech side of hir, the ambassador of France was also present with another stranger an Italian.

The forme attendance at this creation.

And when the said lord with the other came in the quénes sight, they made their obeisance three times, the said lord knéeled downe: after the which Garter presented the letters patents to the lord chamberleine, and he presented the same to the quénes highnesse, who gaue it to sir William Cecill secretarie, who read the same with a lowd voice, & at the words of Creauimus, the lord of Hunsdon presented the mantle to the quéens maiestie, who put on the same, wherby he was created baron of Denbigh for him and his heires. Then the patent was read out to the end, after the which he deliuered it to the quéene againe, and hir highnesse gaue it to the said lord, who gaue hir maiestie most humble thanks, and he rose vp and departed to the chamber they came from, the trumpets sounding before him.

Then he shifted him of those robes, and put on the robes of estate of an earle, and being led by the earle of Sussex on the right hand, and the erle of Huntington on his left hand, the earle of Warwike bearing his sword the pomell vpward, and the girdle about the same, all in their robes of estate, the lord Clinton lord admerall in his parlement robes, bearing his cap with the coronall, Garter before him bearing his patent, and the other officers of armes before him, they proceeded as afore into the chamber of presence, where, after they had made their obeisance, the said earle knéeled downe, and Garter deliuered his patent to the lord chamberleine, who gaue the same to the quénes maiestie, & hir highnesse gaue the same to sir William Cecill secretarie to read, who read the same. And at the words Cincturam gladij, the earle of Warwike presented the sword to the quénes highnesse, who girt the same about the necke of the said new earle, putting the point vnder his left arme, and after hir maiestie put on his cap with the coronall. Then his patent was read out to the end, and then the said secretarie deliuered it againe to the quéene, and hir highnesse gaue it to the said new erle of Leicester, who gaue hir humble thanks for it.

And then he arose and went into the councell chamber to dinner, the trumpets sounding before, and at dinner he sat in his kirtle, and there accompanied him the foresaid ambassador of France, and the said Italian, with diuerse other erles and lords. And after the second course, Garter with the other officers of armes, proclamed the quénes maiesties stile, and after, the stile of the said earle, for the which they had fiftéene pounds, to wit, for his baronie fiue pounds, & for his earledome ten pounds, and Garter had his gowne of blacke veluet garded with three gards of the same, laid on with lace, lined through with blacke taffata, and garded on the inner side with the same, and on the sléeues eight and thirtie paire of aglets of gold. The earles stile was as followeth: Du tresnoble & puissant seigneur Robert conte de Leicestre, baron de Denbigh, cheualier du tresnoble ordre de la iarretierre, & grand esquier de la royne nostre souuereigne. On whose scutchion, conteining sundrie cotes, inuironed with the cognisances of both orders, as well S. The second of October in the afternoone, and on the morrow in the forenoone, was a solemne obsequie at Paules church in London, for Ferdinando late emperor departed. ¶ Of this emperor it is said, that lieng sicke, and so sicke that Zitard a preacher of his court then present could not hold him vp: howbeit comming at last to himselfe and somewhat in recouerie, he said to the standers by; You thought that I would neuer come againe, naie mine houre is not so soone: I dó certeinlie know that I shall not die before Whitsuntide. Now when he had liued till that daie, and eight daies after, as hauing the verie time of his departure told him by secret reuelation, (and satisfied at full touching the request that Dauid made to God about the length of his life, saieng:

Da mihi nosse meæ quæ sint stata tempora vitæ, Et quando vltima sint fata futura mihi)

he said to them that were about him: It is the holie ghosts pleasure that I should not die before saint James tide, that as he was a pilgrime among vs, so I wish him should passe my pilgrimage out of this my native countrie. After which words spoken, his disease grew to greater force and sharpnesse, insomuch that at last, euen at the verie time prefixed, namelie S. James daie, he departed this life, after he had liued sixtie yeares, nine moneths, and od daies. He gouerned the empire aboue the space of seauen yeares, & had to wife Anne quéene of Hungarie and Boheme, by whom he had fifteene children, some male; namelie, Maximilian, Ferdinand, John and Charles: also eleuen females; to wit, Elisabeth married to Sigismund king of Poland, Anne, Marie, Mawdline, Catharine, Elenor, Margarite, Barbare, Vrsule, Helen, and Ione. He is commended for his carefulnesse, his watchfulnesse, his bountifulnesse, his gentlenesse, his vprightnesse, his discrétnesse, his peaceablenesse, and other qualities, wherin he had a kind of singularitie. And thus much of him by waie of praise, as I found it readie to my hand.]¶

The seauenth of October at night, from eight a clocke till after nine of the clocke, all the north parts of the element séemed to be couered with flames of fire, proceéding from the northeast and northwest, toward the middest of the firmament, where after it had staied nigh one houre, it descended west: and all the same night (being the next after the change of the moone) séemed nigh as light as it had béene faire daie. The twentith of November in the morning, through negligence of a maiden with a candell, the snuffe falling in an hundred pounds weight of gunpowder, three houses in Bucklersburie were sore shaken, and the maid died two daies after. The one and twentith of December began a frost, which continued so extremlie, that on Newyeares euen, people went ouer and alongst the Thames on the ise from London bridge to Westminster. Some plaied at the football as boldlie there, as if it had béene on the drie land: diuerse of the court being then at Westminster, shot dailie at pricks set vpon the Thames: and the people both men and women went on the Thames in greater numbers, than in ante frést of the citie of London. On the third daie of Januarie at night it began to thaw, and on the fift daie was no ise to be séene betwéene London bridge and Lambeth, which sudden thaw caused great floods and high waters, that bare downe bridges and houses, and drowned manie people in England: especiallie in Yorkshire, Owes bridge was borne awaie with others.

The third daie of Februarie, Henrie Stuart lord Darleie, about the age of nineteéne yeares, eldest sonne to Matthew earle of Lineur (who went into Scotland at Whitsuntide before) hauing obteined licence of the quéenes maiestie, toke his iournie towards Scotland, accompanied with fiue of his fathers men, where when he came, he was honorablie receiued, & lodged in the kings lodgings, and in the summer following, he maried Marie quéen of Scotland. About this time, for the quéenes maiestie were chosen and sent commissioners to Bruges, the lord Montacute knight of the honourable order of the garter, doctor Wotton one of hir maiesties honourable councell, doctor Haddon one of the maisters of requests to hir highnesse, with others: maister doctor Aubzeie was for the merchant aduenturers of England: they came to Bruges in Lent, Anno 1565, and continued there till Michaelmasse following, and then was the diet prolonged till March in the yeare 1566, and the commissioners returned into England.

The two and twentith of Aprill, the ladie Margarite countesse of Lineur, was commanded to kéepe hir chamber at the Whitehall, where she remained till the two and twentith of June, and then conueied by sir Francis Knolles and the gard to the tower of London by water. On S. Peters euen at night, was the like standing watch in London, as had béene on the same night twelue moneths past. The sixteenth of Julie, about nine of the clocke at night began a tempest of lightning and thunder, with showers of haile, which continued till three of the clocke in the next morning, so terriblie, that at Chelmesford in Essex 500 acres of corne was destroied, the glasse windowes on the east side of the towne, and of the west and south sides of the church were beaten downe, with the tiles of their houses also, besides diuerse barnes, chimneis, and the battlements of the church, which was ouerthrowne. The like harme was done in manie other places, as at Leeds, Cranebroke, Douer, &c.

Christopher prince and margraue of Baden, with Cicilie his wife sister to the king of Swethland, after a long and dangerous iournie, wherein they had trauelled almost eleuen months sailing from Stockholme, crossing the seas ouer into Liefland, from whence by land they came about by Poland, Prussie, Pomerland, Meckelburgh, Friseland, and so to Antwerpe in Brabant, then to Calis, at the last in September landed at Douer, and the eleuenth daie of the same they came to London, and were lodged at the earle of Bedfords place neere to Iuie bridge, where within foure daies after, that is to saie, the fifteenth of September she trauelled in childbed, and was deliuered of a man child: which child the last of September was christened in the quéenes maiesties chappell of White hall at Westminster, the quéenes maiestie in hir owne person being godmother, the archbishop of Canturburie, and the duke of Norfolke godfathers. At the christening the quéene gaue the child to name Edwardus Fortunatus: for that God had so gratiouslie assisted his mother, in so long and dangerous a iournie, and brought hir safe to land in that place, which she most desired, and that in so short time before hir deliuerance.

The eleuenth of Nouember, the right honorable Ambrose earle of Warwike maried Anne eldest daughter to the earle of Bedford. For the honor and celebration of which noble mariage, a goodlie challenge was made and obserued at Westminster at the tilt, each one six courses: at the tournie twelue strokes with the sword, three puthes with the punchion staffe: and twelue blowes with the sword at bar-

The foure and twentith of December in the morning, there rose a great storme and tempest of wind, by whose rage the Thames and seas ouerwhelmed manie persons, and the great gates at the west end of S. Paules church in London (betweene the which standeth the brasen piller) were through the force of the wind, then in the westerne part of the world, blowne open. The marques of Baden returneth into his owne countrie.

The marquesse of Baden and the ladie Cicilie his wife, sister to the king of Swethen, who came into this land in the moneth of September last past (as before is declared) being then by the quéenes especiall appointment at their arriuall honorablie receiued by the lord Cobham, an honorable baron of this realme, and the ladie his wife one of the quéenes maiesties priuie chamber, now in the moneth of Aprill 1566 departed the realme againe, the marquesse a few daies before his wife, being both conducted by a like personage the lord of Aburgauennie to Douer. Certeine houses in Cornehill, being first purchased by the citizens of London, were in the moneth of Februarie cried by a belman, and afterward sold to such persons as should take them downe, and carie them from thence: which was so done in the moneths of Aprill and Maie next following. And then the ground being made plaine at the charges also of the citie, possession thereof was by certeine aldermen in the name of the whole citizens, giuen to the right worshipfull sir Thomas Gresham knight, agent to the quenes highnesse, there to build a place for merchants to assemble in, at his owne proper charges: who on the seuenth daie of June laid the first stone of the foundation (being bricke) and forthwith the workemen followed vpon the same with such diligence, that by the moneth of Nouember, in An. 1567. the same was couered with slate. The commissioners before named, appointed for the matters of Flanders, keeping their diet at Bruges, agreed to refer the whole matter to the princes on both sides: and if they could not agrée, then the merchants to haue forty daies to repare home with their merchandize, and in the meane time all things to stand as they were then. Our commissioners departed from Bruges about the sir and twentith of June.

The quéenes progresse to Oxford.

The one and thirtith of August, the quéenes maiestie in hir progresse came to the vniuersitie of Oxford, and was of all the students, which had looked for hir comming thither two yeares, so honorablie and ioifullie receiued, as either their loialnesse towards the quéenes maiestie, or the expectation of their frends did require. Concerning orders in disputations and other academicall exercises, they agreed much with those which the vniuersitie of Cambridge had vsed two yeares before. Comedies also and tragedies were plaied in Chists church, where the quenes highnesse lodged. Among the which the comedie intituled Palemon and Arcit, made by maister Edwards of the quéenes chappell, had such tragicall successe, as was lamentable. For at that time by the fall of a wall and a paire of staires, and great presse of the multitude three men were slaine.

The fift of September after disputations, the quéene at the humble suit of certeine hir nobilitie, and the K. of Spaines ambassador, made a brasegration in Latine to the vniuersitie; but so wise and pithie, as England may reioise that it hath so learned a prince, and the vniuersitie may triumph that they haue so noble a patronesse. The sixt of September after dinner, hir grace comming from Chists church ouer Carfor, and so to S. Maries, the scholers standing in order according to their degrees euen to the east gate, certeine doctors of the vniuersitie did ride before in their scarlet gownes and hods, & maisters of art in blacke gownes and hods. The maior also with certeine of his brethren did ride before hir in scarlet to the end of Magdalen bridge, where their liberties ended: but the doctors and maisters went forward still to Shotouer, a mile and more out of Oxford, bicause their liberties extended so far: and there after orations made, hir highnes with thanks to the whole vniuersitie bad them farewell, and rode to Ricote.

The queene maketh an oration to the vniuersitie.

The valiant capteine Edward Randoll esquier, lieutenant of the ordinance, and coronell of a thousand footmen, in September last past was with his band imbarked at Bristow, and within few daies after landed at Knockfergus in the north parts of Ireland; and from thence by water to a place called Derrie, by which passeth the riuer Longfoile. There the said coronell in short space fortified, to the great annoiance of Shane Oneil, and by great foresight and experience garded himselfe and his charge, till the said Oneil (to hinder and disturbe his aboad there) the twelfe of Nouember arriued with a great armie of kerne Galowglasses and horsemen, with whome the said capteine Randoll incountered, and him there so discomfited, as after that conflict he durst neuer approch the quénes power. And to his perpetuall fame, the said capteine by reason of his bold and hardie onset, that daie lost his life. Charles James the sixt of that name, son to Henrie Stuart lord of Darnlete and Marie king & quene of Scots was borne in Edenburgh castell, the nineteenth of June last past: and the eightenth of December this yeare solemnlie christened at Sterling, whose godfathers at the christening were Charles K. of France, and Philibert duke of Sauoie, and the quénes maiestie of England was the godmother, who gaue a font of gold curiouslie wrought and inamuled, waeing three hundred & three and thirtie ounces, amounting in value to the summe of 1043 pounds, nine téene shillings.

Two long streets with great riches in that towne was burnt in the yeare 1515: and likewise two more in the yeare 1564. Shane Oneil, who had most traitorouslie rebelled against the quenes maiestie in Ireland, and had done manie great outrages in the parts of Vlster, was this yeare with his great losse manfullie repelled from the siege of Dundalke by the garrison thereof: and afterward through the great valiancie and foresight of sir Henrie Sidnete knight of the order, and lord deputie of Ireland, he was so discomfited in sundrie conflicts, with the losse of three thousand fiue hundred of his men, that now foreseeing his declination to be imminent, he determined to put a collar about his necke, and disguising himselfe, to repaire to the lord deputie, and penitentlie to require his pardon to haue his life. But Neil Mackeuer his secretarie, who had incited him to this rebellion, persuaded him first to trie & treat the freendship of certeine wild Scots, that then laie incamped in Clan Iboie, vnder the conducting of Alexander Oge, and Mac Gilliam Buske, whose father and vncle Shane Oneil had latelie killed in an ouerthrow giuen to the Scots. Neuertheles he well liking this persuasion, went to the said campe the second of June, where after a dissembled interteinement, & quaffing of wine, Gilliam Buske burning with desire of reuenge for his fathers and vncles death, and ministring quarrelling talke, issued out of the tent, and made a fraie vpon Oneils men, and then gathering togither his Scots in a throng, suddenlie entred the tent againe, who there with their slaughter swords hewed in pèces Shane Oneil, his secretarie, and all his companie, except a verie few which escaped by slight.

On saint Johns euen at night was the like standing watch in London, as had beene on saint Peters euen in the yeare last before mentioned. This yeare the emperour Maximilian the second of that name, being elected into the most honourable order of the garter, the right honourable Thomas earle of Sussex, &c. knight of the same most noble order, was appointed by the quenes maiestie to go vnto the said emperour, with the said order of the garter, according to his said election. Who being honorablie accompanied with the lord North, sir Thomas Mildmaie knight, Henrie Cobham esquier, one of the pensioners, and others, departed from London the fiue and twentith of June 1567, vnto Douer, and there imbarked, landed at Calis, and his traine at Dunkirke, and so passed through the low countries to Antwerpe in Brabant, where he was honourablie receiued by the English merchants and others, and being there went to visit madame de Parma, regent of the said countries, then resident within the same towne.

From thence he passed vnto Colen, where as his lordship and traine mounted the riuer of Rhene, & by sundrie continuall daies iourneies passed by the cities of Mentz or Maguince, vnto Oppenham, & there taking his waie by land, passed through the countrie by the cities of Wormes and Spires till he came to Vlmes, standing on the riuer of Danow, where hee arriued the one and twentith of Julie: and the three and twentith his lordship rode in post to Aulspurge, called in Latine Augusta vindelicorum, nine Dutch miles from Vlmes. From thence he departed the fine and twentith of Julie, and met with his traine at Donwert, he ingrome thither vpon flotes downe by the said riuer of Danow. From thence he kept vpon his iourneie by Ingolstat, Reinspurge, in Latine Ratisbona, by Passaw and other townes, till hee came to Linz, where his lordship staied the first, second and third of August, by reason of the high waters.

And departing from thence on the fourth of August, he passed by Stoan & Cremz, by the said riuer of Danow, and so arriued at the citie of Vienna the fifth of August in this foresaid yeare 1567, where hee was receiued of the lord Smeckouites, hauing twelue horsses readie with their footclothes for his lordship, and the most respected of his traine, and so brought him to the presence of the emperour, at that present within his castell there in that citie, by whom he was right honourablie receiued, and afterwards conducted to his assigned lodging, where as all prouision was prepared and made at the emperours charges. Here his lordship continued till the fourteenth of Januarie. In which meane time the emperour verie often (as time serued) had the said earle forth with him, vnto such passimes of hunting the hart, boare, and such like, as the plentifulnesse of that countrie yeeldeth. Moreouer, during the time of his lordships abode there at Vienna, Charles archduke of Austria and Carinth arriued in that citie, whom my lord went to salute.

The emperor interteineth the earle of Sussex.

After this, vpon the quenes maiesties letters brought out of England by maister Henrie Bzoke, alias Cobham, one of hir gentlemen pensioners, the said earle of Sussex vpon sundaie the fourth of Januarie in the after noone, presented and deliuered vnto the emperours maiestie in his chamber of presence, the habiliments and ornaments of the most noble order of the garter, sir Gilbert Dethike knight alias Garter, principall king of armes, and officer for the said order, and William Dethike then Rougecrosse, also officer of armes, giuing their attendance in their cotes of armes. And the emperour at his inuesture of the said habiliments, gaue vnto the said Garter his short gowne and vnder garment, furred throughout with luzerns, and then proceeded thence into a great chamber, adorned in forme of a chappell, where as all the other ceremonies belonging vnto the said noble order were obserued and accomplished. And the same night the said earle supped with the emperours maiestie, both being in their robes of the said order.

Now shortlie after, his lordship with certeine of his companie taking leaue of the emperour, departed from Vienna the fourteenth of Januarie aforesaid vnto Newstat, and so through the countrie of Stire vnto Gratz the chiefe citie of Carinth, where he toke also leaue of the said archduke Charles: and from thence returning, passed those parts of the Alpes vnto Saltzburgh, where he met with the other part of his traine, and so by continuing iourneies came againe into England to the quenes maiestie towards the latter end of March. Rich. Grafton. The queenes ships sent forth into the narrow seas.

This yeare in the moneth of Januarie, the queenes maiestie sent into the narrow seas three of hir ships, and one barke named the Anthelop, the Swallow, the Aid, and the Phenix, the which were manned with fiue hundred men. And hir highnesse appointed the charge of the said ships and men to hir trustie seruant William Holstocke of London esquier, comptroller of hir highnesse ships, who had commandement to staie the subiects of king Philip. And according to his dutie he vsed such diligence, as one hauing care vnto his charge, in garding as well the French as the English coasts, did the eleuenth daie of March next following meet with eleuen saile of Flemmish hoies open vpon Bullongne, which came from Rone, and had in them foure hundred and od tuns of Gascoigne and French wines, which they intended to haue caried into Flanders: but the said Holstocke staid all the said eleuen hoies, and sent them to London, where they made their discharge, and the Flemmings disappointed of those wines.

Moreouer the eight and twentith daie of the foresaid moneth of March, the said William Holstocke seruing in the Anthelop (at that present admerall) and in his companie being William Winter the yonger (at that time his viceadmerall) seruing in the Aid, and John Basing capteine of the Swallow, and Thomas Gouarlie capteine of the Phenix met in the narrow seas with foure téene saile of great hulkes, which were come out of Portugall, and bound to Flanders: their chiefe lading being Portugall salt, and yet had good store of Spanish reals of plate, and also of good spices. The which fourteene hulkes did mainteine their fight for the space of two houres. And after that they did perceiue that they could not preuaile, hauing talked of the ordinance of the queens ships to their great hurt, as well in slaughter of their men, as also in spoile of their ships, the said Holstock and his companie toke eight of the said hulks, whereof fiue were sent into the riuer of Thames. And the admerall and viceadmerall in the said hulks being two great ships (which the said Holstocke himselfe did take) were caried vnto Harwich, and there discharged.

The eight and twentith of March, the pensioners well appointed in armor on horsbacke, mustered before the queenes maiestie in Hide parke beside Westminster. A great lotterie being holden at London in Poules church yard at the west doore, was begun to be drawne the eleuenth of Januarie, and continued daie and night till the first of Maie, wherein the said drawing was fullie ended. He also of a godlie motion builded a conuenient rome in Pauls churchyard, on the southside of the crosse, to receiue a certeine number of hearers at the sermon time: as may appeare by some remembrances of his name there fixed. Howbeit, this gentleman thus well disposed, and like inough to haue proceeded in more such godlie actions, was called out of this life the next yeare immediatlie following, forgoing all the pompe of this life, with no lesse good will, than he was forward by death to passe to eternall rest. The eleuenth of October, Thomas Howard duke of Norffolke was brought from Burnam beside Windsore by land to Westminster, and from thence by water to the tower of London prisoner, sir Henrie Neuill being his keeper. The earle of Northumberland and westmerland retired.

On thursdaie the ninth of November, Thomas Persie erle of Northumberland receiued the queens maiesties letters to repaire to the court. And the same night, other conspirators perceiuing him to be wauering and vnconstant of promise made to them, caused a seruant of his, called Beckwith (after he was laid in his bed) to buckle in, and to knocke at his chamber doore, willing him in hast to arise, and shift for himselfe, for that his enimies (whome he termed to be sir Oswold Wilstrop, and maister Vaughan) were about the parke, and had beset him with great numbers of men. Wherevpon he arose, & conueied himselfe awaie to his keepers house. In the same instant they caused the bels of the towne to be rong backeward, and so raised as manie as they could to their purpose. The next night the earle departed thense to Branspith, where he met with Charls earle of Westmerland, and the other confederats. Then by sundrie proclamations, they abusing manie of the queens subiects, commanded them in hir highnesse name, to repaire to them in warlike maner, for the defense and suertie of hir maiesties person; sometimes affirming their doings to be with the aduise and consent of the nobilitie of this realme, who in deed were wholie bent (as manifestlie appeared) to spend their liues in dutifull obedience, against them and all other traitors, sometimes pretending for conscience sake to seeke to reforme religion: sometimes declaring that they were driuen to take this matter in hand, least otherwise forren princes might take it vpon them, to the great perill of this realme.

The earles make the queene and hir subiects.

Vpon mondaie the thirteenth of November, they went to Durham with their banners displaied. And to get the more credit among the fauorers of the old Romish religion, they had a crosse with a banner of the fiue wounds borne before them, sometime by old Norton, sometime by others. As soone as they entred Durham, they went to the minster, where they tare the bible, communion bookes, & other such as were there. The same night they went againe to Branspith. The fourteenth daie of the same moneth, they went to Darington, and there had masse, which the earles and the rest heard with such lewd deuotion as they had. Then they sent their horssemen, to gather togither such numbers of men as they could. The fifteenth daie the earles parted; he of Northumberland to Richmond, then to Northallerton, & so to Borowbridge; & he of Westmerland to Ripon, & after to Borowbridge, where they both met againe. On the eightéenth daie they went to Wetherbie, and there tarried three or foure daies, and vpon Clifford more, nigh vnto Bramham more, they mistrusted themselues, at which time they were about two thousand horssemen, and fiue thousand footmen, which was the greatest number that euer they were. From which they intended to haue marched toward Yorke, but their minds being suddenlie altered, they returned.

Bernards castell besieged and defended.

The fiue and twentith of November, they besieged Bernards castell, which castell was valiantlie defended by sir George Bowes, and Robert Bowes his brother, the space of eleuen daies, and then deliuered with composition to depart with armor, munition, bag and baggage. In which time the queens maiestie caused the said earles of Northumberland & Westmerland to be proclamed traitors, with all their adherents and fauorers, the foure and twentith of November. The lord Scrope warden of the west marches, calling vnto him the earle of Cumberland and other gentlemen of the countrie, kept the citie of Carleill. The earle of Sussex the queens lieutenant generall in the north, published there the like proclamations (in effect) as had beene published by hir maiestie against the said rebels, and also sent out to all such gentlemen as he knew to be hir maiesties louing subiects vnder his rule, who came vnto him with such numbers of their friends, as he was able in fiue daies to make aboue fiue thousand horssemen and footmen. And so being accompanied with the erle of Rutland his lieutenant, the lord Hunsdon generall of the horssemen, sir Rafe Sadler treasuror, the lord William Euers, that was after appointed to lead the reareward, and diuerse other, that with their tenants and seruants were come to him, remaining as then within the citie of Yorke: he set forward from thense the sixt of December being sundaie, and marched with his power which he had thus got togither towards the enimies.

The earle of Sussex went against the rebels.

The earle of Rutland and the lord Hunsdon, with others against the rebels.

Sir George Bowes hauing surrendred Bernards castell (as before ye haue heard) met the earle of Sussex thus marching forward with his armie at Sisate, from whence they kept forward to Northallerton: and resting two nights there, they marched on to Crosbridge, then to Able, and so to Durham, and after to Newcastell. And the twentith of December they came to Yeram, from whence the rebels were gone the night before to Nawoth, where they counselled with Edward Dacres concerning their owne weakenesse, & also how they were not onlie pursued by the earle of Sussex & others with him, hauing a power with them of seuen thousand men, being almost at their héeles; but also by the earle of Warwike, and the lord Clinton, high admerall of England with a far greater armie of twelue thousand men, raised by the queens maiesties commissioners out of the south and middle parts of the realme. In which armie beside the earle of Warwike, & the lord admerall, chéefe gouernors in the same, there was also Walter Deuereux vicount Hereford high marshall of the field, with the lord Willoughbie of Yerham, maister Charles Howard, now lord Howard of Effingham, generall of the horssemen vnder the earle of Warwike, yong Henrie Knols eldest sonne to sir Francis Knols, his lieutenant, Edward Horsleie capteine of the ile of Wight, with fiue hundred harquebussiers out of the same Ile, and capteine Leighton with other fiue hundred harquebussiers Londoners, and manie other worthie gentlemen and valiant capteins.

The earle of Warwike and the lord admerall Clinton, sent against the rebels.

The comming forward of these forces caused the rebels so much to quaile in courage, that they durst not abide to trie the matter with dint of sword. For whereas the earle of Warwike, and the lord admerall, being aduanced forward to Darington, ment the next date to haue sent Robert Glouer then Portculeis, and now Sommerset herald (who in his iourneie attended on the lord admerall, as Norreis king of armes did vpon the earle of Warwike) vnto the rebels, vpon such message as for the time and state of things was thought conuenient: the same night aduertisements came from the earle of Sussex vnto the earle of Warwike, and to the lord admerall, that the two earles of Northumberland and Westmerland were fled, as the truth was they were indeed, first from Durham, whither the said Glouer should haue beene sent vnto them: and now vpon the earle of Sussex his comming vnto Erham, they shranke quite awaie, and fled into Scotland, without bidding their companie farewell. The earle of Warwike and his power marched on to Durham. But the earle of Sussex pursuing those other rebels that had not not meane to flée out of the realme, apprehended no small number of them at his pleasure, without finding anie resistance among them at all.

1570 Rebelles executed at Durham.

The fourth and fift of Januarie did suffer at Durham to the number of three score and six, constables and others, amongst whome the alderman of the towne and a priest called parson Plomtrée were the most notable. Then sir George Bowes being made marshall, finding manie to be fautors in the foresaid rebellion, did see them executed in diuerse places of the countrie. The one and twentith of Januarie a prentise of London was hanged on a gibet at the north end of Finch lane in London (to the example of others) for that he the thirteenth of December had striken his maister with a knife whereof he died.

Rich. Grafton. Lord Leonard Dacres rebelleth.

About the later end of Januarie, Leonard Dacres of Harlesele began to rebell, and procured the people of the north parts to assist him: so that he raised to the number of three thousand men. Of whose attempts when the lord Hunsdon lord warden of the east marches, and gouernor of Berwike heard, he prepared to go against him: and hauing with him sir John Forster lord warden of the middle marches, they set forward towards the place where they thought they should find him. They had with them 300 chosen soldiors of the garrison of Berwike, and twelue hundred borderers, and other of the garrisons there about the borders: so that they were in all fiftéene hundred footmen and horsemen. They marching therewith forth approched nére to a towne and castell called Naworth, which was in the kéeping of the said Leonard Dacres. And vpon a more, through the middle whereof a little riuer called Chelt hath his course, the said Leonard Dacres the two and twentith of February was readie with his power in order of battell, ranged & set in arraie after the forme of a triangle, compassed and inuironed about with horsemen. And now vpon the lord Hunsdons approch, the said Dacres with great and stout courage gaue an hardie onset vpon the said lord Hunsdon and his companie, nære vnto the foresaid riuer.

The lord Dacres readie with his power to set vpon the lord of Hunsdon.

The fight was sharpe and cruell, and the euent verie doubtfull for a while: the rebels were so stiffelie bent to do their vttermost indeuor in defense of their wicked quarrell. There were amongst them manie desperat women that gaue the aduenture of their liues, and fought right stoutlie. Manie therfore were slaine on both sides, to the number at the least of three hundred persons. But such was the forward valiancie of the lord Hunsdon, that his people incouraged by his example (whome they might see so noblie acquit himselfe, in aduenturing so farre as anie other of the whole troope) behaued themselues in such manfull wise, that the victorie in the end fell to him and his companie: and the said Leonard Dacres was forced to flée from his séelie slaine and miserable people, taking his waie into Scotland, so fast as his horsse might beare him. Captaine Reade and the other captains and soldiors of Berwike bare themselues right haliantlie, and shewed proofe of their skill and hardie manhood in this skirmish. After the which these holds and castels were taken and deliuered vnto the said lord Hunsdon: Naworth which was committed vnto the kéeping of maister Hetwope, Kellwod, Greistocke and Rockleie, which were deliuered to the kéeping of diuerse of the duke of Northfolks officers.

The Hoole tower.

The earle of Sussex hauing in warlike order passed the borders of Scotland, and marching forward, burned, ouerthrew, wasted and spoiled all the castels, townes and villages, as they passed, till they came to a tower called the Hoole tower, standing in a marish, and belonging to the lord of Buclewgh, which likewise was raced, ouerthrowne and burned: and so marching forward, wasted the whole countrie before them, vntill they came to a great towne called Crauling.

The same daie sir John Forster warden of the middle marches, with all the garrisons and forces of the same, entered likewise into Tiuidall at Espelgate, distant sixtéene miles from Warke, there in like order they burned and spoiled the countrie before them, till they came to a castell in the possession of

of the lard of Fernherſt, being parcell of hir ſons lands, which likewiſe was ouerthrowne, raſed, and burned, with all other caſtels, piles, townes, and villages, all alongſt the ſaid countrie, till they came to Cranling, ioining there with the lord lieutenants power. This towne was likewiſe burned and ſpoiled. Thus they paſſed the riuer of Tiuet, raſing, burning and ſpoiling the caſtels, piles, ſtone houſes, townes, and villages alongſt that riuer, vntill they came to Jedworth, where they lodged for that night, and were of the magiſtrats of that towne courteouſlie receiued, who had made indifferent good prouiſion for the armie, both of vittels for men, and of haie and prouender for horſſes. Whereupon proclamation was publiſhed made in the name of the lord lieutenant, that no Engliſhman (vpon paine of death) ſhould diſturbe or wrongfullie take awaie anie thing from anie of the inhabitants of the ſame towne, without diſburſing readie monie therefore. Which thing did ſo much content the Scots, that the next daie the lard of Seſford, warden of the middle marches of Scotland, with all the principals of his alies and kinred, came in to the lord lieutenant, ſubmitting themſelues to him, and were receiued into aſſurance: for that neither he nor anie of them had at anie time receiued the Engliſh rebels, neither aided nor aſſiſted them, neither yet made anie inuaſion into England. And whereas ſome of their men, and tenants, without their knowledge had treſpaſſed in ſuch behalfe, they were contented to abide and ſtand vnto the erle of Suſſex his order, for their ſaid men and tenants. And herevpon neither they nor anie of theirs receiued anie hurt: but by his lordſhips commandement were preſerued from ſuſteining anie damage either in bodie or goods: ſo glad he was of their ſubmiſſion, and no leſſe glad to giue them occaſion to be carefull in performance of obedience. Vnto which compaſſion God (no doubt) had inclined the noble mans hart, according to the poet words in this ſenſe verie true:

——mollia pectora reddit
Ad pietatis opus, flammis vt cera liqueſcens
In varias formas fictaris ducitur arte.

The nineteenth daie, the armie was diuided into two ſeuerall parts, whereof one paſſing ouer the riuer of Tiuet, burned the caſtell of Fernherſt, vtterlie ſpoiling the ſame, and all other caſtels & townes that belonged to the lards of Fernherſt, Hunthill, and Bedroll, and ſo paſſed to Hinto, where both the armies meeting, ioined togither againe, being not paſt a foure miles from Howike, whither they marched directlie, intending to lodge there that night, becauſe the bailiffes of the towne had offered to receiue the whole armie, and to make prouiſion for the ſoldiours of all things neceſſarie, they paieng readie monie for the ſame, and the inhabitants to be aſſured not to be hurt in bodie or goods, as was promiſed. But the Scots breaking the couenant before the comming thither of the armie, had vncouered their houſes, carried the thatch into the ſtreets, and there ſet it on fire: and this done they fled their waies with moſt part of their goods. So that when the armie approched, there was ſuch a thicke ſmoke, that no man might ſcarſelie enter the towne: and ſo for that night the ſoldiours ſuffered great lacke of vittels, lodging, and prouiſion, as well for themſelues as their horſſes. But the fire which the Scots had of a malicious purpoſe and ſubtiltie thus begun, was by the diligent induſtrie of the Engliſhmen ſo increaſed: that both the thatch and timber of the whole towne was conſumed to aſhes, a ſtone houſe perteining to the lard of Drumlanerike onlie excepted, wherein the lord lieutenant laie that night. And becauſe the ſaid Drumlanerike was a friend aſſured, the ſaid houſe was ſpared, with all the goods and corne therein, whereof there was great plentie.

The twentith of Aprill, the armie marched toward a faire proper houſe, belonging to the lard of Buclewgh, which was blowne vp with powder and vtterlie ruinated. Here the armie was againe diuided as before by the ſaid lord lieutenant his appointment, and marching by north the riuer of Tiuet towards England, they burnt and ſpoiled all ſuch caſtels, piles, townes and villages, as were belonging to the ſaid lards of Fernherſt and Buclewgh their kinſmen, alies, and adherents, & came that night againe to Jedworth, and there lodged. The one and twentith of Aprill, the armie diuiding it ſelfe againe, the one part vnder the leading of the marſhall ſir William Drurie, paſſed to the riuer of Bowbent, and there Tiuidale and Riddeſdale men meeting him, all on both ſides that riuer was burnt and ſpoiled. The other part of the armie marching by the riuer of Caſile, waſted and burnt in like maner there all that was found on both ſides that riuer, belonging wholie to the lard of Buclewgh, his kinſmen, alies and adherents.

This done, they returned againe neere to Kelſeie, where the lord lieutenant lodged for that night, meaning to haue beſieged Hume caſtell. For the accompliſhment whereof, the ſame night the lord of Hunneſdon and his companie went to Warke, to bring from thence the daie next following the great artillerie. But becauſe the cartage horſſes were returned to Barwike, this could not be brought to paſſe, & ſo the lord lieutenant with the whole armie returning into England the two & twentith of Aprill, came that night to Barwike. In this iourneie there were raſed, ouerthrowne and ſpoiled, aboue fiftie caſtels and piles, and more than three hundred townes and villages: ſo that there were verie few in Tiuidale and thoſe parties there abouts, which had either receiued the Engliſh rebels, or by inuaſion indamaged the Engliſh borders, and good ſubiects inhabiting vpon the ſame, that had left to them either caſtell, pile or houſe, for themſelues, their frends, or tenants, beſide the great loſſe of goods which were waſted, taken awaie or conſumed by this armie vnder the lord lieutenant.

Now in the meane while that he with his power thus afflicted the aduerſaries on that ſide, the lord Scrope warden of the weſt marches the eighteenth of Aprill entered Scotland on that ſide, with ſuch forces as he had aſſembled. And the firſt night they incamped at Eglesham, and in the morning at the diſlodging of the campe, that towne was burnt; and paſſing forward through the countrie, they burnt and ſpoiled diuerſe other townes, almoſt till they came to Dunkriſe, and had diuerſe conflicts with the enimies, gaue them ſundrie ouerthrowes, toke manie of them priſoners. And hauing accompliſhed his purpoſe, to his high praiſe and commendation, his lordſhip returned in ſafetie with his people into England; hauing burnt in that iourneie theſe places following: Hoddon, Trailebrow, old Cockpoole, Sherington, Blackeſhaw, Banke end, Rowell, Logher wod, Bride kirke, and others. During theſe inuaſions thus made into Scotland in that ſeaſon, the marches of England were ſo ſtronglie garded in all places by the lord Euers, ſir George Bowes, and others; that the Scots durſt not ſo much as once offer to make anie inuaſion: ſo that in abſence of the armies, there was not ſo much as an houſe burnt, or a cow driuen out of the Engliſh borders.

The ſir and twentith of Aprill, the earle of Suſſex lord lieutenant, accompanied with the foreſaid lord of Hunneſdon, maſter Drurie, and diuers other captens and ſouldiours, to the number of three thouſand or thereabouts, ſet from Barwike about fiue of the clocke clocke in the afternoone towards Warke, where they arriued about nine of the clocke in the night: and continuing there till the next morning, in the meane time he put things in order necessarie for the assieging of Hume castell, the winning whereof his lordship seemed to haue vowed. About the breake of the daie he sent forth master Drurie, with certeine horsemen and shot before, to inuiron that castell, and to chuse there such a plot of ground, where he might incampe best in safetie frō the shot of the same. Which the said master Drurie accordinglie performed, and there remained till the comming of the said lord lieutenant with the armie; who setting forward the footbands, cariage, and ordinance, made haste to follow. But yet ere he could passe the riuer of Twéed, and set ouer all the men, ordinance and carriage, it was almost ten of the clocke. Héere at this riuer, the lord lieutenant caused all the horsemen to staie and to take ouer the footmen.

The marshall sent before to Hume castell.

The order taken by the earle of Sussex for the safetie of the armie.

This done, with good circumspection he appointed the demilances and other horsemen to remaine behind in the rereward, and put the footmen in the battell, for the more safegard of themselues, the ordinance and cariages. Then his lordship himselfe with his owne standard, and the lord of Hunnesdons guidon, marched forward towards Hume castell, commanding the rest of the armie with the ordinance to follow after, and so about one of the clocke in the afternoone, he came before the castell: out of the which the enimies shot at his standard verie hotlie; but (God be praised) without doing hurt either to man or horsse, and incamped vnder a rocke or crag (which the marshall had possessed) with his band of horsemen and certeine footmen, as in a place most apt from danger of shot out of the castell. Héerewith a companie of curriours and caliuers were put forward, and appointed to take an other rocke nearer to the castell, which shot at them in the said castell; and the defendants within it answered them againe verie roundlie, although without anie great hurt on either part.

The earle of Sussex vieweth the castell of Hume.

In the meane time the lord lieutenant himselfe, accompanied onelie with the marshall master Drurie, rode sundrie times round about the castell to viewe and surueie the same: at whome they within shot verie fore, both with their great artillerie and small shot; yet missing them, as God would, though verie narrowlie. About six of the clocke in the euening came the whole battell, ordinance and cariages, with ensignes spread, shewing themselues verie brauelie; at whome also the castell shot lustilie: but as God would haue it, without hurting either man or boie. They lodged vnder another rocke nere adioining vnto the lord lieutenant vpon the west side, where there were appointed more small shot to go to the trench, which shadowed themselues vnder the old wals of the houses, which the Scots had burnt before the comming of the Englishmen, and occupied them so within the said castell, that one of them could not so soone looke out at a lope, but three or foure were readie to salute him: and keeping them in such sort, that they durst not well shew their heads; the captein of the pioners the same night by commandement of the lord lieutenant, raised a mount vpon the northeast side of the castell, wherevpon the peeces of artillerie might be planted in batterie.

Batterie made against Hume castell.

This worke was so well applied, and with so great diligence aduanced, that by fiue of the clocke in the next morning it was finished. The eight and twentith of Aprill, the marshall maister Drurie verie earlie rode about the castell, to surueie and viewe euerie thing: which done, the great ordinance was brought to the appointed place, and bent against the castell, to wit, three canons, and two falcons. Héerewith also the lord lieutenant caused summons to be giuen vnto them within to yeeld. And about seauen of the clocke the same morning, the whole tire began to go off, and a great showt was made by the armie, to the great terrour of the defendants, and of all the countrie neere adioining. The foresaid peeces continued shoting till two of the clocke in the afternoone, discharging within that space a three score shots. During the time of this batterie, there was no great store of shot discharged by the great peeces within the castell, because their master gunner within, after he had first shot off a peece, and done no hurt therewith, as he was about to shot againe, the master gunner of the two English falcons hauing espied him, tooke his leuell so right, that discharging therewith one of the falcons, he displaced the enimies peece, and stroke the gunners leg off, whereby their great ordinance within ceassed, which was an happie turne for the Englishmen.

The master gunner within the castell hurt.

About two of the clocke they within sent forth a trumpet vnto the lord lieutenant, requiring a respit that they might talke with the marshall master Drurie, and to send a messenger to the lord Hume their master, to know his further pleasure: for that being put in trust by him with the keeping of that fortresse, they could not giue it vp without his consent. And then vpon the returne of the messenger, they trusted to giue his lordship contented answer. The marshall master Drurie talked with them twise, and the lord lieutenant was contented to grant vnto William Trotter, and Gilbert Greie the lord Humes wines brother (being principall capteins appointed to the keeping of the said castell) three houres respit: with condition, that they should not vse therein anie subtiltie, or for the delaieng of time: swearing by his honour, that if they so did, he would not depart the field till he had wone it by force: and further, that there should not one of them escape with life.

The lord lieutenant sweareth.

They being brought in doubt of their owne safeties hereby, sent one in post together with a seruant of master Druries the marshall, to the lord Hume. And presentlie heere vpon they shewed themselues vpon the walles and rampires of the said castell: but immediatlie the lord lieutenant sent to them a commandement, strictlie inhibiting them, that not one of them should once on paine of death looke ouer the wals or rampires, to the end to viewe the breach of the batterie, forsomuch as in the time of parlee it was against the law of armes so to do. But now the messenger that was thus sent to the lord Hume, comming to him, declared in what case his house and people stood, who being (as was supposed) not so farre off, but that he might heare how lustilie the English canons did canuasse and batter his Hunnish castell walles, did now agree to meet the marshall master Drurie two miles distant from the said castell, and there to commune further with him in that matter.

The lord lieutenants commandement on paine of death.

Upon the comming backe of the messenger with this answer, the lord lieutenant thought good to send the said master Drurie vnto the place appointed: who comming thither met with the said lord Hume. And after they had debated the matter together, at length the lord Hume was contented that the castell should be surrendered into the hands of the lord lieutenant; with condition, that his people therein might depart with life: which the lord lieutenant was contented to grant, so that there were no English men among them. Héere vpon about eight of the clocke in the euening, the gates were opened, and the keies deliuered to the marshall, who presented them to the lord lieutenant: and then the lord Hunnesdon, the said marshall, and diuerse other gentlemen entered into the castell, and by & by tooke possession possession thereof in the quéene of Englands name, pulled downe their banner of defiance, and in place thereof set vp the English banners, against all those in Scotland that would saie the contrarie.

The Scots that were within it, being in number an hundred three score and eight persons, were put out in their common wearing apparell, without armour, weapon, or anie baggage. They comming to the lord lieutenant that was then at the place of the batterie on horsebacke, presented themselues to him: who according to his word and promise of honour, caused them to be safelie conducted through the watch and scouts, to such place as they required. Amongst them there were two Englishmen, the one of them named Hilliard, the earle of Northumberlands man, the other was a vagarant person, or a roge (as we may call him) named William God saue hir alias Lions, which both were caried to Barwike, & there executed the thirtenth of Maie next insuing. In all this siege there were but foure persons slaine on both parts, two Scots, & two Englishmen: but there were manie hurt as well on the one part as the other. The castell of Hume being thus wone, the lord lieutenant the morow after placed therein to kéepe the house to the quéenes maiesties vse, capteine Wood, and capteine Pikman, with two hundred souldiours. This done, his lordship returned towards England and came to Barwike. During this siege there were diuerse townes and villages, situate within three or foure miles of the campe, set on fire by the Englishmen, and vtterlie spoiled. The lord lieutenant vpon his returne to Barwike, staied there for a time verie euill at ease, hauing in trauell about the siege taken such cold, as therewith he was brought into an extreame ague.

The fourth of Maie, his lordship sent maister William Drurie the marshall of Barwike, accompanied with diuerse gentlemen and capteins, hauing with them about two thousand souldiours, to take Fast castell: the which vpon the first summons was deliuered into his hands, who receiuing the keies being presented to him, entered the hold, and tooke possession thereof, in the quenes maiesties name: and expelling the Scots, being about the number of halfe a score (who according to couenant were suffered to depart with their liues saued) he put ten, or (as some haue) foureténe Englishmen into that castell, which were thought able and number sufficient enough to kéepe it against all the power of Scotland, the situation thereof is so strong.

In this meane time the troubles increasing among the Scots, by reason of the murther committed in the person of the earle of Murreie the late gouernour, the duke of Chatellerault, and other his partakers gathered a power of three thousand men, and comming to Lithquo, midwaie betwixt Sterling and Edenburgh, remained there for a time, and afterwards came to Edenburgh, in purpose to make warre against the lords of the kings part, who hauing sent to the earle of Lennor, then remaining in England, earnestlie requested him to repaire into Scotland. Whereupon he by the quenes maiesties licence, tooke his iourneie thitherwards, and came to Barwike, where he was also visited with sickenesse, and so remained certeine daies in that towne. And vnderstanding that the said duke of Chatellerraults power was such, that the lords of the kings side were not able to come together, nor he to go to them without the quéene of Englands aid, he humblie sued vnto hir maiestie by letters to haue some power by hir appointment to conduct him into Scotland, and there to aid him and the other lords of that side against their aduersaries the duke and his complices. Hereupon by hir maiesties commandement, the earle of Sussex, as yet not fullie recouered of his sickenesse, ordeined maister William Drurie the marshall of Barwike, with such forces as were thought conuenient to go with the said earle of Lennor, for the execution of such exploits in seruice as séemed most expedient. And about the same time, to wit the first of Maie, the lord Scrope lord warden of the west marches, made a rode into Scotland, incamping the first night on the hither side of the water of Annan, and the next daie marched towards the water of Milke, burning and spoiling all on that side of Annandale, namelie the lard Johnstons lands, finding small resistance, saiing that the forreie was a little troubled with a fortie or fiftie Scots horsemen, and so hauing donè his pleasure, he quietlie returned, without receiuing other impeachment: notwithstanding the lord Hekries was in Dunfrise, hauing gathered a great power in purpose to hinder his enterprise.

But now to returne to the earle of Sussex, who hauing instituted sir William Drurie generall of those bands that should passe with the earle of Lennor into Scotland: bicause each gentleman, souldior, and seuerall bands should dutifullie obeie the said sir William their new ordeined generall in all points of warlike order, the said earle made an oration in such pithie forme and manner, as throughlie expressed the whole substance of the seruice, the vnsuertie of the season, the strange and malicious dealing of diuerse aduersaries: which points he so cunninglie handled, as the excellencie of a perfect orator appeared fullie in his speach. At whose eloquence the herers rather séemed astonied than vnsatisfied in anie point or parcell of those matters: for he opened the verie bowels of rebellion, the practises of enimies, and suborning of traitors: and therefore persuaded euerie honest mind to haue a dutifull consideration of his prince and countrie, in the defense and libertie whereof, both life, lands, and goods, are alwaies to be offered.

After which oration in respect of further aduancement as the custome is (for seruice past, and incouragement to proceed in the like worthie doings) he made these knights: Sir William Drurie, sir Thomas Manners, sir George Careie, and sir Robert Constable, and placing the said sir William Drurie the appointed generall in full authoritie, he committed them to God, and the good conduct of their chéefeteine. Now hauing heard the lord lieutenant thus speake, and séeing the means that he vsed to incourage them against the enimie; how could they one with another but vow in mind, euen with the hazzard of their hearts, to performe to their power no lesse than he in speech implied? How could they (I saie) but venture life and lim, hauing so often séene the perillous enterprises which he himselfe vndertooke against forren hostilitie, as to his owne danger so to the high praise of his heroicall prowesse: and not without desert, as one verie well noteth, saieng:

——satrapas præclarus fortis & audax,
Elisabetha tui speciosi corporis acer
Et fidus custos, discrimen adire paratus
Quodlibet, inuicto Mauortis pectore campo.

Cumes Sussexius Camerarius.

The same daie being the eleuenth of Maie, diuerse foot bands with shot and armed pikes were set forward into Scotland, with certeine péeces of artillerie, powder, and munition in good quantitie. First capteine Bickwell with his ensignes departed the towne, and then the companies of capteine Read, capteine Carnell, capteine Game, capteine Lamberd, and capteine Errington. These old bands of Warwike conteined fiue hundred souldiours.

After them followed the companie of sir Robert Constable, their sergeant maior of three hundred shot, and the companie of sir Thomas Paners of two hundred shot. Lastlie marched forth capteine John Constable, and capteine Barwike with two hundred armed men. These twelue hundred footmen with fiue ensignes marched that night to Coldingham. Also for the better assurance of couenants and promises made on the behalfe of such lords of Scotland, as had made suite for this aid to be sent into their countrie for their assistance against them of the contrarie faction, there were certeine hostages sent into England by the same lords as it was thought expedient, for doubt of double dealing. The twelfe of Maie, they marched forward, and the same daie sir William Drurie, the earle of Lennor, and the other new made knights, with the horssemen, departed from Barwike, and at the peece neere to Dunglas they ouertooke the footmen, and the same night all the horssemen and footmen came and incamped togither at Dunbar, being in all not past sixteene hundred men. They had foure field peeces with them, & good store of powder. The next day being the thirteenth of Maie, and Whitsun euen, they made such speed in their march, that they came vnto Edenburgh, where they found the earles of Horton, Mar, Glencarne, the lords Kithwen, Lindseie, Simple, Glames, Methuen, Ogiltre, and Catcart, with diuerse other gentlemen.

Heere also they vnderstood that the duke of Chatellerault and his partakers were departed from Lithquo, whither they were retired backe againe from Edenburgh, on knowledge had that the Englishmen were comming forwards towards them. The fouretenth and fiftenth day they laie still in Edenburgh, and the morrow after being the sixtenth of that moneth, they marched forwards to Lithquo, and lodged in that towne that night, where they receiued aduertisements that the said duke of Chatellerault had broken vp his campe, after he had vpon his departure from the said towne of Lithquo attempted the winning of the castell of Glasco, & missing his purpose there, was driuen to retire with dishonour. The next morning being wednesdaie, the armie marched forwards, and the footmen laie that night at a place called Faukirke, a six miles from Lithquo: but the generall with the horssemen rode six miles further vnto Sterling, where they saw the young king. The next daie being the eightenth of Maie, sir Robert Constable, Sargent Maior, with the rest of the capteins of the twelue hundred English footmen, & two hundred Scots footmen, the which were most part shot, marched a long iourneie, and came to lodge that night at Glasco, and the generall sir William Drurie came to them with the horssemen, and the most part of the noble men of Scotland that were on the kings side, which entred the towne and lodged in the same, with manie horssemen and footmen.

The yoong king at Sterling.

The duke of Chatellerault (as ye haue heard) had beene there, and besieged the castell that belonged to the king, but hearing of the Englishmens comming two daies before their approching thither, he raised his siege, and departed thence, with the losse of nine and twentie of his men. The nineteenth of Maie, sir William Drurie generall of the English power, being determined aforehand on a iourneie towards Dunbreton, sent forth that morning before certeine vantcurrours on horssebacke, to staie all such as they found vpon the waie. This done, he toke with him certeine gentlemen, and some shot, and rode forth towards Dunbreton, to view the straits and situation of that castell, within the which were at that present the lord Fleming, that toke vpon him as capteine thereof, the archbishop of saint Andrewes, and other their adherents, frends to the duke of Chatellerault, and enimies to the lords that were about the king.

The generall goeth to view Dunbreton,

After sir William Drurie had viewed the castell, and taken the plot of the situation thereof, he sent his trumpetter to know who were within it, and to whose vse they kept it. They within the castell required to know what he was that sent to know the same. It was answered that it was the queene of Englands generall of hir forces there in Scotland that made the demand. Wherevnto answer was returned, that they knew well he was not so ignorant as he seemed (as in deed he was not) but that he did well know that this castell was, and of long time had beene kept by the lord Fleming: and that accordinglie by him, his frends and seruants it was now maintened. Which answer being reported to the generall, he sent againe his trumpetter, to know if the lord Fleming would come forth and parlee vpon assurance of honour to returne safelie. Wherevnto the lord Fleming consented, although not meaning so to do: but by a subtill practise (as was thought) intended to wind him within danger. For there were some harquebussers secretlie couched in couert, within whose reach when the generall was come himselfe alone on horssebacke, most dishonestlie (his trumpetter not yet being returned) they shot at him with great despite, meaning to haue killed him, without anie regard to the law of armes, or feare of God. But through the goodnes of the Lord almightie, that wicked practise missed the pretensed effect: for that worthie English knight receiued no bodilie hurt, but perceiuing their dealings, with a bold courage he bestowed his pistols as frelie at them as they did their harquebuse shot at him, and so returned to his companie backe againe in safetie, yeelding to God due honour and thanks for his mercifull deliuerance from such a murtherous practise of his deadlie foes.

He sendeth to view the ground where he should meet with the lord Fleming.

The generall sendeth to know who was within the castell, &c.

Lord Fleming is required to come to parlee with the generall.

The dishonorable dealing of the lord Fleming.

Upon a new occasion to vnderstand the certeintie of that, whereof he had some inkling, the one and twentith of Maie, sir William Drurie accompanied with the said gentlemen and horssemen, went againe towards Dunbreton, to parlee with the lord Fleming vpon his further promise, that he would meet him three miles from the said castell. Wherevpon the said sir William Drurie sent an Englishman and a Scotishman to view the ground, which should be appointed forth for their meeting, which they found to be so neere to the castell, as was subiect to all their shot both great and small, and cleane contrarie to the promise: and so they declared to the capteine named John Fleming, that was sent forth of the castell to appoint the same, how it was neither indifferent nor meet for such a purpose. The capteine answered, that his maister was a man of honour, and stood vpon the same, and therefore would not hazard himselfe among horssemen wholie without the danger of the peece. Whereto the messengers replied, that the lord Fleming for his late euill dealing, was not to be credited in this case, neither comparable to the generall of the English armie, for he was there for the queene of England. And further they said, that for so much as they had of late dealt so vniustlie contrarie to promise and the law of armes, and therby so greatlie cracked their credits, stained their honestie and honour: they could not but wish that their generall should be well aduised, yer he did hazard himselfe anie more within their danger vpon their slipperie promises, except they would appoint some other place of parlee, as might be thought indifferent, according to their former offers, which would not be granted, and so they departed. Immediatlie whereupon, to shew some peece of their double dealings, and vnfaithfull practises towards the Englishmen: the Scots within the castell presentlie sent after the messengers sengers a colouring shot for a farewell. Thus did they by practise iustifie the opinion that strangers to them haue long conceiued of their dealing: and which he saw full well (perhaps also prowed in some part) that said of the Scotish nations untrustinesse, &c:

Fraudibus ingenitis & non eget arte magistra.

Sir William Drurie then perceiuing that the meaning of the lord Fleming was not to deale simplie in this matter, touching a conference to be had betwixt them, returned to Glasco, where sir George Careie being maruellouslie inflamed with that vnhoneſt dealing of the lord Fleming, made earnest suite to the generall that he might send to him and offer him the combat in triall of this quarrell, sith it was more requisit that a gentleman souldier should stand in those questions than a generall, consdering his calling and office. The generall thanked sir George verie courteouslie, but yet said, that it stood him vpon to search out these matters to the vttermost (as he would haue done in deed) were not his commission and charge (as was well knowne) to be otherwise imploied: Yet (quoth he) sith your suite is so reasonable (and the whole companie and lawes of armes alloweth of it) I grant your request, and therein do as best shall seeme to your birth and estimation. Herevpon sir George Careie streightwaies deuised a letter of challenge, and deliuered it to an herald to beare from him vnto the said lord Fleming, the tenour whereof here insueth.

A letter of challenge sent to the lord Fleming.

A copie of sir George Careis foresaid letter to the lord Fleming.

LOrd Fleming, if either your birth or bringing vp had wrought in you a noble mind, or estimation of credit, hardlie would you haue so much forgotten and stained your honour, as in a parlée of late with our generall you did. At whom vilelie and vnhonorablie shoting, you falsed that assurance of warre which souldiers submit themselues vnto: and trained him to your treason vnder truſt, a thing heretofore not accustomed, nor presentlie to be allowed of. He assuredlie pretending your owne and your frends good, commoditie to your countrie, and quietnesse to the state, twise abased and submitted himselfe, comming to confer with you thereof: but your pride ioined with a harmefull meaning, to those that you profesſe best vnto, and selfe wilfull vaineglorie, without cause why, refused that which reason and honour commanded you to haue done. Therfore, bicause his calling is presentlie with his charge better than yours, and mine not inferior; I summon you reasonablie to excuse that fault supposed to be yours, or else to maintein that traitorous act with your person against mine in fight, when, where, or how you dare. Otherwise I will baſfull your good name, sound with the trumpet your dishonour, and paint your picture with the heels vpward, and beare it in despite of your selfe. In the meane time I attend your answer. From Glasco, the 22 of Maie 1570.

The lord Fleming charged with treachery.

He sendeth to view the ground where he should meet with the lord Fleming.

with pride, harmefull meaning and vaineglorie.

The copie of the lord Flemings answer.

GEorge Careie, I haue receiued your vaineleſſe letter, making mention of my falſe and treasonable dealing against your generall, in shooting vnder truſt, so vilelie against my honour and truth, traitorouslie trained him vnder my truſt: which is altogither falſe and vntrue. And howbeit your generall came by the house of Dunglas by my appointment, which I suffered, and I appointed one place of meeting, sir men of either partie which he refuſed, and he departed, and certeine of his companie came bragging vp the riuers side towards the house, viewing the same and the ground thereabouts, shooting your harquebusses against the same: I could do no leſſe but present you with such as I had. Whereas you write of your generals calling to be presentlie better than mine, and yours not inferiour; when your generall challengeth me therof, I shall giue answer. And as for you, I will not be inferiour to a better than you, or ante souldier vnder your generals charge. Whereas you summon me (as you call it) reasonable to excuse that falt supposed to be mine owne, or else to maintein that traitorous act with my person against yours: you shall wit, I haue gentlemen of honour, seruant souldiers to me, as ye are to your generall, which may be your fellowes, shall defend the same against you and your falſe and vntrue inuented writing: and were not the charge I present, or how some I can be relieued of the same, I should lowlie my person to meet you sir English miles, or anie other person. Howbeit ye be but one souldier, assure your selfe from this daie forth, I will not receiue no such inuented message, for I haue little to do with Englishmen, ye may raile vpon my honorable name as ye please. You shall haue as honorable gentlemen as your selfe against you fighting. Take this for answer.

Iohn lord Fleming.

The dishonorable dealing of the lord Fleming.

Sir William Drurie goeth against towards Dumbreton.

This is a common fault in the Scots.

Scotish hoſtilitie.

The lord Flemings defence against the charge of treacherie.

Lord Fleming is required to come to parlee with the generall.

Lord Fleming beareth him bold of his gentrie.

The replie of sir George Careie vpon the lord Flemings answer.

LOrd Fleming, often the Flemings after none answer smelleth more of wine than wit. But as to that common crime, the custome of their countrie yeeldeth them part of pardon; so your common acquaintance with the same condition, knowne to be verie great, shall to me somewhat excuse your witleſſe writing, wherein first you disallow my right recitall of your traitorous dealing, by tearming it falſe and vntrue. For answer, know this, the truth my pen hath written, by the witneſſe of a number; and my hand I vow shall maintein the same before the world at all times. But you in denieng it, haue both falſlie and vnſtulie lied in your throte, and dare neither defend nor disproue that in deeds, which in words you haue done. Whereas you write, that our generall passed Dunglas, by your appointment which you suffered, therein you do manifeſtlie saie vnhonorablie and vntrulie; for that you had no knowledge of our first comming, but saluted vs with your shot: and we likewise skirmished with your men euen at their owne strength, vntill we viewed the ground about at out pleasure. And touching the appointment of sir of either part, falſlie that maie be knowne to be a plaine lie: seeing we had neither parlée nor conference with you before, to appoint place or meeting. But whereas you saie, you could do no leſſe but present vs with such as you had, therein you confeſſe and acknowledge the dishonour and treason that I charged you withall, taking vpon your selfe that fault, which I supposed to haue bin of your seruants, for our generall retired his companie farre from him. And his trumpet being with you, approched himselfe alone to haue parled, when vnder truſt you discharged two harquebusses against him: an act rather seemelie for a cowardlie traitor, than one that profeſseth to be a souldier.

Finallie, whereas you let me wit, that you haue gentlemen of honour, seruant souldiers vnto you, that maie be my fellowes, which should defend the chalenge: that toucheth so neere your selfe, as with honor you should not haue refused it. First I thinke scorne to be anie waies inferior to you, though but a souldier, so honourable a name for you, being better in birth, and vnstained with reproch as you haue béene. Secondlie, I haue more, and as good gentlemen vnder my conduct, as your selfe haue vnder your charge, which shall answer as many as you can bring, if with number ye meane to combat, and will put them to that which you dare not do your selfe. But assure you, my quarell shall remaine euerlasting, except the proofe of your owne person against mine maie end it: and when you shall dare come out of your crowes nest, I will be readie to ride an hundred Scotish miles, to méet with you in anie indifferent place. And vntill that time, I shall account you deuoid of honestie & honor, vnworthie to march vpon ground, or kéepe companie with men. From Hamilton, the 29 of Maie 1570.

Sir George Careie his answer to the lord Flemings brag of his gentrie.

Oh valiant heart!

Subscribed George Careie.

Though manie waies were sought by message and otherwise, to moue the lord Fleming to defend with battell the fault and follie committed: yet it would not be; for he shifted off the matter, so as it well appered, it was but lost labor further to attempt him therein. The two and twentith of Maie, the earle of Lennox, accompanied with the earle of Glencarne, the lord Simple, and other his friends, feodaries & alies, muttered on the more before the towne of Glasco the number of foure thousand horssemen and footmen, that were there assembled to serue him, in presence of sir William Drurie, and other of the English capteins. The three and twentith of Maie, sir William Drurie, the earle of Lennox, and other the Scotish lords, and the whole armie marched towards the castell of Hamilton, and sending a trumpetter, and one with him to parlée with the capteine named Andrew Hamilton, he agreed to come forth, and one other with him, to talke with sir William Drurie, and one other gentleman, such as he should thinke good to bring with him to a place somewhat distant, as well from the castell as the campe.

A muster of Scottishmen to the number of 4000.

The armie goeth toward Hamilton.

Herevpon sir William Drurie with his sword and target, and sir George Careie with a case of pistols went forth to the appointed place, whither the capteine of the castell also with an halbert, and one other with him, hauing likewise a case of pistols, came according to appointment. But after they had talked togither, and that the capteine would not in anie wise consent to deliuer vp the castell, he with his associat returned to their hold againe, & the English generall, with sir George Careie, came backe to the campe, and therevpon the English ordinance was presentlie placed about the castell, and shot verie sore all that night: but did no great hurt, by reason they were but field péeces, and not fit for batteries. They in the castell likewise shot verie sore at the Englishmen, but did no great harme, sauing that there were three of the footmen hurt. In the palace which was a prettie house the duchesse of Chatellerault was at that time resident, to whom sir William Drurie did repaire, offering hir all the courtesie he might, with all that to hir apperteined, willing hir not to feare anie thing: and for hir more assurance, he committed hir to the charge of sir Thomas Haners.

Sir William Drurie talketh with the capteine of Hamilton castell.

The English ordinance shooteth at the castell.

The duchesse of Chatellerault committed to the charge of an English knight.

The foure and twentith of Maie, the generall gaue summons vnto the castell. And bicause they within stoode stiffelie in deniall to make surrender thereof vnto him, he was driuen to send to Striueling for some great péeces of ordinance met to make batterie. In the meane time, the earles of Lennox and Morton with the horssemen, and some shot, marched into the countrie to a verie faire house of the abbat of Kilwinnings nere adioining, whose name was Gawen Hamilton, which house they burnt and vtterlie defaced, spoiling it, and rasing it downe to the earth. They burnt and spoiled also seuenténe houses more belonging to men of that surname, situate nére thereabouts, whereof one belonged vnto a lard that had married with the sister of James Hamilton of Bodweie haugh, which slue the regent. There were also burnt seuen other faire houses belonging to others that were not of that surname: but yet were of their friends and alies. Moreouer, there were diuerse other of their kinred and alies that came in with humble submission, and assured themselues, firmelie promising from thenceforth their obedience to the king.

Great ordinance sent for.

The earles of Lennox and Morton.

The abbeie of Kilwinnings burnt.

The fiue and twentith of Maie sir William Drurie the generall retired his people vpon a policie from the castell, and left it without either watch or ward for that night. The next daie he sent sir George Careie to the castell with a trumpetter, to know if they within would deliuer it vp, before the great ordinance should come, which the capteine vtterlie refused to do. Wherevpon the small shot clapt suddenlie round about the house, and kept them within occupied, till that a whole culuering & a demie culuering came to them from Sterling, the which with foure of the English small field péeces were in the night following planted against the castell, and being shot off, a bullet of one of the great péeces passed through the walles into the castell.

The castell summoned.

The castell of Hamilton battered.

The seuen and twentith of Maie about foure of the clocke in the morning, the generall sent a trumpetter to giue summons againe to the castell: vnto whome the capteine answered, that he cared not for them, & so bad them do their worst, for he would not yéeld the place to them at anie hand. Wherevpon immediatlie the whole tire began to plaie in such sort, that within foure volées both sides of the house were battered through: at the sight whereof the capteine was so dismaied, that forthwith he cried for parlée, and so the shot was staied. Now vpon humble sute the capteine was admitted to speake with the generall, and so comming to talke with him, at length he agreed to yeeld: wherevpon, the provost marshall was sent into the castell to take possession thereof. The generall permitted them verie courteoulie to depart with their furniture, and other such stuffe as they could carie with them. There came out of the house nine and thirtie persons one and other, foure and thirtie men, three boies, and two women, and therewith was the castell blowne vp and rased, and the armie laie that night in the towne, and in places about it.

The castell effsoones summoned.

The capteine of the castell demandeth parlée.

The next daie, being the eight and twentith of Maie they departed from thence: the earles of Lennox, Mar, and Glencarne, with other of the nobilitie of Scotland of the kings part taking their leaues, with their companie returned to Glasco: and sir George Careie with the horssemen came that night to Lithqo, where also the rest of the English forces met. A castell called Cobernawd belonging to the lord Fleming was yéelded to the generals hands, who vpon bond of assurance that the house should remaine at the deuotion of the queene of England, was contented to spare it from fire and spoile. But this was not the first nor last courtesie which the generall shewed in this iournie, vnto such as in anie respect were thought worthie of his fauour. Amongst other the ladie of Liuington being great with child, mistrusting hir selfe (or hir husbands double dealing towards our countrie) in great feare began to flie. But sir William Drurie hearing thereof, sent hir word he came not to make warres with women, but rather to shew pitie to the weake and comfortlesse; lesse, and thereupon the staied, and had no further harme.

The nine and twentith of Maie, when the armie should dislodge from Lithquo, the generall called for the prouost of the towne, and commanded him to prepare with all expedition, to receiue a iust punishment and correction thorough the whole towne for treason, and vnpardonable offenses committed: and declaring that the inhabitants thereof had succoured and supported traitors to the realme of England, and likewise to their owne king, contrarie to the leagues and quietnesse of both the realmes of England and Scotland, for which cause he was fullie resolued to ouerthrow that towne & receptacle of traitors. If therefore there were anie women in childbed or impotent people within that towne, he gaue warning thus aforehand to conueie them out of it: and herewith also commanding each capteine & souldier vnder his charge, to see due execution of that which he purposed in this behalfe to haue done, he willed the prouost to appoint a place conuenient, into the which the goods of the towne might be brought, to the end that the same should neither bee spoiled by the English souldiers, neither yet consumed thorough vehemencie of fire, but to be preserued all wholie to the Scotishmens vse. Further, he granted, that euerie noble mans lodging and capiteins house should bee saued from fire.

But now the time being come for this determined execution, the earle of Morton, that still accompanied the English generall, offered himselfe as an intercessor to intreat and sue for a pardon, bringing afore the generall a multitude of wailing people, whose mournfull and most pitious cries were lamentable and verie importunat. The generall hearing their requests, made answer, that for manie causes the towne ought to be destroied, considering how diuerse enimies (whose insolent practises were not to be suffered) had alwaies there a common resort to conferre of their wicked deuises: and further (quoth he) the courtesie that is shewed to such places of repaire, hath imboldened the rest of Scotland to vse open violence and secret villanies, to the preiudice of Gods glorie, hinderance of the weale publike, and breach of good lawes and policies: and therefore it was fit and most meet for a warning to thousands in that case of extremitie, to raise out such monuments of mischiefe. But at length, notwithstanding these heauie words vttered by sir William Drurie, the people of all sorts so prealled about him, & made such pitifull cries and sorowfull noise, with children sucking of their mothers breasts, that he taking ruth of their miserable estates, at this their lamentable suit, and speciallie at the great instance of the earle of Morton, who came bareheaded to speake for them, the generall was contented to saue the towne and people therein: taking good band and assurance of the prouost and chiefest of the towne, that they should follow the campe, and at all times appeare when they were called for at Berwike, and there to submit themselues, their towne and goods, to the clemencie of the queens highnesse; and to such order as the earle of Sussex his maiesties generall lieutenant should by consent thinke necessarie: to which band & conditions they of Lithquo agreed. And for that their regent was slaine, & none since instituted to whome they had giuen faith of allegiance; they confessed, that none might command them anie waie without licence of him, to whome they had made this band, vnto him both their promise and obligation was passed. And in this sort they continued bound to him for their good behauiors.

The duke of Chatelleraults palace in Lithquo was yet burnt and raised, and marching to another house belonging to the said duke, called Kenile, distant from Lithquo about a mile or more, they likewise burned the same. Thus hauing done their pleasures at Lithquo, and in the countrie about that towne, they marched from thense to a proper house and castell, belonging to the lord Seton, called Neitherie, which the enimies had fortified. But yet when the ladie of that house came to the generall, and made humble petition on hir knees for his fauor, offering to him the keies of that place in most humble wise; she found such courtesie at his hands, that with condition that she & a baron with hir should enter bands for assurance, that the castell should euer afterwards remaine at the quéene of Englands pleasure, he toke hir the keies againe, leauing hir in possession of hir house and goods, without doing hir anie further displeasure.

This night the armie came to Edenburgh, where certeine of the companie that made hast to get thither somewhat before the rest, receiued some discourtesie: for they were spoiled in the streets of their furniture, & such other things as they had about them. But when the generall with the rest of the armie was come nere to the towne, and had knowledge of such foule disorder, he thought not good to enter the towne, without standing so sure on his gard, that he should not need to doubt any double dealing, or crooked measure. Which sure handling of the matter did not onelie shew the deuiser thereof to haue good conduct and experience: but in verie deed auoided no small inconuenience and mischiefe, that by the enimies was finelie contriued (thorough a fraie to be made in the suburbs) so that a great slaughter had burst out suddenlie, and no small bloudshed followed, if God and good guiding of the people had not staied and turned awaie that imminent danger. To be short, the generall sent sir Thomas Maners with two bands of souldiors, vnder one ensigne, to seize vpon the gates at their first arriuall, and so the pretensed conspiracie was happilie preuented; for the residue of the power was no sooner entred the towne, but that keeping themselues in order to cleere the streets, and to command the inhabitants the better, they spent that night standing on their gard, as the case required. When the morning was come, sir William Drurie smelling out the couert practise, and naughtie meaning of some, demanded iustice and strict punishment of such offenses and things as he would truelie laie to the charges of some in that towne: and told them flatlie, if remedie were not the sooner prouided, and satisfaction made for the follies and outrage committed, he would be quicklie reuenged, to the displeasure and shame of all the contriuers of that same mad and mischéeuous presumption.

Herevpon, not onelie such things as had bin taken from those few souldiors, which first entred the towne ouer night, were not onelie restored: but diuerse malefactors were also deliuered to the generall, to be executed and ordered by his discretion; who séeing their submission, mercifullie & franklie sent them awaie vnto their capteins: & so these broiles were pacified and things set in quiet. After they had rested in Edenburgh a two daies, the first of June they dislodged. The generall comming to Seton the chiefe castell & house of the lord Seton, the ladie was readie there also to present him the keies, with like humble submission as before: and thereupon receiued the like fauor for this house, as was shewed to hir for the other. That night they lodged at Hadington. It was determined that the pile of Anderwike should haue beene ouerthrowne: but vpon suite and bands taken of diuerse gentlemen, the place was spared, and the offendors received to mercie.

And ſo the next date, the generall with the horſemen came through to Berwike, a iournie of two and thirtie long miles.

The footbands lodged the ſame night at Coldingham with ſir Robert Conſtable, who the next date the third of June came with them vnto Berwike. And ſo ended this iournie, to the great commendation of the generall and capteins: and conſequentlie to all the gentlemen and ſouldiors that had beene forth in the ſame, as well for the good ſucceſſe which it pleaſed God the author of all good and proſperous euents to grant to them, as alſo for their dutifull obedience to all warlike diſcipline, their painfull trauels ſuſteined, their manlie forwardneſſe and skilfull practiſe in martiall polices ſtill ſhewed, as occaſion of ſeruice was anie where offered. But now to returne to the doings at home. Whileſt this iournie was made (as ye haue heard) into Scotland, the fiue & twentith of Maie in the morning was found hanging on the biſhop of Londons palace gate in Pauls churchyard, a bull which latelie had beene ſent from Rome, conteining diuerſe horrible treaſons againſt the queens maieſtie: for the which one John Felton was ſhortlie after apprehended, and committed to the tower of London. ¶ And becauſe the ſaid bull may appeare and ſhew it ſelfe in nature and kind, it is behoofull here to interlace ſome rotings of the ſame, as I haue gathered them out of one that I am ſure had a conſcience to tell the truth: which I therefore am the willinger to inſert, that the world may iudge the heinouſneſſe of Feltons fact, in firing ſo peſtilent a libell vpon a prelats gate in a place of common concourſe, and againſt the queens excellent maieſtie.

Wherevpon maister Doue Dzurie immediatlie apzehended Iohn Throckmozton, and after him manie gentlemen of the citie of Nozwich, and the countie of Nozffolke, who were all committed to pzison, and at the nert sessions of goale deliuerie at the castell of Nozwich, the seauentéenth of Julie befoze sir Robert Catlin knight lozd chéefe iustice, Gilbert Gerard the quénes attozne generall, and other iustices, ten of them were indicted of high treason, and some others of contempt. Diuerse of them were condemned, and had iudgement the one and twentith of August: and afterward thzée of them were hanged, bowelled, and quartered, which were Iohn Throckmozton of Nozwich gentleman, who stood mute at his arreignment, but at the gallows confessed himselfe to be the chéefe conspirazor, and that none had deserued to die but he, foz that he had pzocured them. With him was executed Thomas Bzoke of Kolsbie gentleman on the thirtith of August; and Geozge Dedman of Cringleford gentleman was likewise executed the second of September.

The duke of Nozffolke remoued.

The fourth of August, the duke of Nozffolke was remoued from the tower of London to the Charterhouse néere vnto Smithfield. The same daie was arreigned at the Guildhall of London, Iohn Felton, foz hanging the foresaid bull of pope Pius Quintus on the gate of the bishop of Londons palace: and also two yong men foz coining & clipping of coine, who all were found guiltie of high treason, and had iudgement to be dzawne, hanged, & quartered. The eight of August Iohn Felton was dzawen from Newgate into Paules churchyard, and there hanged on a gallows new set vp that mozning before the bishops palace gate; and being cut downe aliue, he was bowelled and quartered. After this, the same mozning the shiriffes returned to Newgate, and so to Tiboine with two yong men, which were there executed foz coining and clipping, as is afozesaid.

Felton arreigned with other offendors, and all condemned.

The quénes words.

The two and twentith of August the earle of Sussex, lozd lieutenant generall foz the quénes maiestie in the nozth, and the lozd Scrope warden of the west marches, with diuerse others, marched from Carleill with the quéens armie and fozce of the nozth as well of hozsemen as fotmen into Scotland, passing ouer the riuers of Eske, Leuine & Sarke, which riuer of Sarke parteth England and Scotland, and so to Dozrnocke wood belonging to Edward Arone, the lord of Wonshow, and then to Annan a strong house of the lozd Harris, which they rased and ouerthzew with others thereabouts: from thense to Hodham, which they burnt and blew vp: from thense to Kennell, a towne belonging to the lozd Cowhill, which they burnt: from thense to Donfrise, which they sacked and spoiled of such paltrie as the fugitiues had left, and also rased and ouerthzew a sumptuous house belonging to the quéene of Scots, in the kéeping of the lozd Harris. Then passing the riuer of Longher, they burnt and spoiled Cowhilles, and Powtracke, and returned to Donfrise, and so to the towne of Wankend, which they burnt, with another house pertéining to William Maxwell of the Iles, and so to the castell of Carlauarocke standing in a marish, fast to an arme of the sea, which parteth Annerdale and Gallowaie; which castell they blew vp, and returned homeward, transpozting their ozdinance ouer quicksands and bogs, where neuer the like was done befoze, and so came to Dozrnocke wood.

Multiplex Elisabethæ virtus.

The eight of August they marched towards Carleill, where (by the waie) they burnt and ouerthzew two houses, the one being Arthur Greames alias Carleill, the other rich Geozge, two notable théeues. The same daie at night after the lozd lieutenants coming to Carleill he made knights, sir Edward Hastings, sir Francis Russell, sir Valentine Bzowne, sir William Hilton, sir Robert Stapleton, sir Henrie Curwen, sir Simon Musgraue. This yéere the fift of October chanced a terrible tempest of wind and raine both by sea and land, by meanes whereof manie ships perished, & much hurt was done in diuerse parts of the realme, as by a little pamphlet set foorth therof by Thomas Knell minister appéereth, the effect whereof insueth. About midnight the water ouerflowed so much, that men were faine to forsake their beds, & one woman drowned, where also were lost a great number of sheepe, oxen, kine, horsse, and other cattell. Among other there, one maister Cartwright gentleman, hauing his house inclosed round about, the water came in so much, that a cart being laden with thornes did swim about the ground. Hée lost by the same flood, sheepe, and other cattell, to the value of an hundred pounds. The same gentleman had a close gate by the high waies side, where the water ran ouer so extremelie, that at the fall thereof it made such an hole, that it was fortie foot déepe: so that no man could passe that waie without great danger. To the filling vp of the said hole or pit, was cast in by the men of the said towne fiue and twentie lodes of faggots, & twentie lodes of horsse dung, which said faggots and horsse dung filled not the hole. Also one maister Lée at the friers in Bedford, hauing a faire yard, wherein was great store of elme trées, whereof thrée score were blowen downe, with the roots pulled cleane out of the ground. Also he had a close of conies that were cleane destroied.

Tempest by sea and land which did much hurt.

Tho. Knell. What hurt this tempest did in Bedfordshire.

A wonder of an hole made in the ground by a water-course.

The sea brake in betwixt Wisbich and Walsocken, and at the crosse keies drowning Tilneie, and old Lin, saint Marie Teding, saint Marie Tid, saint Johns Wauple, Walton & Walsocken, Emneie, Jarmans, and Stow bridge, all being the space of ten miles. At the crosse keies the goodman of the inne had built an house with a strong foundation ioining vnto an other house being old and not so strong, wherein were certeine ghests. And when the water came in so violentlie, the goodman of the house being in the stronger house, called the men out of the old house, and they would haue gone downe the staires, but the water was so high that they could not come downe, wherefore they went backe againe, and brake an hole into the other house, where they went thorough, and the last man was no sooner in, but the old house fell downe. The walles of the houses were broken downe, and the horsses that were tied at the manger (which was made fast in the ground) did swim in the water, when the stable was cleane carried awaie, vntill the waters were allwaged, and were saued aliue, and the people were constreined to get vp to the highest parts of the house, and so to be carried awaie in botes.

What hurt this tempest did in the countie of Nozffolke.

At Yarmouth a great part of the bridge was carried awaie. The house vpon the hauen called the hauen house, wherein was one Nicholas Iossellin the hauen man & his son, with all their toles, were carried into the marishes six miles from the hauen, where it stood vpright, and where they abode long without meat or drinke. Also at Iermans Bridgestréet was verie much hurt done by the extreame floods that were there. Also one Thomas Smith of Yarmouth lost a ship, with seauen men and a boie in it. Also at Newarke by Yarmouth were lost twelue saile. Also a great hulke, laden with oile and pitch, was lost at Wozreie sand, and about twentie men lost therein, and thirtie saued by the hulke bote. These townes and villages were ouerflowne, that is to saie, Wisbich, Guiborne, Parson Dzoue, and Hobhouse. This Hobhouse being an almes house (and the water breaking downe the wals of it) the wind blew the cloths off from the bed of a poze man & his wife: the who being cold, awaked, and suddenlie stept out of his bed to reach vp his cloths, and slipt vp to the belie in water, and then he thinking himselfe to be in danger (as he was in deed) and knowing the best waie to escape the danger of the water, he toke his wife on his necke, and carried hir awaie, and so were both saued.

At the same time in Wisbich was a garden, a tennise plaie, & a bowling alle walled about with bricke (which was worth twentie pounds by yeare to the owner) was quite destroied by the water. Mumbie chappell, the whole towne was lost, except three houses. A ship was driuen vpon an house, the sailers thinking they had béene vpon a rocke, committed themselues to God: and three of the marriners lept out of the ship, and chanced to take hold on the house top, and so saued themselues: and the wife of the same lieng in childbed, by climing vp into the top of the house, was also saued by the marriners, hir husband and child being both drowned. Likewise, the church was wholie ouerthrowne except the steeple. Betweene Boston and Newcastell were threescore sea vessels, as small ships, craires, and such like, lost vpon the coasts of Boston, Humerston, Marsh chappell, Tetnie, Stepneie, Nercots, Kelbie, & Grimsbie, where no ship can come in without a pilot, which were all lost, with goods, corne, & cattell, with all the salt cotes, where the chiefe and finest salt was made, were vtterlie destroied, to the vtter vndoing of manie a man, and great lamentation both of old and yong.

Wentford bridge, being verie strong, of eight arches in length, had three of the arches broken, and cleane carried awaie. Master Smith at the swan there had his house (being three stories high) ouerflowed vnto the third storie, and the wals of the stable were broken downe, and the horsses tied to the manger were all drowned. Manie men had great losse, as well of sheepe, kine, oxen, great mares, colts of the breed of the great horsses, and other cattell innumerable, of which the names manie of them shall here follow. Master Pekham lost eleuen hundred sheepe at Mumbie chappell. In Summercots were lost fiue hundred sheepe, that were of the inhabitants there. Also betweene Humerston & Grimsbie were lost eleuen hundred sheepe of one master Spensers, whose sheepheard about middaie, comming to his wife, asked his dinner: and she being more bold than manerlie, said, he should haue none of hir. Then he chanced to looke toward the marishes where the sheepe were, and saw the water breake in so fiercelie, that the sheepe would be lost, if they were not brought from thense, said, that he was not a good sheepheard that would not venture his life for his sheepe, & so went streight to driue them from thense, but he & his sheepe were both drowned, and after the water being gone, he was found dead, standing vpright in a ditch.

Master Thimblebie lost two hundred and twentie sheepe, master Dimocke lost foure hundred sheepe, & master Marsh fiue hundred, master Madison lost a ship, master William Askugh of Kelseie, sir Hugh Askugh, master Merin, master Fitz Williams of Maplthorpe, lost by estimation twentie thousand cattell, one and other. Borne was ouerflowne vnto the midwaie of the height of the church. Steeping was wholie carried awaie, where was a waine lode of willow tops, the bodie of the waine with the willowes carried one waie, and the axiltree and wheeles an other waie. In the towne of saint Edes, the water flowed into the towne in such abundance, that it ran thorough the towne and church, being in the middest therof, hauing about the churchyard a bricke wall of two yards high, was so ouerflowne, that botes were rowed ouer it, without touching of the same. Also a little from Huntington, were three men riding vpon the causeie, being then ouerflowne (the water on the causeie being not deepe) and thinking no danger therein, chanced to come into a place where the water had galled awaie the earth, and the grauell, were carried awais with the water: and willowes growing on both sides the waie, two of them caught hold on the willowes, and left their horsses, and saued themselues: and the third chanced to catch a verie little twig of willow betweene his fingers, hauing verie little hold, and forsaking his horsse, which was carried a great waie from him, had much paine to keepe his hold on the twig, and hold his head aboue the water, and his horsse returning with force against the streame, came againe vnto him, and vnder him: by which meanes he set his feet vpon him, and gat better hold of the willow, and so saued him selfe, and the horsse was immediatlie carried awaie, that he neuer saw him after.

Also Holland, Leuerington, Newton chappell in the sea, long Stutton & Holbich were ouerflowne. And in this countrie also was great losse of cattell. In the low parts in Weseland, in a little towne called Cliffield, there was a man, his wife, and a sucking child in hir armes ouerwhelmed and slaine by the violence of the waters, and of the boisterous winds. The water called Auen, that passeth by the towne called Stratford vpon Auen, did run with such violence, that meeting with the water called the Seuerne, drone it backe ten miles against the course, ouerflowing much ground, and drowning much cattell. In Newport panell were two houses ouerthrowne, and in one of them an old man and an old woman were ouerwhelmed and slaine. And in the same towne, on the backe side of the Saracens head, the water sprang out of the hard grauellie ground, and flowed so fast, that certeine merchants (sitting there at dinner) were faine to rise and depart from thense to saue themselues. Sir Henrie Leie knight (dwelling at Quarrington) lost by the floods the number of three thousand sheepe, besides horsses and other cattell, a great number.

In the With at Rie (a place so called) the water came in so suddenlie, and flowed so high about midnight, that it was eight or nine foot high in mens houses: insomuch that if one William White had not called them vp, some of them had like to haue béene drowned. And the same William White hauing a bote, fetcht a great compasse of them out of their windowes, and carried them to drie land as fast as he could fetch them, which were in great danger and feare, and glad to escape with their liues. Moreouer, the water came in so vehementlie there, that it brake into the marishes, and made such waie, that where of late yeares, and now before this great flood came, a cockebote could not passe in at a low water, now a fisherman drawing six foot water and more maie come in at a low water, and at a full sea the greatest ship that the quéenes maiestie hath may come in, and haue good harborough there. The continuance of the same will not onelie be profitable to the most part of the inhabitants there, but also commodious vnto all the quéenes subiects trauelling by sea.

And whereas one of the owners of a great part of the same marishes had certeine poles set vp therein (and being verie meet and in conuenient place of the same marish) for the dreng of their fishing nets, and receiued monie yeerelie of those that dried their nets there sufficientlie inough: yet he caused his seruant to pull vp the poles, and laie them in an house standing in the same marish: and also commanded his seruant to giue them warning, that they should no more more hang their nets there, except they would come and compound with him for it. And the same night (by Gods prouidence) it came so to passe, that according to his saieng (though contrarie to his good will and mind) they are not like to hang their nets there anie more, bicause of the depth of the water is so great, and like to continue. In hope of continuance of the same new opened hauen, certeine men of the same towne haue begun to build faire barks to trauell the seas, the which in continuance of time will be a great furtherance to the maintenance of the quænes name. At the blacke shore end, before the said flood, no bote could passe further than the shore end; and now a bote that draweth six foot water maie come in at a low water. Without the barre, the water is deeper than it was by two foot and more in the chanell.

At Pyum hill marish, foure miles from Rie, the water came in so outragiouslie, that it brake downe the marish wals, one master Burie being owner thereof, who lost by the same a thousand one hundred threscore and two of his sheepe, and it is thought that the marish is neuer like to be gotten againe. Also at Erith breach, a mariner riding by the marishes, seeing two maidens in the marishes, and perceiuing the waters breaking in so fast, that the maides were not like to escape, rode vnto them, and one of them gat vp behind him, & the other tooke hold on the horsse taile, and by that means were both saued from drowning. In the same marish were drowned a great number of sheepe. Also there in a marish land that was sowne, were two boies keeping crowes in the after none, & seeing the water breaking in so vehementlie, gat them into a cart that was not farre from them, where they were faine to tarrie vntill the next tide, which came in so boisterouslie, that it had like to haue ouerthrowne both the cart & boies. And the one of them being more stronger than the other, kept the other in his armes, where he with cold, wet, and feare, died: so that he was faine to let him fall from him into the water, when he perceiued that he was past recouerie. A little from that place were also drowned a thousand sheepe, and also manie other cattell.

From a towne called Rainam, vnto the towne named Maudon, all alongst by the water side were the marishes all ouerflowen, wherein were a great number of cattell drowned. In Claie were two ships laden with Danske ware which came to shore, with no man in them, nor anie man could tell of whence they were. In Claie the dwellers there lost a verie great parcell of salt and herrings barrelled, being housed in an house walled with bricke three foot thicke, and yet the wall was broken downe. Also, there was lost much saffron ground, with manie other things mo, to the great hinderance of manie a man. Also, in Walderswicke, Dunwich, and Blibrooke, was great losse of bord, planke, timber, and salt. A great part of the bridge by Magdalene college was borne cleane awaie, and manie trees were turned vp by the root.

The three and twentith of Januarie, the quænes maiestie, accompanied with hir nobilitie, came from hir house at the Strand, called Summerset place, and entered the citie of London by Temple bar, Flætstreet, Cheape, and so by the north side of the Burse, to sir Thomas Greshams in Bishops gate street, where she dined. After dinner, hir grace returning through Cornehill, entred the Burse on the southside, and after hir highnesse had viewed euerie part thereof aboue ground, especiallie the Pawne, which was richlie furnished with all sorts of the finest wares in the citie, she caused the same Burse by an herald and a trumpet, to be proclamed the Royall exchange, so to be called from thenceforth, and not otherwise.

The seuententh of Februarie at a place called Kinnaston, nere Marlech hill in the countie of Hereford, was seene the ground to open, and certeine rockes with a peece of ground remoued, and went forward the space of foure daies, making at the first a terrible noise as it went on the earth. It remoued it selfe betweene six of the clocke in the euening, & seuen the next morrow forty pases, carrieng great trees and shepecotes, some shepecotes with three score sheepe in them, some trees fell into the chinkes, other that grew on the same ground, grow now as firmelie on a hill; and some that stood east, stand west; and those that stood west, stand east. The depth of the hole where it first brake out is thirtie foot, the breadth of the breach is eight score yards, and in length aboue twentie score yards. It ouerthrew Kinnaston chapell. Also two high waies be remoued nigh one hundred yards, with the trees of the hedgerowes. The ground in all is six and twentie acres: and where tillage ground was, there is pasture left in place; and where was pasture, there is tillage ground gone vpon it. The ground as it remoued draue the earth before it, & at the lower part ouerwhelmed the ground, so that it is growen to a great hill of twelue fadams high. It remoued from saturdaie till mondaie at night following, and so staied.

Moreouer this yeare about Candelmas, sir Thomas Sackuille, baron of Buckhurst was sent in ambassage from the quænes maiestie to Charles the ninth French king, as well to congratulate for his marriage with the daughter of the emperour Maximilian, as for other weightie affaires. And as his ambassage was great, so was his charge no lesse in furnishing himselfe and traine accordinglie, being both in number and furniture such in euerie point, as did apperteine; and his receiuing and interteinement in France by the king and others was agreeable thereto, for he was receiued vpon the coast by the gouernours of the fortified townes right honorablie by order from the king. Among other the baron of Bournoisell was one, who being verie well mounted and appointed, left not his lordship before he came to the court, and from thense accompanied him backe vntill his imbarkement homewards.

Sir Thomas Sackuille ambassador to the French king.

His interteinement verie honorable.

In the maine countries he was accompanied with the gouernours and nobles of the places about. And in the good townes where he passed, he was presented by the chiefe magistrates, wherein their good wils were to be thankefullie accepted, though his lordships rewards far ouervalued their presents. At his approch nere to Paris he was incountred on the waie for courtesie sake, by two marquesses of Trans and Saluces; this being of the house of Sauoie, and the other of the worthie familie of Foix. These wanted not such as accompanied them, and the same euen of the best sort. At the lord ambassadors first audience, which was at the castell of Madrill, otherwise called Bullogne nere Paris (where the king then laie) the quænes Almane coches verie brauelie furnished were sent to Paris for him, in one of the which his lordship with the marquesse of Trans rode towards the court, verie narrowlie escaping from a shrewd turne and great mischance, by reason the same coch was ouerthrowen by the Dutch wagoners their negligence, who in a brauerie galloping the field made an ouer short turne, wherewith the marques was sore bruised.

was verie large, but his reward at the kings hands was onelie a chaine waieng a thousand French crownes. At that present there was a great dearth & scarsitie of victels in France. The riuer of Saine that runneth through Paris was not passable with vessels, by reason of the great frosts: and thereby not onelie all kind of victels, but also haie and wood hard to come by, and not to be had but at excessiue prices, the countrie thereabouts hauing before béene sore harried and spoiled by the ciuill tumults. By reason whereof, not onlie the lord of Buckhurst for the space he remained there, but also sir Henrie Norrice (now lord Norrice) and maister Francis Walsingham hir maiesties ambassadors, ligiers successiuelie, were driuen to an increase in expenses, paieng for euerie thing they bought an higher price than ordinarilie had béene accustomed.

The riuer of Saine not passable with vessels.

After that the lord Buckhurst had béene feasted and banketted by the king, and other of the French nobilitie, and had accomplished the points of his ambassage, he toke leaue of the king, & departed homewards, arriuing here in England a little before Easter. The second of Aprill a parlement began at Westminster, wherein was granted to the quéenes maiestie (toward hir great charges, in repressing the late rebellion in the north, and pursuing the said rebels and their fautors, which were fled into Scotland) by the clergie a subsidie of six shillings in the pound; and by the temporaltie two fifteens, with a subsidie of two shillings and eight pence in the pound. The first, the second, and third of Maie was holden at Westminster before the quéenes maiestie a solemne iust at the tilt, tourneie and barriers. The chalengers were Edward earle of Oxford, Charles Howard, sir Henrie Lée, and Christopher Hatton esquier, who all did verie valiantlie; but the chiefe honour was giuen to the earle of Oxford. The first of June, John Stozie a doctor of the canon law, who before had bæne condemned of high treason, was drawen from the tower of London to Tiborne, and there hanged, bowelled, and quartered, his head was set on London bridge, and his quarters on the gates of the citie. Of this monster disguised in the likenesse of a man, it is verie materiall to record what maister Fox hath noted in his historie.

Doctor Storie executed for high treason.

Abr. Fl. ex Iohan. Foxi martyrologio.

¶ This doctor Storie (saith he) being an Englishman by birth, and from his infancie not onelie nuzled in papistrie, but also euen as it were by nature earnestlie affected to the same, & growing somewhat to riper yeares, in the daies of quéene Marie became a most bloudie tyrant, and cruell persecutor of Christ in his members, as all the stories of martyrs almost doo declare. Thus he raging all the reigne of the foresaid quéene Marie, against the infallible truth of Christs gospell, and the true professors thereof, neuer ceased till he had consumed to ashes two or three hundred blessed martyrs, who willinglie gaue their liues for the testimonie of his truth. And thinking their punishment in fire not cruell inough, he went about to inuent new torments for the holie martyrs of Christ; such was his hatred to the truth of Christs gospell: but in the end the Lord loking vpon the affliction, and cruell bloudshedding of his seruants, toke awaie quéene Marie the great piller of papistrie. After whome succéeded ladie Elisabeth now quéene of England, who (taieng the bloudie sword of persecution from raging anie further, caused the same doctor Storie to be apprehended, and committed to ward with manie other his complices, sworne enimies to Christs glorious gospell.

Storie's birth.

Storie's education and birth.

Storie a bloudie persecutor.

Storie inuenting new torments for the martyrs.

Storie apprehended.

Storie conueied himselfe ouer the seas, where he continued a bloudie persecutor.

The said Storie hauing bæne a while detained in prison, at the last by what means I know not, brake forth of hold, and conueied himselfe ouer the seas, where he continued a most bloudie persecutor, still raging against Gods saints with fire and sword. Insomuch as he growing to be familiar and right dere to duke Dalua in Antwerpe, receiued a speciall commission from him to search all the ships for goods forfeited, and for English bookes and such like. And in this fauour and authoritie he continued there for a space, by the which meanes he did much hurt, and brought manie a good man and woman to trouble, and extreme perill of life through his bloudthirstie crueltie. But at the last the Lord (when the measure of his iniquitie was full) proceeded in iudgement against him, and cut him off from the face of the earth, according to the praters of manie a good man, which came to passe in order as followeth.

Storie obteined a commission to search for English bookes.

It being certeinlie knowne (for the brute thereof was gone forth into all lands) that he not onelie intended the subuersion and ouerthrow of his natiue countrie of England by bringing in forren hostilitie, if by anie means he might compasse it; but also dailie and hourelie murthered Gods people: there was this platforme laid (by Gods prouidence no doubt) that one maister Parker a merchant should saile vnto Antwerpe, and by some means to conueie Storie into England. This Parker arriuing at Antwerpe, suborned certeine to repaire to doctor Storie, and to signifie vnto him, that there was an English ship come fraught with merchandize; and that if he would make search thereof himselfe, hée should find store of English bookes, and other things for his purpose. Storie hearing this and suspecting nothing, made hast towards the ship, thinking to make the same his preie; and comming aboord searched for English hereticall books (as he called them) & going downe vnder the hatches, bicause he would be sure to haue their blood if he could, they clapped downe the hatches, hoised vp their sailes, hauing (as God would) a good gale, and sailed awaie into England, where they arriuing presented this bloudie butcher and traitorous rebell Storie, to the no little reioising of manie an English heart.

Storie vnderstanding how he was sought for, and by whome.

A platforme laid to apprehend Storie.

Storie searched the English ships for bookes, and is apprehended and brought into England.

He being now committed to prison, continued there a good space: during all which time, he was laboured and solicited dailie by wise and learned fathers, to recant his diuelish & erroneous opinions, to confirme himselfe to the truth, and to acknowledge the quéenes maiesties supremasie. All which he vtterlie denied to the death, saieng that he was sworne subiect to the king of Spaine, and was no subiect to the quéene of England, nor hée his souereigne quéene. And therefore (as he well deserued) he was condemned (as a traitor to God, the quéenes maiestie, and the realme) to be drawne, hanged, and quartered, which was performed accordinglie, he being laid vpon an hurdle, and drawne from the tower along the streets to Tiburne, where he being hanged till he was halfe dead, was cut downe and striped. And (which is not to be forgot) when the executioner had cut off his priuie members, he rushing vp vpon a sudden gaue him a blow vpon the eare, to the great wonder of all that stood by. And thus ended this bloudie Nemrod his wretched life, whose iudgement I leaue to the Lord.]

Storie's treason hanged, drawne and quartered.

The eightéenth of June, in Trinitie terme, there was a combat appointed to haue bæne fought for a certeine manour & demaine lands belonging thereunto, in the Ile of Hartie, adioining to the Ile of Shepeie in Kent. Simon Low & John Lime were plaintifs, and had brought a writ of right against Thomas Paramore, who offered to defend his right by battell. Wherupon the plaintifs aforsaid accepted to answer his challenge, offering likewise to defend their right to the same manour and lands, and to proue by battell, that Paramore had no right nor good title to haue the same manour and lands. Herevpon

A combat appointed as (Tuthill hir notes) but not tried.

vpon the said Thomas Paramore brought before the iudges of the common pleas at Westminster, one George Thorne, a big, broad, strong set fellow; & the plaintifs Henrie Nailer, maister of defense, and seruant to the right honourable the earle of Leicester, a proper slender man, & not so tall as the other. Thorne cast downe a gantlet, which Nailer toke vp, vpon the sundaie before the battell should be tried. On the next morow, the matter was staied, & the parties agreed, that Paramore being in possession shuld haue the land, & was bound in fiue hundred pounds to consider the plaintifs, as vpon hearing the matter the iudges should award. The quenes maiestie abhorring bloudshed, & (as the poet verie well saith) was the taker vp of the matter, in this wise. It was thought good, that for Paramores assurance, the order should be kept touching the combat, and that the plaintifs Low and Kime should make default of appearance; but that yet such as were suerties for Nailer their champions appearance, should bring him in; and likewise those that were suerties for Thorne, should bring in the same Thorne in discharge of their band: and that the court should sit in Tuthill fields, where was prepared one plot of ground, of one and twentie yards square, double railed for the combat. Without the west square a stage being set vp for the iudges, representing the court of the common pleas.

All the compasse without the lists was set with scaffolds one aboue another, for people to stand and behold. There were behind the square where the iudges sat, two tents, the one for Nailer, the other for Thorne. Thorne was there in the morning timelie, Nailer about seauen of the clocke came thorough London, apparelled in a dublet, and gallie gascoine breeches all of crimsin sattin, cut and raised, a hat of blacke veluet, with a red feather and band, before him drums and fifes plaieng. The gantlet cast downe by George Thorne was borne before the said Nailer vpon a swords point, and his baston (a staffe of an ell long made taper wise tipt with horne) with his shield of hard leather was borne after him, by Askam a yeoman of the quenes garde. He came into the palace at Westminster, and staieng not long before the hall doore, came backe into the Kings street, and so along thorough the Sanctuarie and Tuthill street into the field, where he staied till past nine of the clocke, and then sir Jerome Bowes brought him to his tent: Thorne being in the tent with sir Henrie Cheinie long before.

About ten of the clocke, the court of common pleas remoued, & came to the place prepared. When the lord chiefe iustice, with two other his associats were set, then Low was called solemnlie to come in, or else to lose his writ of right. Then after a certeine time, the suerties of Henrie Nailer were called to bring in the said Nailer, champion for Simon Low. And shortlie therevpon, sir Jerome Bowes, leading Nailer by the hand, entred with him the lists, bringing him downe that square by which he entred, being on the left hand of the iudges, and so about till he came to the next square, iust against the iudges, and there making courtesie, first with one leg and then with the other, passed forth till he came to the middle of the place, and then made the like obeisance, and so passing till they came to the barre, there he made the like courtesie, and his shield was held vp aloft ouer his head. Nailer put off his nether stocks, and so barefoot and barelegged, saue his silke scaullones to the ankles, and his dublet sleeues tied vp aboue the elbow, and bareheaded, came in, as is aforesaid. Then were the suerties of George Thorne called to bring in the same Thorne: and immediatlie sir Henrie Cheinie entering at the vpper end on the right hand of the iudges, vsed the like order in comming about by his side, as Nailer had before on that other side: and so comming to the barre with like obeisance, held vp his shield. Proclamation was made that none should touch the barres, nor presume to come within the same, except such as were appointed.

After all this solemne order was finished, the lord chiefe iustice rehearsing the maner of bringing the writ of right by Simon Low, of the answer made thereunto by Paramore, of the proceeding therein, and how Paramore had challenged to defend his right to the land by battell, by his champion Thomas Thorne, and of the accepting the triall that was by Low with his champion Henrie Nailer: & then for default of appearance in Low, he adiudged the land to Paramore, & dismissed the champion, acquiting the suerties of their bands. He also willed Henrie Nailer to render againe to George Thorne his gantlet. Whereto the said Nailer answered, that his lordship might command him anie thing, but willinglie he wold not render the said gantlet to Thorne except he could win it. And further he challenged the said Thorne to play with him halfe a score blowes, to shew some pastime to the lord chiefe iustice, & to the other there assembled. But Thorne answered, that he came to fight, & would not plate. Then the lord chiefe iustice commending Nailer for his valiant courage, comanded them both quietlie to depart the field, &c.

On the sixteenth of Julie, Rebecca Chamber, late wife to Thomas Chamber of Yerietteshame, was found culpable of poisoning the said Thomas Chamber hir husband, at the assises holden at Maidstone in the countie of Kent. For the which fact she (hauing well deserued) was there burnt on the next morrow. The seuenth of September, the duke of Norfolke was remoued from the Charterhouse, to the tower of London prisoner. The two and twentith of September deceassed Iohn Jewell bishop of Salisburie, in his life a most eloquent and diligent preacher, but a far more painefull and studious writer, as his workes remaining do beare witnesse, wherby his fame shall neuer die. The ninth of Nouember, a sermon was preached in Paules church at London, by maister William Foulks of Cambridge, to giue thanks to almightie God for the victorie, which of his mercifull clemencie it had pleased him to grant to the christians in the Leuant seas, against the common enimies of our faith, the Turks, the seuenth of October last past. His theame was taken out of the sixteenth psalme of Dauids psalter, the fourth verse.

There were present at this sermon, the lord maior of London sir William Allen, with the aldermen and craftsmen in their liueries. And in the euening there were bonefiers made through the citie, with banketting and great reioising, as good cause there was, for a victorie of so great importance vnto the whole state of the christian common-wealth. In the which were taken one hundred and thirtie vessels, that is, one hundred and seuentéene gallies, and thirtéene galleots, besides other vessels that were bonged, abandoned, and let go at large abroad in the seas, as gallies, foists, and galleots, to the number of fourescore, or thereabouts. And of their chiefe teins slaine in that bloudie battell, these we find by name as principall: Halie Balla high admerall of the whole naule, Amar Beie capteine of the Ianisaries, Allan Beie the sonne of Barbarossa, with his sonne Mehemet Beie gouernor of Mitellene, Gider-Beie gouernour of Chio, Capsan Beie gouernour of the Rhodes, Peruts Aga gouernor of Affrica otherwise Mahomeda, Mustafa Sceiubie high treasuror, Affis Cluaga captreine of Gallipolie, Tramontans chiefe maister of the Turkish kish emperours owne gallie, Caracoza, and also manie others, whose names were too long to rehearse: but the whole number that were slaine of the Turks could not be perfectlie knowne, by reason that manie were drowned in the sea, which came not to fight.

The whole number of the slaine. Bizari. Contareno.

Some yet affirme, that there were slaine of them in all, to the number of one and twentie thousand, although other speake but of fiftéene thousand. But Contareno writeth, that there were slaine and taken 29990. Of which number he reckoneth 3846 to haue remained prisoners, and among them were these persons of name, Mahemet Beie, Hainus Beie, and Strocho Beie. There escaped yet from this discomfiture, Partau, generall of all the men of warre and souldiors by land, Ochialie, Murate Raie with his sonne, and Hali Genouese, and with them about fortie gallies, foists, and fregats. Moreouer, there were found in the Turkish gallies that came into the hands of the christians, one hundred and sixtéene double canons, two hundred sixtie and fiue demie canons, and sixtéene other great peeces of braſſe. For it is to be remembred, that not onelie the Turkish gallies, but also the christians were throughlie armed, furnished, and appointed with men, munition, and ordinance in euerie behalfe.

Bizari.

Persons that escaped from this discomfiture.

Booties that fell into the christians hands.

In Halie Bassa his gallie there were aboord three hundred harquebusiers Ianissaries, and an hundred archers. In the gallie of Don Giouan de Austria chiefe admerall of the christians, were foure hundred harquebusiers Spaniards, of the tertse of Sardigna, beside a great number of lords and gentlemen, and also beside the rowers: and in euerie other gallie were 200 fighting men at the least, beside the rowers, & in some 300, & othersome 400 according to the mould of the vessels. The number of the christian gallies and galliots, were in all two hundred and two, besides six great gallealles. The Turks had their gallies, galliots, and foists, to the number of two hundred and fiftie, as appeareth by the account afore made, of those that were taken, abandoned, and escaped. There were deliuered and set at libertie, about twelue thousand, some say fourtéene thousand christian captiues, whome the Turks kept for slaues, and had them chained there aboord with them in their gallies. But this victorie was not got without great losse of the christians, for beside Augustine Barbarigo, the principall prouedtore of the Venetians, there died seuentéene other gentlemen of Venice, being men of good estimation, Iohn Cardone, & Barnardine Cardone Spaniards, Virginio and Horatio Vrsini Romans, Troilo, Sabello, Marco Molino, besides diuerse other nobles and gentlemen of name, as well Italians, as Spaniards, and Almans.

The number of the christian gallies & the Turkes.

Christian captiues set at libertie 14000.

Contareno. The number of christians that died. Bizari.

In all, there died of the christians to the number of seauen thousand six hundred fiftie and six, beside those that were hurt, being in like number to them that were slaine, among whom was don Iohn de Austria, generall of all the christian armie there, Sebastian Veniero the Venetians generall, & the counte de Santa Fiore with diuerse others. Moreouer, there were christian gallies bouged, three of the Venetians, one of the popes, one belonging to the duke of Sauoie, and another to the knights of Malta. There was one also taken & led awaie by Ochialie, and his companie. Such was the successe of this battell, which continued for the space of six houres, in the end whereof the victorie remaining with the christians, caused no small reioising throughout all parties of christendome. For if this victorie had béene followed, with his gratious helpe and assistance that was the giuer thereof, the proud and loftie horne of the Ismaelite had béene so brused, as peraduenture his courage would haue quailed to put forth the same so spédilie as he did. But such is the malice of the time, that the christians haue more pleasure to draw their weapons one against another, than against that common enimie of vs all, who regardeth neither protestant nor catholike (they may be sure) those of the Grékish church nor others, as if the mercifull prouidence of the Lord of hosts do not in time disapoint his procedings, it will be too soone perceiued, though happilie too late to stop the breach, when the flood hath got head, and once woone passage throughout the banke.

A common fault among christians.

It were therfore to be wished of all those that tender the suertie of the christian commonwealth, that princes would permit their subiects to liue in libertie of conscience, concerning matters of faith: and that subiects againe would be readie in dutifull wise, to obeie their princes in matters of ciuill gouernment, so that compounding their controuersies among themselues, with tollerable conditions, they might emploie their forces against the common enimie, to the benefit of the whole christian world, which (the more is the pitie) they haue so long exercised one against another, to each others destruction. And as for matters in variance about religion, rather to decide the same with the word, than with the sword, an instrument full vnfit for that purpose, and not lightlie vsed nor allowed of by the ancient fathers in time of the primitiue church. But sith this is rather to be wished than hoped for, by anie apparant likelihood, considering the strange contrarietie of humors now reigning among men in sundrie parts of christendome, let vs leaue the successe of our wish to the pleasure of God, the author of all good haps, who ruleth the harts of princes (as the poet saith verie truelie and frameth the peoples minds as séemeth best to his diuine prouidence. And withall, let vs also humblie offer to him our praiers, instantlie beséeching him to spare vs in mercie, and not to reward vs after our iniquities: but rather by his omnipotent power to turne from vs the violence of our enimies, in abridging their forces, as it may séeme good to his mercifull fauour and great clemencie.

God counteth if that faith be the faith of Christ & the true church.

The tenth of March deceased sir William Paulet knight, lord saint John, earle of Wilshire, marquesse of Winchester, knight of the honorable order of the garter, one of the quenes maiesties priuie councell, and lord high treasuror of England, at his manor of Basing. This worthie man was borne in the yeare of our Lord 1483, the first yeare of king Richard the third, and liued about the age of foure score and seauen yeares, in sir kings and quenes daies. He serued fiue kings and quenes, Henrie the seauenth, Henrie the eight, Edward the first, quene Marie, and quene Elisabeth. All these he serued faithfullie, and of them was greatlie fauoured. The pikemen were forthwith armed in faire corslets and other furniture according thervnto; the gunners had euerie of them his caliuer with the furniture, and murrians on their heads. To these were appointed diuerse valiant capteins, who to traine them vp in warlike feats, mustered them thrise euerie weeke, sometimes in the artillerie yard, teaching the gunners to handle their peeces, sometimes at the Miles end, & in saint Georges field, teaching them to skirmish. In the which skirmish on the Miles end the tenth of Aprill, one of the gunners of the goldsmiths companie was shot in the side with a pece of a scouring sticke left in one of the caliuers, wherof he died, and was buried the twelfe of Aprill in Pauls churchyard; all the gunners marching from the Miles end in battell raie, shot off their caliuers at his graue.

The fourth of Maie Walter Deuereux, lord Ferrers of Chartleie, and vicount of Hereford was created earle of Esser; and Edward Fines lord Clinton and Saie high admerall of England was created earle of Lincolne. The eight of Maie the parlement began at Westminster; and that same daie in the parlement by the quenes maiesties writs, sir Henrie Compton knight, lord of Compton in the Hole, sir Henrie Cheinie knight lord of Todington, sir William Paulet knight of Basing, & sir Henrie Norris knight lord of Ricot, were called barons into the higher house. In this parlement, for so much as the whole realme of England was exceedinglie pestered with roges, bagabunds, and sturdie beggers, by meanes whereof dailie happened diuerse horrible murthers, thefts, and other great outrages: it was enacted, that all persons aboue the age of foureteene yeares, being taken begging, vagarant, & wandering disorderlie, should be apprehended, whiped, and burned through the grissle of the right eare, with a hot iron of one inch compasse for the first time so taken.

The foure & twentith of Maie, Martine Bullocke was hanged on a gibet by the well with two buckets in Bishops gate street of London, for robbing, and most shamefullie murthering of a merchant named Arthur Hall, in the parsonage of S. Martine by the said well. This Martine had procured the said Arthur Hall to come to the said parsonage, to buie of him certeine plate. But after the said Arthur had well viewed the same, he said; This is none of your plate, it hath doctor Gardeners marke, and I know it to be his: That is true said Martine Bullocke, but he hath appointed me to sell it, &c. After this talke, whilest the said Arthur was weieng the plate, the same Martine fetcht out of the kitchin a thicke washing beetle, and comming behind him stroke the said Arthur on the head, that he felled him with the first stroke; and then strake him againe, and after tooke the said Arthurs dagger, and sticked him, and with his knife cut his throte: and after would haue trussed him in a Danske chest, but the same was too short. Wherupon he tumbled him downe a paire of staires, and after thinking to haue buried him in the cellar, his legs being broken with the first fall, and stiffe, he could not draw him downe the cellar staires being winding. Wherfore he cut off his legs with an hatchet, and in the end trussed him with straw in a drie vat: and saieng it was his apparell and bookes, caused the same to be carried to the water side, and so shipped to Rie. But as God would haue it, there was suspicion gathered against the murtherer, wherby he was examined before alderman Branch then one of the shiriffes of London; but so small likelihood appeared that he should be guiltie, that there was an honest man dwelling in saint Laurence Pontneis named Robert Gee a clothworker, who supposing the offendor to be cleere in the matter, vndertooke for his forth comming. Wherupon Bullocke being suffered to go at libertie, tipt awaie, first to Westminster; and there taking bote, passed vp the riuer: and comming on land beyond Kingston, passed forth till he came to Okingham, in the forrest of Windsore, an eight miles beyond the towne of Windsore: and from thense (what moued him, I leaue to the secret iudgement of God) he came backe againe vnto London, lodging at the red lion in Holborne.

For quéene Elisabeth hauing with mercie gouerned hir commonwealth, there was no punishment inflicted there vpon anie for the space of fourtéene yeares. Wherefore a new scaffold must néeds be made. Which when the duke at seuen of the clocke in the morning had mounted, hauing on a silken doublet, & a long gowne of like fine stuffe, all blacke, earnestlie he beheld the people round about with his cap on his head. Now when he had stood still a prettie while, and cast his eies vpon the scaffold, he asked whereabouts he might best stand to speake vnto the people: For the scaffold was foure square, and the people came flocking from all places. Now when he was directed to the east side thereof, and the people had muttered and whispered diuerslie among themselues, maister Alexander Nowell deane of Paules besought them that were present to be silent and still. Then began the duke to speake to the people as followeth.

It is a hard matter for a man of my calling to vse long spéech in such an audience, either for that audacitie serues me not, or for that comming to such an end as I do, the feare of death troubleth me: and therfore I beseech you all heartilie to beare with me, I will not be long, I will make a short spéech and diuide my talke into three parts. And first concerning my offense towards my prince, wherein some thing I haue to confesse against my selfe, and in some thing to cléere my selfe. I come not to complaine against my peeres, I do acquit them, I haue deserued to die, it is not vnknowne. I haue dealt with the quéene of Scots in verie great and high matters, without making my prince priuie therevnto, otherwise than I ought to haue done.

The duke confesseth his offense against the quenes maiestie.

There is one thing, which greatlie grudgeth my conscience, that is: when I was first deliuered out of this place, I made a submission, & promised the Q. neuer to deale further in that matter; and yet contrarie to my promise I meant & did otherwise, I am sorie for it. It was reported I made a vow and toke a solemne oth, and receiued the communion vpon it, that is not true: the other was too much. It was reported also I went about to destroie the citie of London: I take God to my witnesse I neuer meant to hurt this citie. I haue dealt with suspected persons, and such as haue shewed themselues enimies to the state; especiallie one I will name, to wit one Radulpho, whome I neuer talked withall but once, and then I liked not his dealing, he shewed me two letters which he said came from the pope.

He is sorie for the violating of his promis made to the quéene.

He maketh shew to cléere himselfe in diuerse points.

Then said one of the shiriffes of London, God my lord be short: he said, I will be short, I haue not much to saie, good gentlemen beare witnesse, I come not to cléere my selfe. I saw two letters, the one inciphered and the other disciphered. I was charged to confeder with the rebels, I take God to witnesse I did neuer. The secondarie interrupted him and said, I praie you my lord go not about to cléere your selfe, you haue béene tried as honourablie, as anie noble man hath euer béene in this land: I praie you make short, for the houre is past, it is vpon the perill of their liues (meaning the shiriffes) they can not suffer you.

Oh

He meaneth confession of his religion.

Oh I praie you giue me leaue a little, I do confesse my fault. This is my confession, I do confesse it, notwithstanding my religion. It hath been reported I haue béene a papist, a confederer with papists, a friend to them and a maintéiner of them and of their religion: I take God to witnesse I am none, nor euer was a papist since I knew what religion ment. I haue had friends, yea familiar friends, yea peraduenture seruants that haue béene papists, with whom I haue borne: but I take God to witnesse I am none, I vtterlie desie the pope and his religion, and I hope to be saued onlie by my faith in Iesus Christ: and I vtterlie abhorre all mans traditions. And if at anie time I did giue countenance to anie papist, thereby anie goodman or the church was offended, I aske them mercie: there is no man that alloweth better of this religion than I do. Then he was desired againe to be short. Now touching the goodnesse of the quæns maiestie, I am much bound to hir grace. I do thanke hir humblie for that she hath forgiuen all my offenses, and hath prolonged my life so long. You sée how good she hath béen to me, I haue béene loked for here long before this time, God send hir long ouer you to reigne, she hath promised me to be gratious to my poore orphan children. God grant my death maie end all troubles. And if anie of you haue anie one faction, or two, or thrée, or mo, let him giue ouer & forsake it. Manie wish and desire diuerse things: but they know not what they wish. They sécke their owne destruction. If euerie man should haue his wish, God knoweth how manie would repent, whatsoeuer they are.

He confesseth himselfe much bound to the quænes maiestie.

He exhorteth to beware of factions.

The quéene hath promised in my death to forgiue all, and I praie God that she maie liue manie yeares. I remember well the words of that good father and holie martyr Latimer. He told the people, that for their wickednesse God would take awaie his blessing from them. I praie God the contrarie, that your good life maie be such, that God maie turne awaie those plagues that he hath thretned. He spake it in an honorable place, in the pulpit, before king Edward: yet let not this place discredit my words. I praie God preserue the quéens maiestie, and that she maie liue and reigne ouer you manie yeares: euen to the worlds end, which I beléeue that some one aliue shall sée. Then he knéeled downe and praied, and maister Nowell knéeled downe by him and wept, with manie others. His praier was vnto God for the continuance of the truth of his gospell; he praied also instantlie for the quénes most prosperous reigne, and knéeling vpon his knées he said two psalms, to wit Miserere and Domine ne in furore, and in the first psalme he praied to build the wals of Ierusalem, according to the psalme. Maister Nowell said, That is meant of Christs church. I know that well (said he) I meane not the church of Rome, I abhorre it, but the church of England and of all the world whersoeuer it be.

He putteth the people in mind of Latimers words vttered before king Edward.

He praieth and manie more with him: the effect of his praier.

I haue forgotten one thing, I thanke thée God that hast put me in mind of it. I forgiue all the world and I aske all the world forgiuenesse: and I protest before God, if I knew anie particular man I had offended, I would namelie aske him forgiuenesse. Then he read the other psalme, wherein adulterie is mentioned, and when he came to that point, he said: I would I were as cleare in euerie thing as in that, sauing for thought, and that is as euill. Then he said a collect, and in the end he said, In manus tuas Domine, &c. in Latine and English. And then he desired the people to praie for him while he liued, for (quoth he) I loke not to haue anie excuse after my death. Then he imbraced sir Henrie Leie, and after a few secret words betweene them, Maister Nowell stood vp and said to the people, He doth desire you all with one voice to saie Lord haue mercie vpon him, and after to saie no more words, nor to make anie shout or shritching for troubling of him in his last visitation. Then the duke knéeled downe, and maister Nowell bowed himselfe towards him with manie imbracings, and toke there leaue each of other. Then the executioner desired him knéeling to forgiue him: and he toke him by the hand and forgaue him, and then requested sight of the axe; Maister Nowell said, The sight will trouble you. He answered; No, let me sée it: but he shewed it not, & then he laied his necke vpon the blocke. Then the executioner said; My lord your head lieth not well. I will make it lie well, saith he, & therewithall lifting vp his bodie he laid his necke euen vpon the blocke, which done it was cut cleane off at one stroke. This was the end of the duke of Northfolke, a man whose life God had limited, as also the estate wherein he sometimes flourished: both which (as all things else) in a short time vanished. Let all degrées therefore learne, both by precept and example to know God principallie, secondlie their souereigne Gods annointed, and finallie themselues to be subiects; forgetting their owne honour, which puffeth men vp manie times with the wind of vainglorie, euen to their owne ouerthrow, whilest they become insolent, and dreame that the transitorie aduancements of this world will make them princes, princes péeres; naie (O monstrous madnesse) gods, whereas all things are mutable and momentanie, and the higher that a man doth clime, the greater is his fall; as verie aptlie saith the poet in these words:

He knéeleth downe and submitteth himselfe to the axe.

He is sorie for the violating of his promise made to the quæne.

Hoc fragili varijs voluuntur casibus orbe
Omnia, celsa ruit turris grauiore ruina.

He maketh shew to clære himselfe in diuerse points.

He offereth all the world forgiuenesse, &c.

He iustifieth himselfe against the slaunder of adulterie.

The discourse and catalog of all the dukes of England by creation or descent since the time of the conquest.

The collection of Francis Botenille alias Thin, in the peare of Christ 1585.

TWo sentences, the one an Italian prouerbe, the other an old English byword haue moued me to make this collection (at the request of an other) of all the dukes of England. First the Italian said that France cannot abide anie treasurors, England anie dukes, nor Scotland anie kings, the truth whereof néed no confirming examples to be set downe, sith (as saith the philosopher) things subiect to the sense néed no further prowfe. Secondlie the English saieng hath been, that a Nag of fiue shillings shall beare all the dukes of England & Scotland, being spoken in no sense of disgrace to that honorable title: but onelie to shew that the time should come, wherein there should be no dukes in England or Scotland. Now true the same is in England, and likelie againe to be in Scotland (being once before verified in that realme, for about fiue years past, there was no duke there also when the duke of Lineur was banished) euerie man doth well perceiue. For the death of this Thomas duke of Northfolke, being the last of that honour hath iustified the same in England. And the turmoils in Scotland may perhaps shortlie verifie the same in that countrie, in which there were neuer so few dukes, as that they cannot make the first and smallest number: for being but one in that countrie, and he verie young (which is the duke of Lineur) if he should miscarie, the same would againe also be as true there as it is now here. For which cause to perpetuat the memories of such antiquities and titles of honor, as age hath consumed with the persons which inioied such preheminences in England, I will from the first creation of anie duke since the conquest recite the creation, descent, and succession of all the dukes of England, shewing first the time of the creation of such dukes, & secondlie the descent of all such dukes as are lineallie issued out of that creation, which follow as they came in one line.

Edward the blacke prince, duke of Cornwall.

Edward (the eldest sonne of king Edward the third) being surnamed the blacke prince, was made duke of Cornewall the eleauenth of Edward the third, in the yeare of our redemption 1337, when he was yet but yong. This yong prince was the first duke in England since the conquest, and Cornewall was by that creation the first place that was erected to a dukedome. Which duke, being the flower of chiualrie in his time, died about the fiftith yeare of king Edward the third, in the yeare of Christ 1376, and was buried at Canturburie.

Henrie Plantagenet duke of Lancaster.

Henrie Plantagenet alias Crok Colle (because his head leaned somewhat to one shoulder like the great Macedone king Alexander, whose valure in feats of armes this Henrie did also imitate) being sonne to Henrie of Monmouth earle of Lancaster, was in like sort earle of Lancaster by descent. After which he was created earle of Darbie, as some saie in the eleauenth yeare of Edward the third, being the yeare of our Lord 1337, other saie in the foureteenth yeare of Edward the third, in the yeare of our saluation 1340. He was created duke of Lancaster as some haue in the six & twentith yeare of Edward the third, as other haue the seauen & twentith, and as the third sort haue the eight & twentith yeare of Edward the third. He was lord steward of England, & lieutenant of Guines. This man was wise, glorious in fortune, and full of honor in feates of armes, whilest he was yong: he died the fiue and thirtith yeare of Edward the third, in the yeare of Christ 1361, being one of the first knights which were made at the first institution of the honorable order of the garter, and the second duke that was made in England. He had issue two daughters & heires, Mawd maried to William duke of Bauare, earle of Henalt, Zeland & Holand, which after became mad; & Blanch maried to John of Gant, fourth sonne to Edward the third.

John of Gant duke of Lancaster.

John Plantagenet, surnamed of Gant in Flanders, where he was borne, the fourth sonne to king Edward the third, was first by his father in the fiue and thirtith yeare of Edward the third, in the yeare of Christ 1361, made duke of Lancaster, so that he was duke of Lancaster, earle of Lincolne, Salisburie, Darbie and Leicester, king of Castile & Leine, and steward of England. He married three wiues, the first was Blanch the daughter and heire of Henrie duke of Lancaster, earle of Leicester, Lincolne, Sarisburie & Darbie, in whose right he obteined all those titles of honor, whome he maried in the thirtith three yeare of Edward the third, in the yeare of our Lord 1359, and by hir had issue Henrie Plantagenet duke of Hereford: Philip married in the tenth yeare of Richard the second (in the yeare of Christ 1386, as some saie; or rather 1385, as others haue) to the king of Portingale: and Elisabeth married to John Holland erle of Huntington. His second wife was Constance eldest daughter to Peter king of Castile, whom he maried in the six & fortith yeare of Edward the third, being in the yeare of Christ 1372, by whome he had issue Margaret maried to the king of Castile, which Constance died in the yere of Christ 1394, as saith Ypodigma. His third wife was Katharine the widow of Otho Swinford, and daughter to sir Paien Ruet alias Guien king at armes, whom he maried in the nintéenth yeare of king Richard the second, being the yere of Christ 1395, or as some saie 1396, by this woman he had before mariage Thomas Beaufort, John Beaufort, Henrie Beaufort cardinall of Winchester, & Jane maried to Rafe Neuill earle of Westmerland, all which children were in the twentith of Richard the second, being in the yeare 1396, legitimated by parlement: at which time the said John of Gant gaue them the surname of Beaufort. This John of Gant was also earle of Richmond and constable of France in the time of Richard the second, who made him also duke of Aquitaine in the fourteenth yeare of his reigne, being the yeare 1390. This John of Gant died in the two & twentith yeare of Richard the second, in the yeare 1398, or as saith Ypodigma 1399, & was buried in the quére of saint Paules church of London, on the north side.

Henrie Plantagenet duke of Lancaster and Hereford, king of England.

Henrie Plantagenet alias Henrie of Bollinbroke so surnamed of the place of his birth, the eldest son of the said John, was by inheritance duke of Lancaster, earle of Leicester, Salisburie, Darbie, and Lincolne: he was created duke of Hereford by Richard the second, who made him earle of Darbie, in the ninth yeare of his reigne, in the yeare of Christ 1386, and after made him duke of Hereford in the 21 yeare of his reigne, being the yeare of Christ 1397. Which Henrie of Bollinbroke maried in the 9 yére of the reigne of Richard the second, in the yeare of Christ 1386 Marie the second daughter, & one of the heires of Humphrie Bohune earle of Hereford & Essex, and constable of England, which woman died in the yére of Christ 1394, about the eightéenth yére of Richard the second. This Henrie was after king of England by the name of Henrie the fourth.

Lionell Plantagenet duke of Clarence.

Lionell Plantagenet surnamed Lionell of Antwerpe in Brabant, because he was there borne, being the third son of king Edward the third, was erle of Ulster in Ireland by his wife, and created duke of Clarence in the 36 yére of Edward the third, in the yére of Christ 1462: but other saie he was made duke in the 33 yer of Edward the third. He had two wiues, the first Elisabeth, some saie Eleanor (but rightlie as I do suppose) the daughter of William Burgh earle of Ulster, by whom he had issue Philip maried to Edmund earle of March: the second wife was Jelant or Uelant daughter to Galeas duke of Millane, to whom he was maried, as saith the English chronicle, in the two and fortith yére of Edward the third, in the yére of Christ 1368: which yére the Italians count 1367, by whom he had no issue. This Lionell was somtime regent of France, & died 1368.

Edmund Plantagenet duke of Yorke.

Edmund of Langleie, fift son to Edward the third made earle of Cambridge about the six and thirtith yére of Edward the third, being the yere of Christ 1361, was made duke of Yorke in the eight, or (as some haue) the ninth yére of the said king Richard the second. He in the six and fortith yére of king Edward the third, in the yére that the word became fleth 1372, married Isabell one of the daughters of Peter king of Castile, and sister by the mother to Constance second wife to John of Gant duke of Lancaster, brother to this Edmund, who was about the twentith yére of Richard the second protector of England, while the king was in Ireland, which Isabell died in the yere of Christ 1394, being about the eightéenth yére of Richard the second, & by the kings commandement was buried in the friers of Langleie. This Edmund had issue by his wife Isabell Edward earle of Rutland, and duke Albermerle, Richard earle of Cambridge, and one daughter called Constance married to Thomas lord Spencer: he died the second (as some haue) or rather the third (as others haue) of Henrie the 4, in the yére of Christ, as hath Ypodigma 1402, and was buried at Langleie.

Edward Plantagenet duke of Albermerle and Yorke.

Edward Plantagenet son and heire of Edmund of Langleie duke of Yorke, was in the foureteenth of Richard the second created erle of Rutland in his fathers life, in the yére of Christ 1390, and in the twentith yeare of Richard the second, or rather the 21 of the same king, being the yeare of Christ 1397, he was made duke of Albermerle or Aumerle, and after his fathers death he was duke of Yorke: he was slaine at the battell of Agincourt, in the third yeare yeare of Henrie the ſixt, being the yeare of Chriſt 1415, he married Margaret, or rather more truelie Philip the ladie Fitzwater, and widow to ſir John Gollafer knight, baſtard ſonne to ſir John Gollafer of Cercedone or Sareſdone knight in Oxfordſhire. And here becauſe I haue mentioned the name of Gollafer, although it be digreſſing from my firſt purpoſes, onelie to treat of the dukes of England, I thinke it not amiſſe to ſaie ſomewhat of theſe two knights, of the Gollafers, ſir John the father, and ſir John the ſonne. This ſir John Gollafer the father being the ſonne of John Gollafer eſquier (whoſe anceſtors as farre as I can learne had their firſt originall from Roger Gollafer of Cercedone in the time of king John, and was buried in Domo capitulari de Bruera in com. oxon.) married Anne the daughter and heire of ſir Thomas Langleie lord of Langleie in Oxfordſhire (now at this date in the yeare 1585, by grant of quéene Eliſabeth, in the poſſeſſion of Robert Sutton or Dudleie earle of Leiceſter) which Anne died ſhortlie after without anie iſſue by him. After whoſe death this ſir John Gollafer married Iſabell the ladie of Pillenden (dwelling at Pillenden) and of Queintone in Buckinghamſhire, ſhe being daughter to ſir Barnard Brocas. But this ſir John Gollafer hauing no iſſue by the ſaid Eliſabeth, and deſirous by ſome meanes or other to continue his name (which yet he could not make perpetuall nor of anie long continuance) made choiſe in the life of his wife Iſabell of another woman, whome he vſed for procreations cauſe, and by hir had iſſue two baſtards, one called Jennet Pulham after proteſſe of Burneham by Windſore, and an other baſtard called after the father John Gollafer, who in following time became a knight. Afterward this ſir John the father died at Queintone in the yeare of our redemption one thouſand, three hundred, ſeauentie and nine, falling partlie in the ſecond and third yeare of Henrie the fourth, and was buried at the Graie friers in Oxford, whoſe wife Iſabell was after buried in Pillenden prioric.

After the death of this ſir John the father, ſir John Gollafer knight his baſe ſonne being lord of Langleie, married Phillip ladie Fitzwater, after maried to this duke of Yorke (as before is ſaid) which ſir John Gollafer died at Wallingford, in the yeare of our redemption one thouſand, three hundred, ninetie and ſir, being the twentith yeare of Richard the ſecond, and was buried at Weſtminſter, neere vnto the tombe of Richard the ſecond. Which ladie Philip died in the time of Henrie the firſt, and was buried at Weſtminſter, neere vnto hir huſband, whoſe ſtatelie tombe is yet extant, on the ſouth ſide almoſt directlie ouer againſt the tombe of Richard the ſecond. Thus this much for the name of Gollafer; and ſo againe to the dukes of England.

Thomas Plantagenet ſurnamed of Woodſtocke duke of Gloceſter.

Thomas Plantagenet, otherwiſe called Thomas of Woodſtocke, firſt ſonne to king Edward the third, was created earle of Buckingham, the firſt yeare of Richard the ſecond, in the yeare one thouſand, three hundred, ſeauentie and ſeauen, the daie of his coronation before dinner. This man was high conſtable of England, and created duke of Gloceſter, in the eight yeare of Richard the ſecond, of whom is more eſpeciall mention made in the treatiſe of the conſtables of England, pag. 867.

Thomas Holland duke of Surreie.

Thomas Holland, brother by the mothers ſide to king Richard the ſecond, and ſonne to the lord Thomas Holland (earle of Kent, in the right of Jane, daughter and heire to Edmund Plantagenet, ſurnamed of Woodſtocke earle of Kent) was aduanced to the title of duke of Surreie in the two and twentith years of king Richard the ſecond, being the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand, three hundred, ninetie and ſeauen, he maried Alice the daughter of Richard Fitzallen earle of Arundell. He had iſſue ſir daughters & heires; Margaret married to John Beaufort earle of Summerſet, and marqueſſe Dorſet; Alice maried to Thomas Montacute earle of Saliſburie; Eliſabeth, married to John lord Neuill ſonne to Rafe Neuill the firſt earle of Weſtmerland, and after his death to Edward Chareleton lord Powis; Joane married to Edmund of Langleie duke of Yorke; and Bridget a nun at Barking. This man with others, at a parlement held the firſt yeare of Henrie the fourth, in the yeare of our redemption one thouſand, three hundred, ninetie and nine, was depriued of his name of duke, & of all honours, together with the dignities belonging to a duke, & was after in the ſame yeare (rebelling againſt king Henrie the fourth) taken by the men of Circeſter, and beheaded in the ſame towne, after that he had cauſed the towne to be ſet on fire.

John Holland duke of Exceſter.

John Holland full brother to Thomas Holland, and halfe brother to Richard the ſecond, was created earle of Huntington in the fourteenth yeare of king Richard the ſecond, and made duke of Exceſter at a parlement holden in the one & twentith yeare of the ſame king, though ſome attribute that to the twentith yeare of king Richard. This man at a parlement held in the firſt of Henrie the fourth, in the yeare of Chriſt 1399, was diſgraded from his title of dukedome, and was after taken at Pritewell in Eſſex in a mill, and beheaded at Plaſſie in the ſaid ſhire, in the ſaid firſt yeare of the ſaid king Henrie the fourth, he married Eliſabeth the daughter of John of Gant duke of Lancaſter, and had iſſue John Holland earle of Huntington.

John Holland duke of Exceſter.

John Holland earle of Huntington was (as it ſeemeth) made by Henrie the fourth (after the death of the duke of Exceſter his father) & admitted to be duke of Exceſter, he married Anne the daughter of Edmund earle of Stafford, he had iſſue Henrie Holland duke of Exceſter, and Anne maried to ſir John Neuill knight, brother of Rafe the third of that name erle of Weſtmerland, he died the ſix and twentith of king Henrie the ſixt on the fift of Auguſt, being the yeare of Chriſt 1448, and was buried at S. Katharins nigh the tower of London. After which his firſt wife he maried Anne the daughter of John Montacute earle of Saliſburie, by whome he had no iſſue.

Henrie Holland duke of Exceſter.

Henrie Holland ſonne of John Holland was (after the death of his father) duke of Exceſter, he was diſherited in the firſt of Edward the fourth at a parlement held then in the yeare 1461, he maried Anne daughter to Richard duke of Yorke, and ſiſter to king Edward the fourth, which Anne at hir owne ſute on the twelfe of November in the eleuenth yeare of king Edward the fourth, being the yeare of Chriſt 1471, was diuorced from the ſaid duke of Exceſter. Shortlie after which, in the yeare of Chriſt 1413, being in the thirteenth of Edward the fourth, this duke was found dead in the ſea betweene Douer & Calis, but how he came there none could certenlie declare. He died without iſſue, leauing his ſiſter Anne his heire, maried (as before) to John Neuill brother to Rafe earle of Weſtmerland.

Robert Vere duke of Ireland.

Robert Vere earle of Oxford and marqueſſe of Dubline was in the yeere of Chriſt 1386, in the tenth of Richard the ſecond created duke of Ireland, he died without iſſue at Louaine in great penurie and veration of mind, as hath Ypodigma, in the yeere of Chriſt 1392, being about the ſixteenth of king Richard the ſecond, he maried the daughter of Ingerame de Couſie earle of Bedford, and after diuorced from hir he married Lancecrona one of meane parentage.

Margaret Segraue duchesse of Norffolke.

Margaret ladie Segraue the daughter and heire of Thomas Brotherton earle of Norffolke and marshall of England, was created duchesse of Norffolke in the one and twentith yeare of king Richard the second, she had two husbands, whereof the first was John lord Segraue, by whom she had issue Elisabeth married to John Mowbrcie the third of that name. Hir second husband was sir Walter Mannic knight of the order, by whome she had a daughter married to John lord Hastings erle of Penbroke. This duchesse Margaret died in the yeare of Christ 1399, being about the three and twentith of Richard the second, and was buried in the frier Minors of London.

Thomas lord Mowbrcie duke of Norffolke.

Thomas lord Mowbrcie second sonne of Elisabeth Segraue and John lord Mowbrcie hir husband was aduanced to the dukedome of Norffolke, in the one and twentith yeare of the reigne of Richard the second. Shortlie after which he was appeled by Henrie earle of Bullingbroke of treason, and caried to the castell of Windsore, where he was stronglie and safelie garded, hauing a time of combat granted to determine the cause betweene the two dukes the fiftenth date of September, in the two and twentith of the said king, being the yeare of our redemption 1398. But in the end the matter was so ordered, that this duke of Norffolke was banished for euer: wherupon taking his iourneie to Jerusalem, he died at Uenice in his returne frō the said citie of Jerusalem in the first yeare of king Henrie the fourth, about the yeare of our redemption 1399. He maried Elisabeth one of the daughters and heires of Richard erle of Arundell Warren and Surreie, by whome he had issue John duke of Norffolke, and three daughters, Elisabeth maried to Michaell de la Pole the yonger erle of Suffolke, Margaret maried vnto sir Robert Howard knight, and Isabell maried to sir James Barkeleie.

John Mowbrcie duke of Norffolke.

John Mowbrcie earle of Notingham marshall of England and duke of Norffolke, baron Segraue and Bowser, was buried in the Charterhouse within the ile of Ertholme, he maried Katharine the daughter of Rafe the first earle of Westmerland, by whom he had issue John duke of Norffolke.

John Mowbrcie duke of Norffolke.

John lord Mowbrcie the first baron of the name of Mowbrcie, sonne to John duke of Norffolke, was after his father duke of Norffolke. This John was buried in Tetford priorie, who marieng Elenor the daughter of William lord Burchier earle of Ewe, had issue John duke of Norffolke.

John Mowbrcie duke of Norffolke.

John the last duke of Norffolke of the surname of Mowbrcie, the sonne of John the last before mentioned, was in his fathers life time created earle of Warren and Surreie by king Henrie the first, and after the death of his father was duke of Norffolke. This John the last duke died in his castell of Fremingham, in the yeare 1461, being the second yeare of king Edward the fourth. He maried Elisabeth daughter to John lord Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, by whome he had issue one onelie daughter and heire, maried to Richard duke of Yorke second son to Edward the fourth.

Th. Plantagenet duke of Clarence.

Thomas Plantagenet second sonne to Henrie the fourth, was created duke of Clarence in the eleuenth yeare of his father, being about the yeare of our redemption 1409, and was afterward in the 13 of the same king created earle of Aumerle, and high steward of England: he was slaine the two and twentith of March, in the ninth yeare of the reigne of the victorious king Henrie the fift, in the yeare of our redemption 1420, beginning the yeare of our Lord on the fiue and twentith date of March. He maried Margaret the daughter of Thomas Holland earle of Kent, and died without issue legitimat, hauing a base sonne called John the bastard of Clarence.

John Plantagenet third sonne to Henrie the fourth, was by his father created duke of Bedford, at the parlement of Leicester, in the yeare of Christ 1414, in the second of king Henrie the fift. Of this man is more large mention made in my discourse of the protectors of England.

John Plantagenet duke of Bedford.

Humfreie Plantagenet fourth sonne of Henrie the fourth, was by his father created duke of Glocester, who for the nobilitie of his mind and vertuous life, was made protector of England. Of whom is more spoken in my former discourse of the protectors of England.

Humfreie Plantagenet duke of Glocester.

See pag. 1165

John Beaufort (which name of Beaufort was giuen by John of Gant to his children which he had by Katharine Swineford, when they were made legitimate by parlement, about the one and twentith yeare of king Richard the second as is before touched) was created marquesse Dorset by Henrie the fourth, and after aduanced to the honour of duke of Summerset, in the first yeare of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of our redemption 1413. He maried Margaret the daughter of sir John Beauchampe lord of Powicke, he had issue Margaret maried to Edmund Haddam earle of Richmond father to king Henrie the seuenth: after the death of which Edmund she was maried to Thomas lord Stonleie, afterward by Henrie the seuenth created earle of Darbie, and after vnto Henrie sonne to Humfreie duke of Buckingham. This duke of Summerset died the two and twentith yeare of king Henrie the first, and was buried at Winborne, in the yeare of Christ 1444. And his daughter the ladie Margaret died at Westminster on the nine and twentith of June, in the first yeare of king Henrie the eight, in the yeare of Christ a thousand fiue hundred and nine, about three score and fiue yeares after the death of hir father.

John Beaufort duke of Summerset.

Thomas Beaufort sonne to John of Gant duke of Lancaster and Katharine Swineford was created duke of Exceter, in the fift yeare of K. Henrie the fift, of whome is mention made in my protectors.

Thomas Beaufort duke of Exceter.

Edmund Beaufort sonne of John Beaufort duke of Summerset, was created earle Dorton in the seuenth yeare of K. Henrie the fift. He was created marquesse Dorset and duke of Summerset by king Henrie the first, he was made regent of Normandie, and lost the whole countrie to the French: for which after his comming out of Normandie in the nine and twentith yeare of king Henrie the first, he was on the first of December the same yeare, being the yeare of our Lord 1450, apprehended and put vnder arrest, and his goods by the commons sowlie despoiled and caried awaie from the Blacke friers. He was slaine at the battell of S. Albons in Maie, the three and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the first, falling in the yeare of our Lord 1455, and was with Henrie Persie earle of Northumberland, and Thomas lord Clifford buried at S. Albons. He maried two wiues, the first was Elenor the daughter of Richard Beauchampe earle of Warwike, a widow to Thomas lord Rosse, by whom he had issue Henrie duke of Summerset, Edmund duke of Summerset, John marques Dorset, Margaret maried to Humfreie duke of Buckingham, Elisabeth maried to sir Henrie Lewes knight, Elenor maried to James Butler earle of Wilshire, and after to sir Robert Spenser, Anne maried to sir William Paffone knight, and Jone maried to the lord Yeth of Ireland. His second wife was Jane, who was after maried to Henrie Bromefield knight, of the which Edmund duke of Summerset, and the other lords buried at saint Albons, thus writeth the worthie poet John Gower Henrie Beaufort duke of Summerset.

Henrie Beaufort eldest sonne to Edmund duke of Summerset was after the death of his father erle Morton, marquesse Dorset, and duke of Summerset, he was capteine of Calis; who with other nobles in the nine and thirtith of Henrie the first slue the duke of Yorke at the battell of Wakefield, in the yeare of our redemption 1460; according to the accompt of England. Shortlie after which, K. Henrie the first, whom this duke supported all that he could, was deposed, & Edward the fourth crowned. Touching which deposing of the one, & crowning of the other, although it be impertinent to the treatise of the dukes of England, hauing here so good place therfore, I will set downe such verses as I haue found in I. Whethamsted, adding further such other verses also as I find in him, concerning a battell fiercelie fought at Ferribrig in Yorkeshire, in the yeare of Christ 1461.

X. numero seni lapsi sunt circiter anni,
Postquam successit lex iuris, iure ue rexit,
Anglorum regnum vis non ius rexerat ipsum
Iam noua progenies, quia cælo venit ab alto
Saturni soboles, quæ nomine dicitur altro
Edwardus quartus, Richardo sanguine iunctus
Creditur à multis, redeunt Saturnia nostris
Temporibus sæcla, lis visq; nephas simul una Deperiunt, iura lex & pax sunt reditura.
Fraus etiamque dolus cessabunt, ac violentus
Raptus auaritiæ, subeunt verúmque fidésque:
Hæc spes plebis erat, cleri chorus hæcq; putabat.
Det ceu speratur regnum Deus vt stabuatur,
Et plebs tranquillè viuat clerus atq; quietè.

Then of the time of that former recited warre, in which the northerne men were ouercome, there were these verses made, vpon the excesse and euill which they outragiouslie committed in the south parts of England, without regard of God, obedience to their naturall prince, reuerence to the church, loue to their native countrie, or benefite to themselues:

The battell of Ferribrig the fourteenth of March in the yeare 1461, according to the accompt of the Englishmen that reare at Pontarte.

M. semel X. seno centum quater I. simul vno

Some 20000 slaine, whereof fiue knights & gentlemen.

Furthermore, touching the title of the same king Edward the fourth to the gouernement of the kingdome of England, and of his right and truth thereunto were these following verses composed, to declare the deposition of king Henrie the first, as before said in the coronation of Edward the fourth, and how the same kingdome of England, with all the members thereof, did belong to Edward the fourth, as vnto the rightfull lineall heire to the same with his pedegree, prouing the same also in this sort:

In sibi coniunctis [a] Edwardi semine natis
Ortus erat primo [b] Leonellus [c] Iohnque secundo, Cedat lex regni vult iunior vt senior.
Attamen [d] Henricus hæres genitúsque Iohannis
Per vim sceptrigerum regimen tulerátque coronam,
Et tenuit multis sed non sine viribus annis.
Illi succesit rex [e] qui si non caruisset
Iustitiæ titulo, non Hector dignior ipso:
Non iudex Eacus, non ore politus Vlysses.
Ipso defuncto succesit [f] filius in quo
Stirps ea cessauit. Hæres reuocatus remeauit Scilicet [g] Edwardus Leonelli proximus hæres,
Hic petyit regimen, [h] rex obstat, dátque negamen.
Res agitur belli, vicit sanguis Leonelli,
Et palmam tulerat [i] Henricus rex fugiebat
Bello finito, multo quóque sanguine fuso
Quum victor secum palmam ferrétque triumphum,
Vendicat hoc iterum, plebs applaudebat eidem
Clamabátque sibi [k] Viuat fœlicior omni
Rege vel Augusto, melior regat Octauiano.
Hæc vox cunctorum, clamor fuit ac populorum.
Rex igitur factus, rex in solióque leuatus
Quod fractum fuerat iterum bene consolidabat,
Iuréque quo potuit, vim pressit, ius renouauit.
Sic vetus id dictum fuerat bene verificatum,
De malè quæsitis vix gaudet tertius hæres.
Stare diu nequit mala quanquam vis stabiliuit
Ius, nescitque mori, valeat licèt ense feriri,
Ex bene patratis bene crescit honos quoque virtus.
O rota versatilis nimis ohq; rotabilis axis!
Sorte nouercante fatóq; modum variante,
Corruit [l] Henricus isto sub nomine sextus,
Et casum tulerat, titulus sibi deficiebat

[n] Hic fuit in verbis rex mitis, rex pietatis,
Attamen in factis nimiæ vir simplicitatis.
Hinc postquam triginta nouem rex præfuit annis,
Cæca manu fortuna rotam quassi fortis in armis
Voluerat, & regimen capiebat regis, eundem
Compulit ac subito sic dicere, Sum sine regno.
Oh sors prosperior, oh gratia sorteq; maior!
Qui diuturna nimis fuit expectatio plebis,
Sed mittendus erat, iam dante Deo veniebat
Hic Martis soboles, & nomine [o] Martius heros.

[o] Edward erle of March, after king Edward the fourth.

Thus after this long digression from the matter of the duke of Summerset, bicause I would set downe all the verses of Whethamsted, I must yet also ad other verses found in his register, mentioning some part of the doings of the northerne men before spoken of: which verses although they should haue gone before, yet I thinke better here than not at all to write them in this sort. Shortly after the forsaid battell of Wakefield wherin the duke of Yorke was slaine, and before the deposing of king Henrie the first, he had a battell at S. Albons, called the second battell of S. Albons with the northern men (following the quæne & this duke of Sumersets faction) & now were come as far as S. Albons, on Shroue tuesdaie the seuentæenth daie of Februarie in the said said yeare of Christ 1460, where the king was put to flight, and fled to the quéene. Touching which battell also, thus writeth that learned abbat of saint Albons John Whethamsted in his ancient register:

The 17 of Februarie 1461 after the account of such as begin the yeare at Januarie. *Southerne men.

M simul X. seno centum quater I. simul vno,
Quum lux septena fuerat mensis quóq; dena,

Laus hæc, laus Boreæ, laus est hæc laus sine laude.

Thus to returne to the duke of Summerset, we saie that afterward in the first yeare of king Edward the fourth, the said duke of Summerset fled to Yorke to king Henrie the first, and the quéene, who altogither fled from thense to Berwike, and so to Edenburgh. Whereupon by parlement in the first yeare of Edward the fourth 1461, this duke was atteinted, and his goods and lands seized for the king. But after that time king Edward the fourth besieging the castels of Bamburgh, Dunstenburgh, and Alnewike, this duke of Summerset and others yelded those forts to the king on Christmas éuen, in the third yeare of his reigne, being the yeare of our redemption 1463. For which cause this duke was taken againe into the kings fauour, who gaue him a thousand marks by yeare, whereof he was neuer paid. Notwithstanding all which, in the yeare following, being the fourth yeare of Edward the fourth, in Maie, in the yeare of Christ 1464, this duke with others raised an armie against the king, in which battell he was taken (with Robert erle of Yungerford) by John Neuill earle of Northumberland, and beheaded. He died without lawfull issue, leauing behind him a base sonne called Charles Summerset, by king Henrie the eight created earle of Worcester.

Edmund Beaufort duke of Summerset.

Edmund Beaufort sonne of the foresaid Edmund, and brother and heire to this last Henrie duke of Summerset, was also duke of Summerset. This man in the eleuenth yeare of Edward the fourth, being the yeare of Christ 1471, fleéing into the church of Teukesburie at the battell of Teukesburie (which quéene Margaret the wife of Henrie the first and hir sonne prince Edward had against king Edward the fourth) lost then the field. After which this duke was taken out of the church, and was there beheaded in the said eleuenth yeare of king Edward the fourth, and died without issue.

Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke.

Richard Plantagenet, sonne and heire to Richard earle of Cambridge, was created duke of Yorke by king Henrie the first: he was also earle of Cambridge, Ulster and March, lord of Wigmore and Clare, lieutenant of the realme of France and duchie of Normandie. Of this man sée more in the protectors of England.

George Plantagenet duke of Clarence.

George Plantagenet the second sonne to Richard duke of Yorke, was make duke of Clarence by his elder brother king Edward the fourth when he came to the crowne, in the yeare of Christ 1461, being the first yeare of his reigne. Of this George I haue somwhat intreated in my discourse of the conestables of England, pag. 869, and in my discourse of the protectors of England.

Richard Plantagenet duke of Gloucester.

Richard Plantagenet, the third sonne of Richard duke of Yorke, and brother to George duke of Clarence, was made duke of Gloucester by king Edward the fourth, in the first yéere of his reigne, being the yeare in which God toke on him the forme of a seruant 1461, of whome I haue discoursed in my conestables of England, pag. 869, and in my collection of the protectors of England.

Henrie Beauchampe duke of Warwike.

Henrie Beauchampe, the sonne of Richard Beauchampe earle of Warwike by Isabell ladie Spenser his second wife, succéeded his father in all his inheritances the twentith of Maie, in the seuenteenth yeare of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of our redemption 1439. For then the said Richard Beauchampe died at Rone in Normandie. This Henrie after that his inheritance had béene kept two years in the kings hands, was dismissed of his wardship, and restored to his liuings with great glorie. For he was crowned king of the Ile of Wight (as saith John Stow) by the kings owne hand, and nominated chiefe earle of England, in the twentith yeare of the said king Henrie the first, being about the yeare of Christ 1442. Shortlie after, in the two and twentith yeare of the said king Henrie the first, in the yeare of our redemption 1444, he was created duke of Warwike, vnto whome the king gaue the castell of Brightflow or Bristow, with all the apurtenances which king John kept in his hands, to which duke also the king gaue the Iles of Garnseie and Jerseie. About two years after which, on the foure and twentith of the same king Henrie the first, being the yeare of our redemption 1446, died this duke of Warwike, whose stile was duke of Warwike chiefe earle of England, lord Spenser and Aburgauennie, king of the Ile of Wight, Garnseie and Jerseie, and lord of the castell of Bristow. He died without issue, and was buried at Teukesburie, whereby his inheritance came to his foure sisters, which were (by Elisabeth one of the daughters and heires of Thomas lord Barkeleie, Lisle and Teies, first wife vnto his father) Margaret his eldest sister, maried to John Talbot first earle of Shrewsburie of that name: Elenor the second sister, first maried to Thomas lord Rosse, and after to Edmund duke of Summerset, &c: Elisabeth the third sister, maried to George Neuill lord Latimer: whose other fourth sister (by Isabell the second wife vnto Richard earle Beauchampe, daughter to Thomas lord Spenser, and mother also to the aboue named Henrie duke of Warwike, who died without issue) was Anne, maried to Richard Neuill earle of Salisburie.

Humfreie Stafford duke of Buckingham.

Humfreie Stafford earle Stafford, created duke of Buckingham in the two and twentith yeare of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of our redemption 1444, was slaine at the battell of Northampton. Of this man sée more in my discourse of the conestables of England, pag. 868.

Henrie Stafford duke of Buckingham.

Henrie sonne to the said Humfreie duke of Buckingham was beheaded in the first yeare of Richard the third, in the yeare of our redemption 1483. Of this man is more set downe in my discourse of the conestables of England, pag. 869.

Edward Stafford duke of Buckingham.

Edward Stafford, sonne to the said Henrie, was duke of Buckingham, being beheaded in the thirteenth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight, which was the yere of our redemption 1521, of whom also I haue intreated in the said discourse of the conestables fables of England, pag. 870.

William de la Pole duke of Suffolke.

William de la Pole earle of Suffolke created marques of Suffolke in the two & twentith of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of our redemption 1444, was shortlie after also created duke of Suffolke, & in the eight & twentith of the said king Henrie the first, falling in the yeare 1450, was banished the realme for fiue yeares, to pacifie the hard opinion which the commons had conceiued against him. He toke ship to performe his banishment the third of Maie, and sailed towards France, but was on the sea incountered by a ship of the tower named the Nicholas, by which he was taken and beheaded, and his bodie cast vp at Douer sands, and buried in the charterhouse at Hull. He maried Alice the daughter and heire of Thomas Chaucer, son to that famous poet Geffreie Chaucer, by which wife the maner of Ewelme, commonlie called Newelme in Oxfordshire came to the Poles. This duke & his wife did there build a new parish church of Ewelme standing on a hill, and founded a prettie hospitall called Gods house, at the west end of Ewelme parish church, to which house he gaue the manours of Ramrige in Hampshire, Conocke in Wiltshire, and Nerth in Buckinghamshire. He also founded an hospitall at Donnington castell. This Alice wife of duke William, surviuing hir husband, was after buried in the parish church of Ewelme, on the southside of the high altar, in a rich tome of alabaster, with an image in the habit of a dutchesse crowned, lieng on the same tome, and hauing this epitaph: Orate pro anima serenissimæ principissæ Alisiæ Sulfolchiæ huius ecclesiæ patronæ, quæ obiit 20 die mensis Maij, anno Domini 1475, litera dominicali A.

John de la Pole duke of Suffolke.

John de la Pole son to the said William de la Pole duke of Suffolke, was also duke of Suffolke after the death of his father. This man on the eightenth of Aprill in the fiftenth yeere of king Edward the fourth, being the yeare of our redemption 1415, was knighted by the king. He married Elisabeth daughter to Richard duke of Yorke, and sister to Edward the fourth, by whom he had issue Edmund erle of Suffolke; John that by Edward the fourth was created earle of Lincolne, and Anne, who by procurement of king Richard the third was maried to the duke of Rothsele, eldest son to the king of Scots.

Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke.

Richard Plantagenet second sonne to king Edward the fourth, was by his father created duke of Yorke, in the 15 yeere of his reigne, being the yeare of our Lord 1474, at a parlement in the said fiftenth yeare of Edward the fourth. This duke on the fiftenth of Januarie in the seauententh yeare of king Edward the fourth, being the yeare of our redemption 1477, was married to ladie Anne daughter and heire to John Nowbrete duke of Norffolke, and was in the first yeere of the reigne of the tyrant king Richard the third his vncle most vnnaturallie murthered in the tower, in the yeare of Christ 1483.

George Plantagenet duke of Bedford.

George Plantagenet third sonne to king Edward the fourth was created duke of Bedford by his father, in the yeere of our redemption 1470, and died without issue being verie yong.

John Howard duke of Norffolke.

John Howard lord Howard (the son of sir Robert Howard knight, and of Margaret his wife, one of the daughters and heires of Thomas lord Nowbrete duke of Norffolke, earle of Notingham, and marshall of England) was created duke of Norffolke, and marshall of England, in the first yeere of the vsurping king Richard the third, being the yeere of our redemption 1483. This man following the part of the said king Richard, was at the battell of Bosworth in Leicestershire (fought in the third yeare of the said king Richard, in the yeere of Christ 1485) slaine with the said king Richard. He had two wiues, Katharine the daughter of William lord Mollins, by whome he had issue Thomas earle of Surreie, after made duke of Norffolke by king Henrie the eight; Anne married to sir Edmund Gorge knight; Isabell married to sir Roger Mortimer of Esser; Jane married to sir John Timperleie; and Margaret married to sir John Windham: his second wife was Margaret the daughter of sir John Chedworth knight, by whome he had Katharine married to sir John Bourchier lord Barns.

Thomas Howard duke of Norffolke.

Thomas Howard earle of Surreie sonne of the said John was created duke of Norffolke, in the fift yeare of king Henrie the eight, being about the yeere of Christ 1514. Of him is more mention in my discourse of the lord treasurors of England.

Thomas Howard duke of Norffolke.

Thomas Howard created earle of Surreie in the fift yeare of king Henrie the eight, being high admerall and lord treasuror of England, was duke of Norffolke, after the death of his father, which fell in the sixtenth yeare of king Henrie the eight, being the yeare of our redemption 1524. Of this man is also more intreated in my discourse of the lord treasurors.

Thomas Howard duke of Norffolke.

Thomas Howard the third duke of the name of Thomas, and the fourth of the name of Howard, was son to Henrie Howard earle of Surreie sonne to the last before recited Thomas Howard duke of Norffolke. This man, being the last duke that liued in England, & occasioned me to make this discourse of the dukes, was beheaded on tower hill the seauententh of September, in the thirteenth yeere of the now reigning prince Elisabeth, being the yeare of Christ 1571, and buried in the chapell of the tower. He maried three wiues; his first wife was Marie one of the daughters and heires of Henrie Fitzallen earle of Arundell, by whom he had issue Philip earle of Arundell; his second wife was Margaret daughter & onlie heire to Thomas Audleie knight, chancellor of England, and lord Audleie of Saffron Walden, the widow of the lord Henrie Dudleie youngest son to John Sutton of Dudlie duke of Northumberland, by which second wife this duke had issue Thomas, William, Elisabeth, & Margaret; his third wife was Elisabeth the daughter of sir James Leiborne knight, and widow of the lord Dacres of Gisseland, by whome he had no issue.

Henrie Tewther duke of Yorke.

Henrie the second son of king Henrie the seuenth was by his father created duke of Yorke at Westminster, in the eleuenth yeere of his reigne, being the yeare of our redemption 1495, or therabouts. This man was after king of England by the name of king Henrie the eight.

Jasper of Hatfield duke of Bedford.

Jasper of Hatfield the sonne of Owen Tewther esquier, by Katharine daughter to the French king, and widow to king Henrie the fift, was by king Henrie the first his brother on the mothers side created earle of Penbroke, in the yeare of Christ 1452, after which in the fiue and thirtith yeere of the said king he was made earle of Cambridge: and lastlie, in the first yeere of the reigne of king Henrie the seauenth he was created duke of Bedford on Simon and Judes daie, in the yeare of our redemption 1485, but died without issue the eightenth daie of December, in the twelfe yeere of the reigne of king Henrie the seauenth, in the yeere of Christ 1496, and was buried at Kensham.

Charles Brandon duke of Suffolke.

Charles Brandon the son of sir William Brandon knight, slaine on the part of king Henrie the seuenth at Bosworth field, was created vicount Lisle, and after on Candlemasse daie in the yeere of Christ 1513, being the fift yeare of king Henrie the eight he was created duke of Suffolke. He married three wiues; the first was Anne daughter of sir Anthonie Browne knight; the second Marie, second daughter of of king Henrie the seauenth, & widow to the king of France, by whom he had issue Henrie earle of Lincolne, and Francis married to Henrie Grete duke of Suffolke; his third wife was Katharine the daughter & onlie heire of William lord Willoughbie of Erlete, by whome he had issue Henrie and Charles both dukes of Suffolke one after another, who both died within one houre of the sweat at Cambridge. This Charles the father died in the yeere of Christ 1545, and was buried at Windsore: & of the two dukes the sons thus writeth John Parkhurst sometime placed in the bishops see of Norwich:

Fratres Amyclæi Pollux cum Castore
Potuere sic cum morte depaciscier,
Vt cum alter illorum esset mortuus, tamen
Alter supereset, & reuersus sortibus
Vicissim vtérque vtriusque morte viueret.
Cur Parca nunc crudelior est, quam olim fuit?
Fratres duos nuper ea, quales hactenus
Nec vidit vnquam, nec videbit Anglia
Lumina duo, duóque propugnacula
Fortissima virtutis, reique publicæ,
Crudelis ab vno perêmit funere.
Virtus nequaquam illam, nec egregia indoles
Mouit, nec Edwardi regis, nec optimæ
Matris, neque totius gemitus Britanniæ.
O dura dura mors! ô sæua numina!

Henrie Fitz Roie duke of Richmont.

Henrie Fitz Roie the base son to king Henrie the eight, begotten vpon Elisabeth Blunt the ladie Talbotse, was by his father first created earle of Summerset and Northampton, and after duke of Richmont. This duke was verie forward in the knowledge of tongs, and also in knightlie actiuitie, as may apeere by due consideration of the historie in place where he is mentioned. He loued Iohn Leland the reuerend antiquarie, who presented vnto the said duke a booke of copies, whereby he might learne to write Romane letters great & small, as apeereth by this heraklichon, which I find among the said Iohn Lelands written epigrams in this maner set downe:

Ad illustrissimum Henricum ducem Richmontanum.

Quo Romana modo maiuscula littera pingi,
Pingi quo possit littera parua modo,
Hic liber ecce tibi signis monstrabit apertis
Princeps, Aonyi spes & alumne gregis:
Qui tibi si placeat (quod certè spero futurum)
Maxima pro paruo munere dona dabis.

He died without issue the two and twentith of Iulie, in the eight and twentith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight, in the yeere of our redemption 1536, and was buried at Thetford in Norffolke, hauing maried Marie the daughter of Thomas Howard duke of Norffolke.

Edward Seimor duke of Summerset.

Edward Seimor knight (the son of sir John Seimor knight) was created vicount Beauchampe in Maie, the eight and twentith yeere of king Henrie the eight, being the yeere of our redemption 1536, & was after in the nine & twentith yeare of the same king on the eightéenth daie of October, in the yeere of Christ 1537 created earle of Hertford. When king Henrie being dead, he in the first yeare of king Edward the first, which was the yeere of our redemption 1546, was made protector of England, and immediatlie thereupon created duke of Summerset, being vncle by the mothers side vnto the said king Edward the first. This man had manie honors and offices, as maie apeere by his stile, which he preferred before a millíue persualorie sent to the Scots for the marriage of their yong queene Marie to our yong king Edward the first in this sort: Edward by the grace of God duke of Summerset, earle of Hertford, vicount Beauchampe lord Seimor, vncle to the kings highnesse of England, gouernor of his most roiall person, and protector of all his realmes, dominions, and subiects, lieutenant generall of his maiesties armies both by sea and land, treasuror and earle marshall of England, gouernor of the iles of Gerneseie and Ierseie, and knight of the most honorable order of the garter, &c. This stile he had, which I haue béene the more willing to set downe, because I do not remember that anie subiect did with like shew publish anie such stile before his time. Which honors he did not long inioie: for were it for malice of some of the nobilitie, disdaining such honor; or for cause in him offending the lawes, or for his ouer careless good disposition, that suspected no such euill from his enimies: he was the second time on the first of October in the fift yeere of king Edward the first, being the yeare of Christ 1551 committed prisoner to the tower, and the two and twentith date of Ianuarie following he was beheaded at tower hill, and buried in the tower chappell. He had two wiues, wherof the first was Katharine the daughter of sir William Filioll of Woodland knight, by whome he had a son called Edward: his second wife was Anne the daughter of sir Edward Stanhope, by whom he had issue Edward earle of Hertford, Henrie now liuing, and Edward, with Anne (married the third of June, in the fourth yeere of the reigne of king Edward the first, in the yeere one thousand fiue hundred and fiftie to Iohn lord Dudleie, eldest sonne to Iohn earle of Warwike and duke of Northumberland) Ione, Marie, Katharine, and Elisabeth.

Henrie Grete duke of Suffolke.

Henrie Greie marquelle Dorset, lord Ferrers of Grobie, Harrington, Boneuile and Alleie, was at Hampton court created duke of Suffolke, on the eleuenth of October, in the first yeere of the reigne of king Edward the first, being the yeere of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and one: who in the first yeere of queene Marie, being the yeere of Christ one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and three, supposing that the queene would marrie a stranger, did flie into Leicester and Warwikeshires with a small companie, making proclamation against the queenes marriage with the prince of Spaine: but the people inclined not vnto him. Whereupon a companie being sent out after him, vnder the leading of the earle of Huntington, the first date of Februarie proclamation was made at London, that the duke was discomfited and fled with his two brethren. After which the tenth of Februarie, the duke with his brother sir John Greie was brought from Couentrie (where he remained three dates after his taking, in the house and custodie of Christopher Warren alderman of that towne) by the earle of Huntington, & attended with three hundred men to the tower. Where remaining a certeine space, he was on the three and twentith of Februarie beheaded at tower hill; and buried in the chappell of the tower (as I haue heard.) He married Francis one of the daughters to Charles Brandon duke of Suffolke, by whom he had issue Jane, married to Gilford the sonne of Iohn duke of Northumberland, and died without issue; Katharine and Marie.

John Sutton of Dudleie duke of Northumberland.

John Sutton of Dudleie created by king Henrie the eight vicount Lisle, being admerall, lord great chamberleine, lord great maister and earle of Warwike, was after on the eleuenth date of October, the fift yeere of king Edward the first, being the yeere of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and one, created duke of Northumberland. He, after the death of king Edward, took armes, and proclamed queene Jane, daughter to Henrie duke of Suffolke; meaning to exclude queene Marie. But shortlie after perceiuing queene Marie to be proclamed at London, this duke did also proclame hir at Cambridge. Notwithstanding all which he was arrested in the Kings college there by one maister Sleg sergeant at armes, and after anew arrested by the earle earle of Arundell. Henrie Fitzallen (sent thither for that cause) who brought him to London, where this duke was the fiue and twentith of Julie, in the said first yeare of quéene Marie commited to the tower. Shortlie after which, he was the eightéenth of August following arreigned at Westminster, there condemned, and beheadded on tower hill the two and twentith of the same moneth: whose bodie with the head was buried in the tower, he being the last duke that was created in England. He maried Jane the daughter of sir Edward Gilford knight, the sister and heire to sir Henrie Gilford knight, of whose children I will not speake, bicause they are yet fresh in memorie. And thus farre Francis Thin, touching the creation and the succession in lineall descents of all the dukes of England since the conquest.

French ambassadors frō Charles the ninth came into England.

About the ninth of June, Francis duke of Montmorencie, chiefe marshall of France, gouernour and lieutenant of the Ile of France, generall to Charles the ninth king of France, and Paule de Foix of the priuie councell of the said king, and Bertrand de Saligners, lord de la Mothfenelon, knights of the order of S. Michaell, ambassadors for the same king, arriued at Douer. The fourtéenth daie they shot London bridge toward Summerset house at the Strand, where they were lodged. The fiftéenth daie being sundaie, the said ambassadors repaired to the White hall, where they were honourablie receiued of the quénes maiestie, with hir nobilitie: and there in hir graces chappell, about one of the clocke in the after none, the articles of treatie, league or confederacie and sure friendship (concluded at Blois the nintéenth of Aprill as is afore shewed) betwixt the quénes maiestie, and the French king being read, the same was by hir maiestie and his ambassadors confirmed to be obserued and kept, without innouation or violation, &c. The rest of that daie, with great part of the night following, was spent in great triumph, with sumptuous banketts.

Henrie Grey duke of Suffolke.

League with France confirmed at westminster.

S. Georges feast at windsor.

The eightéenth of June, the feast of saint George was holden at Windsor, where the French ambassadors were roiallie feasted, & Francis duke of Montmorencie was stalled knight of the most honourable order of the garter. The eight and twentith daie of June, the forenamed ambassadors departed from London toward France. ¶ The fourtéenth of June, Thomas lord Wharton deceased in his house of Chanon row at Westminster. The thirtéenth daie of Julie, the quénes maiestie at Whitehall made sir William Cicill lord of Burghleie, lord high treasuror of England: lord William Howard, late lord chamberleine, lord priuie seale: the earle of Sussex, lord chamberleine: sir Thomas Smith principall secretarie: and Christopher Hatton, esquier capteine of the gard.

Sir William Cicill lord treasuror, lord priuie seale, lord chamberleine, with other offices.

A treatise of the treasurors of England set downe out of ancient histories and records, as they succeeded in order of time and in the reigne of the kings.

Collected by Francis Thin in this yeare of Christ 1587.

THis aduancing of sir William Cicill knight, lord Burghleie with the honour of lord treasuror of England, hath rowsed my enuied pen thorough the malicious barking of some (who suppose nothing well but what they doo themselues, whereby gaine maie rise vnto their posteritie) in this liberall sort to set downe the names and times of such treasurors as haue liued in England, as hereafter I will doo the chancellors, and that with as good authoritie as these secret backbiters can challenge anie cunning to themselues, who suppose euerie blast of their mouth to come forth of Trophonius den, and that they spake from the trivet. As I will not arrogate anie thing to my selfe, for in truth I saie with Socrates, Hoc tantum scio quod nihil scio, or derogate from them that which their worthinesse maie merit: so shall I be glad (sith nothing is at the first so perfect, but that somewhat maie be either augmented or amended to and in it) that this maie whet those enuious persons to deliuer anie thing to the world, that maie in comptrolling my labours benefit their countrie, which if they will not doo, let them cease their euill spéeches: for Qui pergit dicere quæ libet, quæ non vult audiet. And truelie for mine owne part, I will Canere palinodiam, and yeld them an honourable victorie, if anie better shall be produced: and be heartilie glad, that truth (which is all that I sæke) maie be brought to perfection. Now how well I haue done it, my selfe must not be iudge, desiring pardon of such as either with wise modestie can or ought to iudge, or with rare antiquities can or will correct what I haue done; if thorough ignorance we haue committed anie escapes or imperfections: further promising, that if hereafter we espie any of our owne error; or if anie other either friend for good will, or aduersarie for desire of reprehension shall open the same vnto me: I will not for defense of mine estimation, or of pride, or of contention by wrangling or quarrelling vpon authorities, histories and records, wilfullie persist in those faults: but be glad to heare of them, and in the whole and large discourse of the liues of the lord treasurors (almost perfected) corrected them. For (as I said) it is truth of antiquities that I séeke for, which being had (either by good intention of my welwilling friends, or by occasion and reprehension of my enuious emulators) I greatlie estéeme not. And so to the matter.

Saint Dunstane (for I vse that name more for antiquities than deuoutnesse cause) was treasuror to Eadred or Eldred king of England, who began his reigne in the yeare that the word became flesh, nine hundred fortie and six: of whome thus writeth Matthew Parker in his booke of the archbishops of Canturburie, in the life of Odo Seuerus the two and twentith bishop of that see: Edmundo (the king of England) defuncto, Eadredus corona regia ab Odone redimitus, & rem publicam administrans, Dunstanum (vt in eius vita plenius patebit) tam singulari amore prosequutus est, vt omnes regni thesauros illius custodiæ commendaret.

Saint Dunstane.

Hugoline was treasuror and chamberleine to Edward the confessor, he gaue Deane and Southbrigh to Westminster, which Edward the confessor did afterward confirme to that house.

Hugoline.

Odo halfe brother to William the conqueror erle of Kent bishop of Baieux and chiefe iustice of England, was treasuror in the time of the conqueror, who had at his death (as saith Anonymus M.S.) sixtie thousand pounds, Excepto auro, & gemmis, & vasis, & palys.

Odo bishop of Baieux.

Geffreie lord Clinton treasuror and chamberleine to Henrie the first, he about the thirtéenth yeare of Henrie the first, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand, one hundred and twelue, did found the priorie of Kenelworth, and was after accused of treason in the one and thirtith yeare of the reigne of the said Henrie the first: but (as it séemed) restored (in short time after) to the kings fauour.

Geffreie lord Clinton.

Ranulph bishop of Durham, was treasuror to the king, whome Florentius Wigornienſis calleth Præcipuum regis placitatorem & regni exactorem, whose last word Exactor some men doo English treasuror. Of this man is more said in the chancellors of England.

Ranulph bishop of Durham.

Roger bishop of Sarisburie treasuror & chancellor of England, as appeareth by Leland, writing in this sort: Roger bishop of Sarum treasuror & chancellor to Henrie the first, made the castell of Vies such a costlie and so strong a fort, as was neuer before nor since Roger bishop of Sarisburie.

John Sutton of Dudleie duke of Northumberland.

since set by by anie bishop of England. The keepe or dungeon of it set vpon a hill cast by hand, is a peece of worke of incredible cost. There appeare in the gate of it six or seauen places for portculices, and much goodlie building was in it. It is now in ruine, and part of the front of the towers of the gate of the keepe, and the chappell in it, were carried full vnprofitablie to the building of master Beintons house at Bromhame, scant three miles off. There remaine diuerse goodlie towers, yet in the vtter wall of the castell: but all going to ruine. The principall gate that leadeth into the towne is yet of great strength, and hath places of seauen or eight portculices. Thus much Leland in his commentaries of England, which I haue here set downe, partlie to proue Roger bishop of Salisburie to be treasuror, and partlie to commit to the world all such collections and notes as I can get of his. Besides which, to proue the same Roger treasuror at the latter end of the reigne of Henrie the first, together with William de Pontlearch at the entering of king Stephan into England, thus writeth one Anonymall chronicle M.S. Stephanus cum intrauit Angliam, Rogerũ Seresberiensem & Willielmum de Pontlearcus custodes thesaurorum ad se traduxit: which William de Pontlearch was a witnesse with William Stigill to a certeine charter which Randulph bishop of Durham made to the monkes of Durham, commonlie called S. Cutberts monks, wherin he confirmed to them Blakestone, Standrop and Sandropshire, with the wood of Henwrath on the east part of Barneburne, as farre as it goeth to the sea. This Roger bishop of Salisburie died in the yeare of our redemption one thousand, one hundred, thirtie and nine, being about the fourth yeare of king Stephan, of whome mention is made in the chancellors of England.

William de Pontlearch.

Nigellus bishop of Elie.

Nigellus the second, bishop of Elie, nephue to Roger bishop of Sarum, and treasuror to Henrie the first, was aduanced vnto that bishoprike of Elie, in the yeare of our redemption, one thousand, one hundred, thirtie and three, the fift calends of June, being the three and thirtith yeare of the reigne of Henrie the first, at whose going downe to be installed in the said bishoprike, he was receiued, with such ioie, that all the whole street of Elie thorough which he should passe, was hanged with curteins and carpets, with seats set on ech side; and the monks, canons, and clerks, meeting him with procession with diuers other priests standing round about them. After his installation he returned to the dispatch of the affaires of the kingdome, committing the charge of his bishoprike to one Rafe sometime a monke of Glastenburie, and now become an apostata. Great contention was betweene this man and king Stephan. He bought the treasurorship for the summe of foure hundred marks of Henrie the second for his sonne Richard Filius Nigelli, or Fitz Nele, otherwise called Richard of Elie. He gouerned the bishoprike six and thirtie yeares, as most saie, and builded saint Johns college in Cambridge.

But touching the time of his death, and the yeare of his bishoprike, I cannot as yet set downe anie thing perfectlie; but onelie this contradiction found in the written booke of Elie, which I suppose to haue risen by the negligence of the transcriber: which is, that he gouerned the see of Elie six and thirtie yeares, and died in the yeare of our Lord one thousand one hundred sixtie and six, the third calends of June, the first houre of the sixt ferie or fridaie. Which by no account can fall to be true, accounting from the time of the first obteining of the bishoprike in the three and thirtith yeare of Henrie the first, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand one hundred thirtie and three. For if you adde the six and thirtie yeares of his gouernement to the yeare of our Lord one thousand one hundred thirtie and three, then must he die in the yeare of grace one thousand one hundred sixtie and nine. And if you will haue him to die in the yeare one thousand one hundred sixtie and six, then can he gouerne but three and thirtie yeares: which three and thirtie added to the yeare of Christ one thousand one hundred thirtie and three, in which he began his gouernement, as all authors agree, make the value of one thousand one hundred sixtie and six years of our Lord. So that considering the discordancie of the time of his death found in the written booke of his life, we cannot (I saie) as yet set downe anie certeintie of his death. Though I suppose that to be the truest which I find in Triuet, who affirmeth that he died in the yeare of Christ one thousand one hundred sixtie and nine, and the fifteenth of king Henrie the second, after that he had gouerned six and thirtie yeares. He was honorablie buried in the church of saint Ethelred of Elie before the altar dedicated to the holie crosse.

Richard de Elie or Fitzneale, sonne of the said Nigellus bishop of Elie, was made treasuror to king Henrie the second, by the purchase of his father Nigellus, when the king went to the wars of Tolous. Of whom the history of Elie writeth, that after the buriall of Nigellus his father, this Richard being also an enimie to the church of Elie, as his father had beene before, made hast to passe ouer the seas to king Henrie the second, fearing that some euill would be prepared against him, if the church should haue sent anie other thither before him. At whose comming to the king, he accused the monks of manie things, and did therewith so edge the king against them, that the king sending into England, charged by Wunnerus one of his chaplens, that the prior of Elie should be deposed, & the monks with all their goods to be proscribed and banished. This man being treasuror to king Henrie the second, the treasure of the said Henrie the second at his death came vnto one hundred thousand marks; notwithstanding the excessiue charges of the king manie waies. Which Richard being bishop of London, by the name of Richard the third, and the kings treasuror, was chosen to that see in the yeare of our redemption one thousand one hundred eightie and nine, being the first yeere of king Richard the first, and was consecrated bishop at Lambeth, by Baldwine archbishop of Canturburie, in the yeare of Christ 1190: he died the fourth ides of September, in the yeere of grace 1198, being the ninth yeare of king Richard the first.

Richard of Elie.

Williams of Elie.

William of Elie being of kin to the last Richard bishop of London, was treasuror to king Richard the first, and to king John. To which William then treasuror, Richard his kinsman the bishop of London An. Dom. 1196 being the seuenth yeare of the reigne of Richard the first, and the same number of yeares of the gouernment of the said Richard in the bishoprike of London, did giue all his houses in Westminster, which the said William did long after giue to the abbat and monks of Westminster, as by the charter therof appeers by me in this sort abridged:

Vniuersis Christi fidelibus, ad quos præsens scriptum peruenerit, Gulielmus de Elie quondam regum Angliæ thesaurarius salutem. Nouerit vniuersitas vestra me dedisse, &c: Deo & monachis Westminster, &c: pro animabus Richardi & Iohannis regum Angliæ, & pro anima Richardi London episcopi, &c: domos meas, & curiam cum pertinentibus in villa Westminster, &c: quas habui ex dono Richardi episcopi London, & quæ sunt de feodo Westminster, &c: testis Eustachius Fauconbridge domini regis thesaurarius, &c. He died in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred twentie two, being the first yeare of the long reigne of king Henrie the third, as noteth Matthew Paris and Westminster, who write that then obiit Guliel-

Deane of Paules treaſurer.

A deane of Paules was treaſuror to the king, as apeereth by Mat. Parker, in the life of Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie, writing after this maner: Eodem tempore (which was a time betweene the creating of Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie in the yeere of Chriſt 1194, being the firſt yeare of Richard the firſt, and the death of the ſaid Richard the firſt, which fell in the yeare of Chriſt 1199) eccleſiæ Paulinæ decanus erarij regij cuſtos fuit, ſiue (vt vocant) theſaurarius: and ſo goeth on with a diſcourſe of his miſerable death.

Walter Gzete biſhop of Woꝛceſter.

Walter Gzete biſhop of Woꝛceſter, whom ſome call treaſuroꝛ, in the eleuenth of king John, whereunto I dw not yet agree, leauing it to the iudgement of others, and to the finall receiuing oꝛ reiecting of him, in the large booke of the whole liues of the loꝛd treaſuroꝛs of England.

Geffreie archdeacon of Noꝛwich.

Geffreie archdeacon of Noꝛwich, treaſuroꝛ to king John, who foꝛſoke his maiſter the king ercommunicat by the pope: as writeth Matthew Parker in the life of Stephan Langton archbiſhop of Canturburie, in theſe following woꝛds: Inter quos (meaning the biſhops, which durſt not openlie publiſh the ercommunication of the king, but ſecretlie caſt libels about the high waies, which gaue notice therof) quum ad fiſcum regium Gaufridus Noruicenſis archidiaconus negotijs regijs intendens ſediſſet, cœpit aſſidentibus exponere excommunicationis ſententiam, in regem iam latam, affirmauitque non eſſe tutum capellanis & eccleſiaſticis dignitatibus beneficiiſque affectis ſeruire regi amplius. Ideóque aulam deſerens, ad eccleſiaſtica beneficia (quæ regis ſeruicio acquiſierat) ſeceſſit. Rex hunc tam proditoriè à ſe deficientè per Williel. Talbot militem prehendi & ad ſe reduci fecit, eúmque in publica cuſtodia ſeruatum (donec ſiue pœnæ ſiue conſcientiæ tædio pertæſus vitæ fuit, & expirauit) detinuit: whoſe maner of death is in this ſoꝛt ſet dowꝛne by Matth. Paris pag. 305, that he was committed to pꝛiſon, Vbi poſt dies paucos, rege præfato (which was king John) iubente, capa indutus plumbea, tàm victualium penuria quàm ipſius capæ ponderoſitate cõpreſſus migrauit ad dominum. Much about which time (as I ſuppoſe) which was the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand two hundꝛed and nine, being about the eleuenth yéere of K. John, the checker was by the king remoued from London to Noꝛthampton (in hatred of the Londoners) vntill Chriſtmas.

John Ruthall

John Ruthall Cuſtos officij theſaurarij, as is pꝛoued out of the recoꝛds of the exchéker, had that office in the third yeare of Henrie the third, in the yéere 1219.

Euſtachius de Fauconbꝛidge biſhop of Lonꝛdon.

Euſtachius de Fauconbꝛidge, a iuſtice to receiue fines, chancelloꝛ of the exchéker & treaſuroꝛ to Henrie the third, was by the biſhop of Rochéſter conſecrated biſhop of London, in the yere of our redemption one thouſand two hundꝛed twentie & one, being the fift yeare of king Henrie the third. Which Euſtachius in the yéere 1222, with the deane & chapter of London, had great ſutes againſt William abbat of Weſtminſter: he was treaſuroꝛ in the third yeare of king Henrie the third, being about the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand two hundꝛed and nineténe: he died the daie beforе the kalends of Nouember in the yeare of Chriſt 1228, being the thirtéenth of king Henrie the third, and is buried on the ſouth ſide of the quére of Paules (beſides Henrie Wengham) vnder a faire monument of marble, ouer whom on the wall is this inſcription: Hîc iacet Euſtachius de Fauconbridge quondam epiſcopus huius eccleſiæ, qui multa bona contulit miniſtris eccleſiæ ſancti Pauli.

John de Font tes oꝛ Fountaines.

Ioannes de Fontibus, oꝛ John de Fontnes was biſhop of Elie and treaſuroꝛ in the ninth and eleuenth yéere of king Henrie the third, and beforе, as I take it. This man being abbat of Fontnes, and (as authoꝛs ſaie) Vir ſimplex & iuſtus, ac recedens à malo, was at Weſtminſter made biſhop of Elie, in the yeare of Chriſt 1220: he died after that he had bin biſhop fiue yéeres & od moneths, in the yeare of Chriſt 1225, being the ninth yéere of Henrie the third, & was buried in the church of Elie, toward the altar of S. Andꝛew.

Walter Malclerke biſhop of Carleill.

Walter Malclerke oꝛ ſkilleſſe clerke, treaſuroꝛ of England, was made biſhop of Carleill, in the yéere of our Loꝛd 1223, being about the ſeuenth yeare of Henrie the third, who in the yeare of Chriſt 1233, being the ſeuentéenth of the ſaid king, was by the counſell of Peter de Laroches biſhop of Wincheſter not onlie remoued from his office of treaſuroꝛſhip, but alſo put to the fine of 100 marks, which he paied, with the loſſe of certeine holds, giuen him by charter, during his life. After which he would haue fled beyond the ſeas, but entring the ſhip at Dower, he & all his were ſtaied and euillie intreted by the kings ſeruants. This man, in the yeare of Chriſt 1246, being the thirtith yeare of Henrie the third, did on the daie of Peter and Paule at Dꝛenfoꝛd enter into the habit of the frier pꝛeachers. After which, in the yeare of Chriſt 1248, being about the two & thirtith of Henrie the third, he ſurrendꝛed his ſoule to God.

Ranulph Bziton

Ranulph Bziton by ſome is made treaſuroꝛ of England, but vntrulie as I ſuppoſe: foꝛ in truth he was but treaſuroꝛ of the chamber, foꝛ anie thing I can learne, and remoued from that place in the ſixtéenth yeare of king Henrie the third, in the yeare of Grace 1232, in whoſe place came Peter de Riuall. Of this Ranulph is mention had in the chancelloꝛs. Beſides which, about this time I read, that Hubert of Boꝛrow was treaſuroꝛ: foꝛ thus writeth Iohannes Londonienſis. Rex (about the yeare of our Loꝛd 1232) fecit ipſum (which was Hubert of Boꝛrow) ſuum iuſticiarium principalem totius Angliæ, & poſtea theſaurarium.

Peter de Dziall.

Peter de Dziall, in Latine called Petrus de Riuallis, was treaſuroꝛ of the chamber, and treaſuroꝛ of the king, chamberleine of England and Ireland, gardian of all the foꝛeſts of England, of all the eſcheats, of all the poꝛts of the ſea, and of all the pꝛiſes of England and Ireland; being ſo déere to the king (as hath Matthew Weſtminſter) that Expulſis caſtrorũ cuſtodibus per totam ferè Angliam, rex omnia ſub ipſius Petri cuſtodia commendarat. This man was made treaſuroꝛ after Walter Malclerke, in the yéere of Chriſt one thouſand two hundꝛed thirtie and three, being about the ſeuentéenth yeare of king Henrie the third, and in the eightéenth yeare of king Henrie the third, who (as I gather) was togither with Peter biſhop of Wincheſter, Stephan de Segraue, & Robert Paſſelew, called to accounts, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand two hundꝛed thirtie & foure, foꝛ the kings treaſure and ſeale euillie imploied & kept. Wherupon Peter de Riuallis hid himſelfe in the cathedꝛall church of Wincheſter. Which Peter biſhop of Wincheſter & Peter de Riuallis the king remoued by the perſuaſion of Edmund of Abindon biſhop of Canturburie, as they beforе had remoued Walter Malclerke. After which it ſéemeth that growing into fauoꝛ againe, this Petrus de Riuallis was in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand two hundꝛed fiftie & ſeuen, being the one & foꝛtith yeare of king Henrie the third, made treaſuroꝛ of the chamber. Foꝛ thus writeth Matthew Paris: Circa feſtum ſancti Michaelis (which was in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand two hundꝛed fiftie and ſeuen) mortuo Hurtaldo domini regis conciliario & clerico ſpeciali ac theſaurario de camera regis, ſubrogatur Petrus de Riuallis. Under this Peter de Riuallis did Robert Paſſelew kéepe the kings treaſure. Touching which Robert Paſſelew, whome ſome will haue onelie treaſuroꝛ of the chamber, ſome to be treaſuroꝛ of England, & ſome to be vndertreaſuroꝛ vnder Peter de Riuallis, I will ſet dowꝛne out of ſeuerall authoꝛs what I haue read therof, leauing to the reader to thinke thereof what he liſt at this time, ſith I determine termine fullie hereafter (not hauing now leisure therefore) to define the same in my large volume of the liues of the lord treasurors. Thus therefore touching him writeth Matthew Parker. Quo etiam tempore (which was in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred fortie and foure, being about the eightéenth yeare of the reigne of Henrie the third) Robertus de Passelew, qui in thesauris regys custodiendis & augendis totus versatus est, eóque nomine regi charus, ab ecclesiæ cathedralis Cicestrensis canonicis, qui regi placere studuerant, Cicestrensis episcopus electus est. Quod Bonifacius Cantuariensis archiepisc. indignè tulit, & episcopis prouinciæ suæ cõuocatis, in difficilimis quibusdam & nodosis quæstionibus per Lincolniesem episcopum compositis serió examinauit, deinde electione rescissa hunc Robertum repulit, & Richardum quendam de Wiz loco suo (incõsulto rege) substituit. Mert writeth Matthew Westminster, that in the yeare of Christ 1233, being the seuentéenth of Henrie the third, the nobilitie accused manie of the kings councellors, amongst whome they placed Robertum Passelew thesaurarium. Againe a little after he saith: Et sic abscondit se iterum Robertus Passelew, qui post Walterum Carleolensem officium thesaurarij administrauerat. Of whose death Matthew Paris writeth thus: Eodem quoq; anno (which was 1252, being the fiue and thirtith yeere of Henrie the third) octauo idus Iunij, obyt apud Waltham Robertus Passelew archidiaconus Lewis, &c.: whome I will here leaue, although not in that place in which he should come, if I had once resolued with my selfe that he had beene treasuror of England. But because I had to speake of him with Peter de Riuallis, I thought here in one place to set downe what I had read of them both; and so to ioine them after their death, which were so fast ioined in offices during their liues.

Robert Paſſelew whether treaſuroꝛ of England oꝛ no.

Hugh Pateshull. Hugh Pateshull, treasuror of the exchéker, which was treasuror of the grééne wax, or of the seale, was also treasuror to the king in the eightéenth and nineteenth yeare of his reigne, and after made iustice of all England: as Matthew Paris hath set downe in these words, Rex autẽ fretus consilio saniori (in the yere of Christ 1234, being the 18 yéere of Henrie the third) Hugonem de Pateshull clericum filium videlicet Simonis de Pateshull, qui quandóque habenas moderabatur totius regni iusticiarij, virum fidelem & honestum, loco prædictorum (which were Stephan Segraue chéefe iustice of England and Peter de Riuallis treasuror) subrogauit. Administrauerat enim idem Hugo officium scaccarij antea laudabiliter, secundum quod appellatur secretum sigillum custodiendo, & definitam pecuniam à vicecomitibus recipiendo: quare plenior fides est ei adhibita, paterna fidelitate testimoniũ fidei perhibente. He was confirmed bishop of Couentrie, in the yéere of Christ one thousand two hundred and fortie, being the 24 yere of Henrie the third, who (hauing bin the kings treasuror before) did now with great solemnitie take his leaue of the barons of the exchéker with teares, and they all rose vp and kissed him. Of whose election (in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred thirtie and nine) to that bishoprike, thus further writeth the said Matth. touching the monks of Couentrie. Eligerunt secundum prædictam formam dominum Hugonem de Pateshull, &c. canonicum sancti Pauli London: & domini regis cancellariũ, in episcopum & custodem animarum suarum. Concerning whome I collected this note out of the register of Westminster, that Philip Coleuille knight, the sonne of William Coleuille, the sonne of Agnes Foliot, gaue to Richard abbat of Westminster all his part of the inheritance which was Robert Foliots, brother to the said Agnes, in Langden. Poxton, and Chalneie; witnesses Rafe bishop of Chichester chancellor, and Hugh Pateshull treasuror in the nineteenth yeare of the reigne of Henrie the third, which Pateshull Matthew Westminster, in the yeere of Grace 1234, calleth Summum thesaurarium.

Galfridus Templarius, whome some will haue treasuror, but by what reson I cannot conceiue as yet, and therefore will not obstinatlie reiect him, nor hastilie receiue him into this place of the treasuror: of this man is more spoken amongst the chancellors. Galfridus Templarius.

William Hauerhull, a canon of Paules church in London, was made treasuror to king Henrie the third, the yere of our redemption one thousand two hundred and fortie, being the foure and twentith yeare of the reigne of the said Henrie, in which place he continued the eight and twentith yeare of the said Henrie the third, being the yeare of our redemption 1244. He died at London in the yeere one thousand two hundred fiftie two, being the six and thirtith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, as saith the addition to Matthew Paris fol. 1128, after which the said author fol. 1226, laied his death, in the yere of Christ 1256, being the 39 yeare of king Henrie the third, such error is crept into histories by the negligence of the transcriber: but I suppose the first note of his death to be the truer, because the same is confirmed by Matth. West. speaking in the said yeare 1252 of the death of this man, for whose epitaph these following verses were made: William de Hauerhull.

Hîc iacet Hauerhulle iaces protothesaurarie regis, Hinc Hauerhulle gemis non paritura talem:*
Fercula culta dabas, empyrea vina pluebas,
A modo sit Christus cibus & esca tibi.*

* Pariunt. * Potus.

I haue also read a note of one William Hauerhull (which might be this man) which saith that William Hauerhull the sonne of Bythmarus de Hauerhull, gaue houses in Cheapeside to the abbete of Westminster, and that one Thomas de Hauerhull was the sonne and heire of William Hauerhull.

Richard de Barking abbat of Westminster, as witnesseth the liues of the abbats, was one especiall councellor to Henrie the third, chéefe baron of the exchéker, and treasuror of England, who I suppose did follow William Hauerhull. For his death, which happened on the three and twentith date of Nouember, in the thirtith yeare of king Henrie the third, in the yeare of Christ 1246, after that he had béene abbat foure and twentie yéeres, must néeds proue him to be treasuror before Philip Louell: yea and peraduenture (as is most likelie) before Hugh Pateshull. Yet Matthew Paris, speaking of the death of Hauerhull, will néeds haue Philip Louell to succéed William Hauerhull, as after shall appéere. This Richard de Barking was buried in Westminster church, before the midle of the altar in our ladie chapell in a tome of marble, which after in the time of William Colchester abbat of that place, was pulled downe by frier Combe, a sacrist of that house of Westminster, who laied a faire plaine marble stone ouer him, with this present epitaph thus inscribed: Richard de Barking.

Richardus Barking prior & post inclytus abbas, Henrici regis prudens fuit iste minister:
Huius erat prima laus, insula rebus opima,
Altera laus éque Thorp, census, Ocham, decimæque,
Tertia Mortone castrum simili ratione,
Et regis quarta de multis commoda charta,
Clementis festo mundo migrauit ab isto,
M. Domini C. bis, xl. sextóque sub anno,
Cui detur venia parte pia virgo Maria.

Philip Louell or Louell, was in this order aduanced to the office of treasuror, as appeereth by these words of Matthew Paris vpon the death of William Hauerhull. Et cùm crederetur quod dominus rex Iohannem Franciscum officio Wilhelmi (which was Hauerhull) subrogaret, fabricatis rumoribus quòd idem Iohannes in partibus remotis Angliæ Borealibus (vt contra quosdam religiosos plantauerat) obijsset, constituit dominus rex Philippum Louell clericum, virum prudentem, facundum & generosum, in loco memorati Willelmi suum thesaurarium, Philip Louell.

saurarij, quod factum est apud sanctū Albanū, procurante vt dicitur Iohanne Mansell amico Philippi speciali. This man was treasuror in the 35 and so vntill the 42 yeare of Henrie the third, & was in the same yeare deposed by the barons, he died at Yamesley, in the yeare of Christ 1259, whose executors were Philip Louell & Robert de Mercenton. But his goods after his death the king commanded to be confiscat. And heere before I go any further, I thinke it not amisse to note that some haue mistaken themselues in the accompt of the kings treasuror much about this time, making these persons Walter Bruell & Peter Catchpoze or Chacepoze to be the kings treasuror, which by no accompt of yeares can be true, for they were the queenes and not the kings treasurors, as may apeere both by Mat. Paris and Mat. Westmin. whereof the first writeth thus: obijt & Walterus de Brudell eiusdem reginæ thesaurarius, which he placeth in the yere of Christ 1255, being the thirtie ninth yeare of king Henrie the third. Of the second person Chacepoze thus writeth Mat. West. in the yeare of Christ 1254: Veniens autem rex ad mare nec ventum habēs prosperum, apud Boloniam moratus est inuitus, vbi obijt Petrus Chaceporc natione Pictauensis, reginæ thesaurarius & regis clericus & conciliarius specialis. And thus this much by the waie of the two treasurors of the queens, supposed by some (but not rightlie) to haue beene the kings.

John Crakehall. John Crakehall archdeacon of Bedford was treasuror in 42, 43, 44 yeare of Henrie the third, to whom the king in the fortie fourth of his reigne, being the yeare of Christ 1260, gaue a prebendarie, wherin being inuested, he was from thence remoued by a former collation therof made to one John le Gras. The said Crakehall after died the same yere at London.

John abbat of Peterborow. John abbat of Peterborow was by the barons in the 44 yeare of Henrie the third made treasuror, as the other officers of the king also were, Nicholas of Elie was then made chancellor, & Hugh de Spenser chefe iustice, which office of treasurorship this John continued, in the 46 yeare of Henrie the first, 1262.

Nicholas de Elie. Nicholas de Elie so called bicause he was archdeacon of Elie, was treasuror to the king in the seuen and fourtith of Henrie the third, being the yeare of our Lord 1263, whereof I haue seene this note of record. Memorandum quod in crastino Paschæ, Anno 47 H. 3. In præsentia Rogeri le Bigot comite Norffolke & marischalli Angliæ, Hugo le Bigot, Arnoldi de Berkeley baron, de scaccario magistri, Iohannis de Chisull cancellar. regis, &c. Recepit magister Nicholaus archidiaconus Eliensis thesaurarius subscripta in thesauraria dom. regis, &c. This man as before appeereth had bin chancellor, of whom is mention made in my following tretise of the chancellors.

Thomas de Wimundham. Thomas Wimundham. This man being chiefe chanter of Lichfield, was by the barons in the yeare of Christ 1258, in the one and fourtith yeare of king Henrie the third, made treasuror (at the exchekr) of the seale or place where the writs be sealed with greene wax, after which he was treasuror to the king in the 50, 51, & 52 yeares of king Henrie the third.

John Chisull. John Chisull sometime chancellor was treasuror in the foure & fiftith yeare of Henrie the third, being about the yeare of Christ a thousand two hundred three score and nine. He was deane of Paules, chosen bishop of London in the yeare of Christ a thousand two hundred seuentie and three, and consecrat to that place in the yeare of Christ a thousand two hundred seuentie & foure, in which place he continued about fiue yeares, and died in the yeare of our redemption 1279, being in the seuenth yeare of the reigne of the victorous prince king Edward the first of that name. See more of this Chisull in my following discourse of the chancellors.

Philip de Eie. Philip de Eie was treasuror (as appeareth by the records of the exchekr) in the 56 yeare of king Henrie the third, and in the first yeare of king Edward the first, partlie falling in the yeare of our redemption 1272, and 1273.

Joseph de Chancie. Joseph de Chancie, whom one anonymall author calleth John de Chancie, but not rightlie as I suppose, was treasuror in the second yeere of the scourger of the Scots king Edward the first, being the yeare of our redemption 1274.

William bishop of Bath. William Gifford bishop of Bath and Welles was treasuror to Edward the first, he was remoued to Yorke in the yeare of Christ 1265, this man is by manie chronicles, and that perhaps most truelie called Walter Gifford. He died in the seuenth yeare of king Edward the first, being the yeare of our redemption 1279 as hath Nicholas Triuet. Of this man see more in the chancellors of England.

Robert Burnell. Robert Burnell bishop of Bath and Welles chancellor of England, and treasuror to king Edward the first, is by the Welsh historie pag. 328, called chiefe iustice of England. Leland reporteth that an abbat told him how that a bishop Burnell built the castell of Acton Burnell. Of this man shall be more spoken hereafter in the chancellors of England.

Joseph de Chancie. Joseph de Chancie the second time treasuror to king Edward the first, in the first yeare of the said king, being the yeare of our redemption 1278, was also prior of S. Johns Jerusalem in Anglia, as I take it; and by an other name called the lord of S. Johns or of the knights of the Rhodes in England.

Thomas Becke. Thomas Becke archdeacon of Worcester, was treasuror in the seuenth yeare of king Edward the first, being the yeare of our redemption 1278 as some haue, but 1279 as other haue (by the witnesse of Leland, out of a monke of Glastenburie) in his booke De assertione Arthuri, reciting the words of the said monke in this sort.

Anno Domini 1267: Eadueardus rex Henrici tertij filius, venit cum regina sua Glasconiam. Die verò Martis proxima sequenti, fuit rex & tota curia accepta sumptibus monasterij. Quo die in crepusculo, fecit apperiri sepulchrum inclyti Arthuri, vbi in duabus cistis imaginibus & armis eorū depictis, ossa dicti regis miræ grossitudinis separata inuenit. Imago quidem reginæ coronata, imaginis regiæ corona fuit prostrata, cum abscissione sinistræ auriculæ; & vestigijs plagæ vnde moriebatur: inuenta est scriptura super his singulis manifesta. In crastino, videlicet die Mercurij rex ossa regis, reginæ ossa reginæ, pallijs pretiosis reuoluta, in suis cistis recludentes, & sigilla sua apponentes, præceperunt idem sepulchrum ante maius altare celeriter collocari, retentis externis capitibus propter populi deuotionem; appositaque huiusmodi scriptura: Hæc sunt ossa nobilissimi regis Arthury, quæ anno dominicæ incarnationis 1278, decimo tertio calendas Maij, per dominum Eadueardum regem Angliæ illustrem hic fuerunt sic collocata, præsentibus Leonora serenissima eiusdem regis consorte, & filia domini Ferandi regis Hispaniæ, magistro William de Middleton nunc Norwicensi electo, magistro Thoma de Becke archidiacono Dorsitensi & prædicti regis thesaurario, domino Henrico de Lasciæ comite Lincolniæ, domino Amideo comite Subaudiæ, & multis magnatibus Angliæ. Thus farre the monke of Glastenburie.

Richard de Ware. Richard Warren or de Ware abbat of Westminster, was made abbat about the yeare of Christ 1260, being about the foure and fortith yeare of king Henrie the third, who was made treasuror, as hath Iohn de Euersden, in the yeare of our redemption a thousand two hundred & foure score, being the eight yeare of king Edward the first: which yeare of Christ a thousand two hundred and foure score, some doo falslie make to fall in the tenth, some in the eleuenth yeare of the said Edward the first, which contrarietie hath onelie risen by the default of the transcriber. But most certeine it is that he was treasuror in the ninth, eleuenth, and part of the twelfe of the said king Edward the first. This man going to Rome for his consecration, brought from thense certeine workemen and rich purphyrie stones, where of and by whom he made that rare pauement (conteining a discourse of the whole world) which is at this date most beautifull, and to be seene at Westminster before the communion table: a thing of that singularitie, curiousnesse, and rarenesse, that England hath not the like againe, in which pauement are circularie written in letters of brasse these ten verses following:

Si lector posita prudenter cuncta reuoluat,
Hic finem primi mobilis inueniet.
Sepes trina canes, & equos, homines superaddas,
Ceruos, & cornos, aquilas, immania cete,
Mundum quòd sequens præcuntis triplicat annos,
Sphericus archetypũ globum hic monstrat microcosmum.
Christi milleno, bis centeno, duodeno,
Cum sexageno, subductis quatuor anno,
Tertius Henricus, rex, vrbs, Odoricus & abbas
Hos compegere purphyreos lapides.

Anno Domini 1268 Henricus tertius vrbs Roma Odoricus cementator & abbas Richardus de Ware fecerunt id pauimentum.

The full explanation of which verses shall be at large set downe in the whole discourse of this abbats life, in my large booke of the liues of the lord treasurors. Which abbat with those workemen and those stones did also frame the shrine of Edward the confessor with these verses, carued out of stone and also gilded set about the same shrine or monument:

Anno milleno Domini, cum septuageno,
Et bis centeno, cum completo quasi deno,
Hoc opus est factum, quod Petrus duxit in actum, Romanus ciuis. Homo, causam noscere si vis,
Rex fuit Henricus sancti præsentis amicus.

This abbat died the second date of December, in the yeare of our redemption a thousand two hundred foure score and three, being the twelfe yeare of king Edward the first; after that he had gouerned the monasterie three and twentie yeares and more, and was buried there at Westminster, in the foresaid plaine pauement of purphyrie on the north side neere vnto the tome (as is yet well to be seene) of Ddomer or Aimer de Valence earle of Penbroke, on which graue is ingraued this breefe epitaph heere insuing:

Abbas Richardus de Wara qui requiescit
Hic portat lapides, quos hic portauit ab vrbe.

Walter Wenlocke.

Walter Wenlocke abbat of Westminster, whom Matthew Westminster calleth William de Wenloke, was made abbat of Westminster after the death of Richard de Ware, & was treasuror to king Edward the first, as hath the register of the liues of the abbats of Westminster, and other records that I haue seene. Which office it seemeth that he had, meane betweene the twelfe and the fourteenth yeare of the said king Edward the first, as I suppose. This man after that he had beene abbat six and twentie yeares lacking six dates, died the fiue and twentith of December on the Christmas date at night, in his manour of Pireford in Glocestershire, in the first yeare of Edward the sonne of Edward (which was Edward the second) being the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred and seuen, and was buried in the church of Westminster, besides the high altar then standing without the south doore of saint Edwards shrine before the presbiterie there, vnder a plaine pauement and a marble stone decentlie adorned with this epitaph to his high commendation:

Abbas Walterus iacet hic sub marmore tectus,
Non fuit austerus, sed mitis, famine rectus.

Bishop of Couentrie.

A bishop of Couentrie (and Lichfield) was treasuror of England in the fourteenth yeere of king Edward the first, being the yeare of our redemption 1286, in whose place in the same yeare came John Kirkbie.

John Kirkbie bishop of Elie.

John Kirkbie deane of Wimburne and archdeacon of Couentrie, & treasuror to king Edward the first, was on the seuenth calends of August in the yeare of our Lord 1286, being the fourteenth yeare of the said Edward (then at Paris) made bishop of Elie, whome Leland (the refiner of all names doth in his cõment vpon his song of the swan in the word Winchelsega thus terme; Iohannes Cherchebius episcopus Anguillarinus regi à thesauris. This man was treasuror in the sixteenth, seuentéenth, & part of the eightéenth of Edward the first, in which yeare (as it séemeth) being part of the yeare of Christ 1290 this bishop died, the seuenth calends of Aprill, after that he had béene bishop three yeares some moneths and some dates, and was buried by Walepole bishop of Norwich in the church of Elie, on the north part of the quére before the altar of saint John Baptist.

William de Marchia.

William de Marchia or Gulielmus Martius was treasuror in Easter terme, in the eightéenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the first, in which office he continued about fiue yeares, & was remoued from that place on the 23 yeare of the said king Edward the first, and Peter of Leicester baron of the exchéker, with the two chamberleins executed all functions of that office vntill a new treasuror was made. This William de Marchia was made bishop of Bath and Welles, in the yeare of Christ 1293, being the 22 yeare of king Edward the third, in which sée he remained almost ten yeares, and died in the yeare of our Lord 1302, being about the 32 yeare of the said king Edward the first, and was buried in the church of Welles in the wall, betwéene the doore of the cloister and the altar of saint Martine, at whose tome in time past (as the nature of that credulous age did hastilie beléeue) were manie miracles done; as some haue left in memorie to the following posteritie.

Walter Langhstone bishop of Lichfield.

Walter Langhstone bishop of Lichfield and Couentrie was made treasuror after William de Marchia, in the 23 yeare of king Edward the first, in which office he continued (as I gather) during the life of king Edward the first, which fell in the 35 yeare of his reigne, being the yéere of our redemption 1307, and was then remoued and imprisoned in the tower with two men onelie by Edward the second then comming to the crowne, bicause the said Walter Langhstone had caused king Edward the first to imprison, and as some haue to banish this new king Edward the second for breaking downe the parkes of the said bishop Walter Langhstone. During the time that this Peter de Willebie was vnder treasuror or lieutenant of the treasuror, for the words be Locum tenens thesaurarij, in the thirtith, one and thirtith, two and thirtith of Edward the first, this Walter was made bishop of Couentrie and Lichfield, in the yeare of our redemption 1295, being the three and twentith yeare of king Edward the first, and the same yeare that he was made treasuror. He died about the yeare of our redemption 1321, being about the fourteenth yeare of king Edward the second, to which bishop the lord Cobham now liuing his heire, as being descended from Margaret the sister and heire of John Penerell the cosine and heire to this Walter Langhstone, which Margaret was maried to sir William de la Pole of Albie knight, frõ whom the lord Cobham is issued. And here sith I haue before made mention of the death of Edward the first, although it be somewhat impertinent to the treasurors; yet for that I do not remember that the same verses are set downe in any of our late English chronicles, & for that I would haue a perpetuall memorie of them, I will here deliuer such epitaphicall verses as I haue found touching king Edward the first:

Dum viguit (rex) & valuit tua magna potestas,
Franglatuit, pax magna fuit, regnauit honestas,
Scotos Eadwardus, dum vixit, suppeditauit,
Temnit, afflixit, depressit, dilaniauit.

Walter Reinolds

Walter Reinolds scholemaster to Edw. 2. bishop of Walter bishop of Worcester. of Worcester, and after of Canturburie, and chancellor of England, was aduanced to the place of the lord treasuror of England, in the 1. Edw. 2. being the yeare of Christ 1307, after which in the yeare of our Lord 1308, he was made bishop of Worcester, he continued in the office of treasuror vntill some part of the fourth yeare of the said Edward the second, at what time came in his place John Sandall, who was lieutenant vnto the said Walter in place of the treasuror, as appeareth by manie writs directed vnto him by the name of John Sandall Locum tenenti W. episcopi Wigorniæ. Of him is more spoken in the chancellors of England. But here I cannot passe ouer some both skilfull in antiquitie, & persons of no small name by reason of their office, whereof the one in print, and the other in a booke of the nobilitie of England since the conquest vnprinted, do make Hugh Spenser the elder treasuror of England, which as yet I cannot find to be true, for that I doubt that king Edw. 2. louing him so entierlie would euer after remoue him, & for that the full succession of treasurors before set downe, being true and taken out of ancient and most certeine records, will not afford him anie place among them. But leauing that matter to others who can better defend the same, I will descend to the other treasurors.

William de Marchia.

Hugh Spenser the elder.

John de Sandall. John de Sandall being clerke, Scutifer regis, chancellor of the exchéker, and chancellor of England, hauing béene before vnder treasuror or deputie for the high treasuror, came now in the fourth yeare of Edward the second to be made chiefe treasuror, & entered into that office in Easter terme about the beginning of the said fourth yeare of Edward the second. But in the yere following, which was the fift of Edward the second, he gaue place to another. He was chosen bishop of Winchester in the ninth yeare of Edward the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1316. Of whome thus writeth Anomymus M. S. Obierunt episcopus Winton & Eli viri sacra professione insigniti, quorum primo successit Iohannes de Sandall cancellarius Angliæ vir cunctis affabilis & necessarium communitati. Secundo successit Iohannes de Hothum scaccar. regis, vir siquidem scientiæ penitus ignarus, qui statim episcopatus ascenso culmine, ad honorum pariter & officij thesaurarij rex ipsum in sui fauorem sublimauit. Of which John Sandall, and also of John Hothume, shall be more said hereafter.

Walter Langhton bishop of Lichfield.

Walter Norwich. Walter Norwich, knight, treasuror in the fift yeare of Edward the second, and afterward in Easter tearme in the eight yeare of king Edward the second, did on the third date of October in the said eight yeare of king Edward the second receiue the office of the treasurorship, and on the same date tooke a corporall oth before the barons and chamberleins of the exchéker, to behaue himselfe well and faithfullie in the same office, which he had receiued of king Edward the second, by his letters dated at Yorke the six and twentith date of September, in the eight yeare of the said king Edward the second, which he kept not long at that time.

John Sandall. John Sandall was the second time lord treasuror, in the six and seuenth yeare of king Edward the second. This man being bishop of Winchester, was treasuror. Of him sée more in the chancellors of England.

Walter de Norwich. Walter de Norwich being treasuror as before in the eight yeare of king Edward the second, did not long inioy the same, but as I suppose gaue place to John Drokensford.

John Drokenford. John de Drokensford, the fourteenth bishop of Bath & Welles, had (as I haue read) the great seale deliuered vnto him, and was also treasuror of England. But bicause I find not as yet in what yeare, although it were in the time of king Edward the second, I cannot set downe the certeintie. Of whome thus writeth the register of the bishops of Bath. Iohannes Drokensford thesaurarius 14. Bathon episcopus post Walterum Haselshawes, successit in episcopatum Bathon, annis 19, iste episcopatum pluribus ædificijs insigniuit, francheſias per reges episcopatui concessas non solum literatorie renouauit sed etiam ampliauit. Et quo ad ditationem & exaltationem parentelæ suæ ferè fuit æqualis prædecessori suo Roberto Bornell. Et Welliæ sepelitur ante altare sancti Iohannis Baptistæ.

John Hothum bishop of Elie. John Hothum Bishop of Elie (as is before noted out of one anonymall chronicle) obteined the place and honour of treasurorship, in the eleuenth yeare of king Edward the second, which he did not long inioy. For in the Michaelmas tearme in the twelfe yere of king Edward the second, came William Walwaine. Of this John Hothum is mention made in the discourse of the chancellors hereafter.

William Walwaine. William Walwaine treasuror of England in the twelfe yeare of king Edward the second, being about the yeare of our redemption 1318, was (as it should séeme) for his negligence and vnworthines of the place most worthilie remoued at the parlement at Yorke, in such sort that he possessed not that place (as I coniecture) aboue halfe a yere. For in the same twelfe yeare came the bishop of Winchester.

John Stratford bishop of Winchester. John Stratford bishop of Winchester, vpon the remouing of Walwaine, was in the same twelfe yeare of king Edward the second admitted into the office of the treasurorship, vntill the king should otherwise determine. Which bishop found not in the treasurie aboue nine & twentie pounds seuenteene shillings and eight pence, which might well be the cause of the displacing of the said Walwaine, who had ouer prodigallie dispersed the kings treasure.

Walter Stapleton bishop of Excester. Walter Stapleton bishop of Excester was treasuror in the thirteenth yeare of king Edward the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1319, in which I suppose he continued vntill the fifteenth yeare of the said king, being about the yere of Christ 1321. Of this man doth more follow.

Walter Norwich. Walter Norwich knight was the third time made treasuror, which place he inioied in the fifteenth yeare of king Edward the second, being the yéere of our redemption 1321, or there abouts. Walsingham saith that in the second of Edward the third Obyit William de Norwich.

Roger Northborow or Norberus. Roger Northborow Scutifer or keéper of the seale, being taken by the Scots at the battell of Bannockesburne about the seuenth yeare of Edward the second, in the yeare of our redemption 1313, was also clearke of the wardrobe, and treasuror in the thirteenth of king Edward the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1322. Of whom thus writeth one anonymall chronicle M.S. Anno Domini 1321 obyt Walterus de Langtone episcopus Cestren. cui successit in episcopatus honore per viâ impressionis & ambitionis Rogerus de Northburgh, clericus, de regis garderobia, sibi regis in cunctis fauentibus auxilio & voluntate. I haue read of one Godfrete de Northburgh bishop of Chester that died in the three and thirtith of king Edward the third, being the yere of Christ 1359, which perhaps should be this Roger Northborow, Godfrete being by the transcriber placed in stéed of Roger. But I will not at this time define anie certeintie thereof, although I find an other note of one Roger Northborow consecrated bishop of Couentrie and Lichfield, in the yeare of Christ 1321, who sat in that sée eight and thirtie years, which eight and thirtie yeares added to the yeare of Christ, in which this Roger was made bishop, do make vp the number of the yeare of Christ 1359, in which it is said that Godfreie Northborow died.

Walter Stapleton bishop of Excester. Walter Stapleton bishop of Excester, the second time treasuror in the eighteenth yeare of king Edward the second, & before, was remoued in Easter tearme in the same yeare. In which Easter tearme was William bishop of Yorke also made treasuror, as is prooued by the pell of Exitus, that terme being thus intituled, De termino Paschæ anno 18 Ed. 2. tam tempore W. episcopi Exon. quàm W. archiepiscopi Eborum. This Walter being elected to the bishoprike of Excester, in the yeare of our redemption 1307, did sit in that place twentie yeares, and was beheaded at the comming into England of quéene Isabell to depose Edward the second, in the twentith yere of the said king Edward the second, in the yéere of our redemption 1326. The cause of whose beheading was, for that he had procured the banishment of the said quéene Isabell, and of hir sonne prince Edward.

William Welton. William Welton archbishop of Yorke made lord treasuror in Easter terme, in the eightéenth yéere of Edward the second, kept the same office vntill the deposition of himselfe from that place, & of his maister from his kingdome, in the twentith yeare of the reigne of the said Edward the second, and then gaue place to John Stratford.

John Stratford. John Stratford bishop of Winchester was the second time made treasuror of England, in the twentith yeare of the deposed king Edward, after the death of Walter Stapleton. This John the fourteenth daie of Nouember, in the said twentith yeare of Edward the second, comming into the excheker, brought thither the kings patent, or open writ, or commandement, vnder the seale of Edward the kings eldest son, to witnes his election and creation to that place of treasuror: the tenor of which writ I haue thought good to set downe, because it was done by the son in the fathers name, and vnder the testé of the son, the father yet being king in shew; but the son indéed as gouernor of the realme: which title he inioied, vntill that he most vnnaturallie by the malice of his mother, the ambition of himselfe, and the flatterie of his followers had deposed his father. The tenor of which writ was in these words, as followeth.

EDwardus rex Angliæ, & dominus Hiberniæ, baronibus & camerarijs suis de scaccario suo salutem. Quùm pro eo quod venerabilis pater W. archiepiscopus Eborum nuper thesaurarius scaccarij prædicti, circa diuersa negotia in partibus Borealibus est occupatus, quominùs intendere possit ad ea quæ ad officium illud in dicto scaccario pertinent exercenda: constituerimus venerabilem patrem Iohannem Wintoniensem episcopum, tenentem locum thesaurarij scaccarij prædicti, quousque de officio illo aliter duximus ordinandum. Percipiendo in eodem officio (dum illud sic tenuerit) feodum consuetum prout in literis nostris patentibus præfato episcopo inde confectis plenius continetur. Vobis mandamus, quod ipsum episcopum ad officium admittatis, & ei in his quæ ad officium prædictum pertineant intendatis in forma prædicta. Teste Edwardo filio nostro primogenito custode regni nostri. Apud Hereford sexto die Nouembris, anno regni nostri vicesimo.

Adam Tarleton. Adam Tarleton, or de Dzleton borne in Herefordshire, being Decretorum doctor, was made bishop of Hereford by the pope at Auinion in the yeare one thousand three hundred and seauenteene, about the tenth or eleuenth yeare of the reigne of Edward the second, being he that made the sermon for the deposition of king Edward the second, and wrote the amphibologicall epistle for the death of the king, conteining these words, Regem occidere nolite timere bonum est, which hath by a comma or point made at Timere one sense, and by a comma made at Nolite another sense. Which Adam was made lord treasuror in the first yeare of king Edward the third, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred twentie and six, in which office he continued not long. For in the Easter terme of the said king came Henrie bishop of Lincolne. This man was made bishop of Winchester in the yére one thousand three hundred thirtie and fiue, being the ninth yeare of king Edward the third: in which seat he sate twelue yeares. The death of which Adam (who gaue Yenningfield parsonage to the church of Hereford) sir Thomas de la More doth most plentifullie set forth.

Henrie Burwash bishop of Lincolne was lord treasuror in Easter terme, in the first yére of the reigne of king Edward the third, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred twentie and seauen, in which office he continued vntill the second yeare of Edward the third, and was afterward remoued. Henrie Burwash or Burgelle bishop of Lincolne.

Thomas bishop of Hereford inioied the honorable place of the lord treasuror, in the third yeare of king Edward the third, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred twentie and nine: but in the yére following another came in place. Thomas bishop of Hereford.

Robert Woodhouse possessed the roome of the high tresuror of England, in the fourth yére of the reigne of the said yong king Edward the third, being the yeare that the word became flesh one thousand three hundred and thirtie, and was also treasuror some part of Michaelmasse terme, in the fift yére of king Eward the third, who in the yére following did giue place vnto another. Robert Woodhouse.

William archbishop of Yorke was againe treasuror of England, in the fift yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, being the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred thirtie and one, and inioied that place some part of Michaelmasse terme in the said yeare, after whome came the bishop of Norwich. William Melton.

W. bishop of Norwich was made treasuror in Michaelmas terme in the said fift yére of the reigne of king Edward the third: in which terme there had béene three lord treasurors successiuelie (a thing seldome or neuer heard, nor I thinke likelie againe euer to be) which office this bishop kept all Michaelmasse terme, in the first yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred thirtie and two, and somewhat more in the end, yet yelding that honor to another. W. bishop of Norwich.

Robert le Aileftone, being lord treasuror in the seuenth yére of the reigne of Edward the third, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred thirtie and three, continued in the same office vntill the tenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, being the yeare of our saluation one thousand three hundred thirtie six, which was about three yeares, the same being a longer time than anie other had possessed that place, since the beginning of the reigne of the said king Edward the third. Robert le Aileftone.

Henrie Burwash bishop of Lincolne was againe treasuror the tenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, being in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred thirtie and six, in which yéere (as hath Scala chronicorum) the king holding his parlement at London, was aduised by his councell to prosecute his title to the crowne of France. Whereupon king Edward sent ambassadors to the duke of Bauiere emperor (which had married the other sister to the earle of Henalt, as king Edward the third had maried one) for suertie of aliance, and to retaine noble men about him with no small charge, which ambassadors were Henrie Burgwash bishop of Lincolne, and the earles William Pontacute of Sarum, and William Clinton of Huntington, who returned to the parlement at London with their answer well liked. Of this man see more in the chancellors, being yet after his ambassage treasuror in some part of the eleuenth yéere of Edward the third. Henrie Burwash bishop of Lincolne.

Richard de Burie bishop of Durham did inioie the honor of lord treasuror, in the eleuenth yeare of the Richard de Burie bishop of Durham.

the reigne of king Edward the third: he was a man of great grauitie, and much esteemed of the nobilitie and gentlemen of the north. Of this man is more spoken in the chancellors of England.

William de la Zouch. William de la Zouch borne of the noble house of the lord Zouch, was treasuror of England, in the twelfe yéere of king Edward the third, in the yéere of our redemption one thousand thrée hundred thirtie and eight; he being bishop of Yorke was vicegerent to the king in the north parts, in the twentith yéere of the reigne of the said Edward the third, and in the yéere of our redemption one thousand thrée hundred fortie and six, at what time he toke Dauid Bruce king of Scots. This man went to Rome, and after a long contention betweene him and William Kelsleie, Kilsbie, or Kelseie (for all these different names are found in authors) touching the archbishoprike of Yorke, he was after two yeares thus spent consecrated bishop of Yorke by pope Clement the sixt. After which this William in the eleuenth yeare of his bishoprike, being long troubled with a grieuous disease, began the worke of a chappell on the south side adioining to the church of saint Peters in Yorke, where he purposed to be buried: but died before it was finished, and lieth interred in the said church before the altar of saint Edward the confessor.

Richard Sadington knight. Sir Richard Sadington knight was treasuror in the fouretéenth yéere of the reigne of king Edward the third, being the yéere of our redemption one thousand thrée hundred & fortie. There was one Robert Sadington liuing about this time, of whom is more mention in the chancellors of England: but as yet I well know not whether they were both one man or no; sith authors maie misplace Robert for Richard, as they haue often done.

Robert Northborow bishop of Couentrie. Robert Northborow, being at that time (as I iudge) bishop of Couentrie, was treasuror of England, in the fouretéenth yéere of the reigne of Edward the third, being the yeare of our Lord one thousand thrée hundred and fortie, in which yeare he was remoued, whom with the chancellor the king meant afterward (as after shall appeare) to haue sent into Flanders as pledges for monie which the K. owght there. After whom I suppose that Sadington came in place, although I haue a little misplaced him at this time, following the fansies of other men more than mine owne.

A bishop of Chester. A bishop of Chester was lord treasuror of England in the fiftéenth yéere of the reigne of king Edward the third, being about the yéere that the woord became flesh, one thousand thrée hundred fortie and one, in which office he did not long continue.

Robert Perning. Robert Perning or Pernicke was lord treasuror in the Easter terme, in the yéere of our redemption one thousand thrée hundred fortie and one, being the fiftéenth yéere of king Edward the third, in which yéere also he was made chancellor, and so continued both offices a while, vntill in the sixtéenth yéere of the reigne of king Edward the third, as I gather by all circumstances of times, records, and histories: who in the seuentéenth yeare of the reigne of the said king Edward the third, being the yéere of our redemption one thousand thrée hundred fortie and thrée (as appeareth by the bookes of the law) being chancellor, deliuered a record with his hands into the court of the kings bench. Of this man more shall be set downe hereafter in my discourse of the chancellors.

Roger Northborow bishop of Couentrie. Roger Northborow (as I take it) being then bishop of Couentrie, did honorable possesse the place of the lord treasuror of England, in the sixtéenth yéere of the reigne of king Edward the third, being the yéere of our redemption one thousand thrée hundred fortie and two. Of whome thus writeth Matthew Parker in the life of John Stratford archbishop of Canturburie: Ibi (meaning at the tower) *conciliatum est, tandémque definitū, vt archiepiscopus & episcopus Cicestrensis regni cancellarius & Coitentrensis thesaurarius, vnà cum alijs à satellitibus & licioribus deprehensi, ad publicam custodiam rerum à se, absente rege, gestarum rationem reddituri ducerentur. Mane accedunt satellites Lamethamū, sed * archiepiscopus ei pridiè decesserat: tum Londinum reuersi Couentrensem & Cicestrensem episcopos cum alijs designatis capiunt, captos ad turrim deducunt, &c.* * John Stratford.

William de Culsans. William de Culsans, being lord treasuror in the seauentéenth yeare of Edward the third, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand, thrée hundred, fortie and thrée, continued in the same office all Michaelmasse tearme, in the eightéenth yeare of the said Edward the third, and the yeare of Christ one thousand thrée hundred fortie and foure: and being a yeare more. Betweene whom & Thomas Henlæ abbat of Westminster was great contention about the iurisdiction of the hospitall of saint James in the parish of saint Margaret in Westminster, which hospitall is now a statelie house belonging to the prince, and built by king Henrie the eight called the manor of saint James with a parke walled about with bricke.

William de Edington bishop of Winchester. William de Edington, lord chancellor and treasuror of England, and bishop of Winchester, was lord treasuror in Easter terme the nineteenth yeare of Edward the third, being about the yeare of our redemption one thousand, thrée hundred fortie and fiue, in which office he continued vntill the two and thirtith of the said king, one thousand thrée hundred fiftie and eight, being fourteene years, which was (as I thinke) as manie more years, as anie one man did possesse that place, since the beginning of the reigne of king Edward the third, vntill the time of this William Edington. He was so surnamed of the place where hée was borne, being the towne of Edington in Wiltshire: he was made bishop of Winchester (as some haue) about the yeare of our redemption one thousand thrée hundred fortie and seuen, being about the one and twentith yeare of king Edward the third. This man (chosen bishop of Canturburie, but yet neuer bishop) died (as hath Walsingham) in the fortith yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand thrée hundred sixtie and six. I haue read of a bishop of Norwich that should also be treasuror in the foure and twentith of Edward the third, which must fall in the time that this Edington did continue that office: but how true it is, I leaue to others to consider, vntill I haue in my large booke of the liues of the lord treasurors dissolued that, and all other doubts and contrarieties that are here touched, or by authors reported.

John bishop of Rochester. John bishop of Rochester was lord treasuror in the two and thirtith yeare of king Edward the third, in the yeare of our redemption 1358, in which office he continued in the thirtie thrée and thirtie fourth yéere of Edward the third.

Simon Langham bishop of Elie. Simon Langham, being of the priorie of Westminster, made abbat of that house, was shortlie after made lord treasuror of England, which office he held in the fiue & thirtith and six and thirtith yeare of king Edward the third, who being bishop of London (as hath Matthew Parker) was in the yeare that the woord of the father toke on it, the forme of a seruant, by due account 1361, being the fiue and thirtith yeare of king Edward the third, by the pope made bishop of Elie, where he sat fiue yeares, and was after in the yeare of our redemption, one thousand, thrée hundred, sixtie and six, being the fortith yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, chosen bishop of Canturburie, and consecrated in the yeare of our redemption 1367, as saith the same Matthew Parker. On which date of his consecration he demanded homage homage of the erle Stafford of Thomas Rolle, John Kirrell, Robert Brockill, & Rafe Sentleger, knights for their lands which they held of the see of Canturburie. Shortlie after which in the yere of our redemption one thousand, three hundred, sixtie and eight, being the two and fortith yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, he was made cardinall, & died at Auinere the two and twentith date of Julie, about the yeare of our redemption, as saith one Anonymus M.S. 1376, being the fiftith yeare of king Edward the third, and was buried beside Auinion, in a place which he had raised from the foundation: three yeares after which his bones were brought to Westminster where at this date he hath one honorable tome on the south side of the shrine amongst the kings, on whose tome the monks of Westminster did sometime place this same epitaph in the remembrance of him:

Simon de Langham sub petris his tumulatus,
Istius ecclesiæ monachus fuerat, prior, abbas,
Sede vacante fuit electus Londoniensis
Præsul & insignis eligi, sed postea primas
Totius regni, magnus regisque minister:
Nam thesaurarius & cancellarius eius,
Ac cardinalis in Roma presbyter iste,
Postque Prænestinus est factus episcopus atque
Nuntius ex parte papæ, transmittitur istuc
Orbe dolente pater, quem nunc revocare nequimus:
Magdalenæ festo milleno septuageno
Et ter centeno sexto Christi ruit anno:
Hunc Deus absoluat de cunctis quæ malè gessit,
Et meritis matris sibi cœlica gaudia donet.

Of this man I haue intreated in my discourse of the cardinals pag. 1165. and in my collection of all the chancellors of England hereafter following.

John Barnet bishop of Worcester.

John Barnet made bishop of Worcester in the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred sixtie and two, being the six and thirtith yeare of king Edward the third, was treasuror of England in the seuen and thirtith yeere of Edward the third, in which office he continued, being treasuror in Michaelmasse tearme in the eight & thirtith yeare of the reigne of the said Edward the third, which fell in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred sixtie & foure, and so he continued in the three & fortith yeere of king Edward the third still treasuror. He was made bishop of Bath in the yeare of our redemption 1363, in which bishoprike he remained three yeares, and was by Urbane the first then bishop of Rome translated from Bath to Elie in the yeare of Christ 1866, being the fortith yeere of the reigne of king Edward the third, in which place he sat six yeares: and being a verie old man, and hauing beene treasuror about six yeares, he died at Hatfield the seuenth ides of June, in the yeare that God became man one thousand three hundred seuentie and three, and the seuen and fortith yeere of the often named king Edward the third, he was buried in the church of Elie besides the high altar on the south part.

Richard de Chesterfield.

I haue read and seene by manie noted that one named Richard de Chesterfield was treasuror to the king in the one and fortith yeare of king Edward the third, whome they will haue lord treasuror: which by no possible meanes as farre as I can yet conceiue maie be true: because it appeareth by record that Iohn bishop of Elie (which was this Barnet if you marke the time of his translating to Elie) was treasuror in the same yeare: but it maie be that he was treasuror of the chamber or houshold to the said king in the said one and fortith yeare of his reigne.

Thomas de Brantington.

Thomas de Brantington, being treasuror for the king in the parts of Guisnes marches and Calis, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred sixtie and seuen, being the one and fortith yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, was made bishop of Exceter by especiall letters of the king in the yeere of our saluation one thousand three hundred sixtie and eight, being the three and fortith yeare of the said Edward the third, and was lord treasuror of England in the foure and fortith & fiue & fortith yeere of Edward the third: in which fiue and fortith yeare, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred seuentie and one, he was in a parlement at the petition of the lords remoued, at what time also there passed a law, that the chancellor, treasuror, and clerke of the priuie seale, should no more be spirituall men: but that secular men should haue those offices.

Sir Richard Scrope or Scrobs knight lord of Bolton and chancellor of England, was treasuror of England in the six and fortith, seuen & fortith, & eight and fortith of Edward the third, and then gaue place to sir Robert Ashton knight. This Richard made out of the ground the castell of Bolton consisting of foure great strong towers, and of other statelie lodgings, which castell was erecting eighténe yeares, the charges whereof came yearelie vnto a thousand marks, which was eighténe thousand markes, or twelue thousand pounds: the ounce of siluer being then but at twentie pence, which being now trebled and at fiue shillings, doth at this date amount vnto six and thirtie thousand pounds, which castell he finished before Richard the second died. He bought the heire generall of saint Quintine, that was honor of Hornelie castell in Richmondshire, which heire he was content one Conters a seruant of his should marrie, and haue the preferrement of that ward; and so Hornelie castell came to the Conierses, of which house the first lord was William Conters, grandfather to him that died in the time of queene Maris without heire male, whereby his inheritance came to his three daughters. Which William the first lord Conters of that name did much cost vpon Hornelie castell: being before but a meane thing. I haue read of this lord Scrope, that he had a sonne called William, whereof we will speake more hereafter, that was earle of Wilshire, who being beheaded in his fathers life, left no issue behind him. After which the father surviuing was made treasuror to the king and died in honor, although he was not restored to his dignitie of chancellorship: but at what time he should be the second time treasuror (after the death of his sonne William) in the time of Henrie the fourth, I can not as yet certeinlie learne. But it maie be that he was againe treasuror in the ninth yeare of Henrie the fourth, for that I find not by any former search who then possessed that place. It seemeth that he had two wiues, the one the daughter of the lord Spenser the other the daughter of Michaell de la Pole erle of Suffolke called Blanch. He had three sons, for whom he bought of the king the three daughters and heires of Robert lord Tiptoft, whereof the eldest daughter Margaret was married to Roger his second sonne, the second daughter was married to William his eldest sonne, the third daughter called Millescent was married to Stephan the third sonne of the said Richard.

Sir Richard Scrope lord of Bolton.

Sir Robert Ashton.

Sir Robert Ashton knight, constable of Douer castell, was lord treasuror in the fiftith and one and fiftith of king Edward the third in Michaelmasse tearme, which was the last Michaelmasse tearme wherein the king reigned, being about the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred seuentie and six, of which name there was also one that was chiefe baron in the time of Edward the second, as I haue read.

Henrie Wake bishop of Worcester.

Henrie Wake or Wakefield, being made bishop of Worcester in the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred seuentie and fiue, being the fortie and ninth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, was made lord treasuror of England in the yeare yeare that the word of the father toke flesh in the wombe of the woman, one thousand three hundred seuentie and six, in the one and fiftith yeare of king Edward the third, in which office he continued part of Easter tearme in the first yeare of king Richard the second, being about the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred seauentie and eight, he died in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred ninetie and fiue, as saith Walsingham.

Thomas Bytantington bishop of Excester was made lord treasuror of England towards the latter end of Easter tearme, in the first yeare of king Richard the second, falling in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred seauentie and eight, as I at this time account it: from which place he was shortlie remoued in the second yeare of king Richard the second.

Thomas Bytantington bishop of Excester.

Richard earle of Arundell.

Richard earle of Arundell and Surrie, made lord treasuror of England in the second yeare of the reigne of king Richard the second, whereof part fell in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred seauentie and eight, & part in the yeare one thousand three hundred seauentie and nine, continued about one yeare in the same, and then gaue place to him which possessed the same office last before him, he married Elisabeth the daughter of William de Bohune earle of Northampton & Hereford, by whome he had issue Thomas earle of Arundell, Ione married to William Beauchampe lord Aburgauennie, Elisabeth married to Thomas lord Mowbraie, Margaret married to sir Rowland Lenthall, and Alice married to John Charleton lord Powes: this Richard was beheaded in the one and twentith yeare of Richard the second.

Thomas Bytantington bishop of Excester.

Thomas Bytantington bishop of Excester was the third time lord treasuror of England, in the third yeare of the after deposed king Richard the second, & was remoued from his office in the fourth yeare of the said Richard, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred and eightie, after the account of such as begin the yeare on the fiue and twentith of March.

Robert Hales.

Robert Hales chiefe prior of the knights of the Rhodes, intituled by the name of the knights of S. Johns Jerusalem in England, was lord treasuror of England in the fourth yeare of the reigne of Richard the second, in which office he continued during his life: for shortlie after that he came into that place (which as I suppose he held Easter terme, and some moneths after) in the said yeare of Richard the second, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred eightie and one (the rebelles hauing spoiled the hospitall or famous college of those knights of saint Johns by Smithfield neare vnto London) amongest others did fetch this Robert Hales out of the tower of London (where the king then laie) and beheaded him on the tower hill.

Hugh lord Segraue.

Hugh Segraue knight, whome Walsingham calleth Regis senescallum the kings steward, was made lord treasuror of England in the fift yeare of the reigne of king Richard the second, who continued in the said office the first, seauenth, eight, and some part of the Michaelmasse terme in the ninth yeare of the reigne of king Richard the second, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred eightie and fiue.

John Fortham bishop of Durham.

John Fortham canon, being secretarie to the king, was made bishop of Durham the nine and twentith of Maie, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred eightie and one, being the fourth yeare of the reigne of king Richard the second, and was inthronized in September, in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred eightie and two, being the first yeare of the reigne of king Richard the second. This man was made lord treasuror in Michaelmasse terme the ninth yeare of king Richard the second, being the yeare of our saluation one thousand three hundred eightie and fiue: and so continued part of the tenth yeare of king Richard the second, vntill he was by parlement discharged. He was translated from the bishoprike of Durham to Elie by Boniface the pope the fift calends of October, as hath the booke of Durham, one thousand three hundred eightie nine, being the twelfe yeare of the same Richard: but as saith the booke of Elie one thousand three hundred eightie and eight, being the thirteenth yeare of Richard the second. Which both may be true, because the one may haue relation to the yeare of his translation, and the other to the yeare of his inthronization, both which manie times happened in seuerall yeares of manie other bishops. He was bishop of Elie seuen and thirtie years, three moneths, and foure daies, and died a verie old man the thirteenth of December, in his manor of Dunham, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred twentie and fiue, falling in the fourth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the first.

John bishop of Hereford.

John Gilbert bishop of Hereford was by parlement made lord treasuror in the tenth yeare of king Richard the third, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred eightie and six, as I for this time take it, in which office he continued the eleuenth, and all Michaelmasse terme in the twelfe yeare of king Richard the second, and the one and twentith of March following: after which he was againe remoued, and then he with twelue more were appointed by commission to the gouernment of the whole realme vnder the king, of whome thus writeth one Anonymall chronicle M.S. Is fuit de ordine prædicatorū, vir qui plus linguaquàm fide regebat, which bishop (as I suppose) was remoued to saint Dauids, after that he had beene thirteene yeares bishop of Hereford.

Thomas Bytantington bishop of Excester.

Thomas Bytantington bishop of Excester. I haue read that the bishop of Excester was made treasuror in the twelfe yeare of Richard the second, vpon the remouing of John Gilbert, which bishop of Excester could not be Edmund Gifford, as some falselie name him, for there is no such man as I can find in the catalog of all the bishops of Excester: neither was it Edmund Stafford, for he was not made bishop of Excester vntill the twentith of June one thousand three hundred ninetie and fiue, being the daie before king Richard the second began the one and twentith yeare of his reigne, which is eight yeers after the time whereof we now intreat. Wherefore it must needs be Thomas Bytantington, for he being consecrated bishop of Excester the tenth of March, in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred & seuentie, being the foure and fortith yeare of Edward the third, and gouerning that see foure and twentie years, till the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred ninetie and fiue, in which came Edmund Stafford keeper of the priuie seale; it must needs be that (the bishop of Excester being treasuror in the twelfe yeare of Richard the second, falling in the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred eightie and eight) it was this man Bytantington, and that he was the fourth time made lord treasuror of England, about the eightenth yeare after that he was made bishop of Excester, who died in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred ninetie and fiue, as hath Ypodigma.

John Gilbert bishop of saint Dauids in Wales.

John Gilbert bishop of saint Dauids in Wales was lord treasuror in the thirteenth and foureteenth yeares of the reigne of the deposed king Richard the second. Of whome, because there is somewhat spoken before, we will intreat the lesse of him in this place.

John

John Waltham bishop of Salisburie.

John Waltham, of whome I haue spoken more in my discourse of the archbishops of Canturburie, in the life of William Courtneie was bishop of Salisburie, maister of the rolles in the first yeare of Richard the second, and keeper of the priuie seale, after which he was treasuror of England, in the fiftéenth, sixtéenth, seauentéenth, and part of the eightéenth of Richard the second, for he died in Michaelmas terme in the said 18 yeare of Richard the second, in the yere of Christ 1395, others saie 1394, of whome thus writeth Walsingham: Hoc anno (which was 1395) obijt Iohannes de Waltham episcopus Sarum & regni thesaurarius, qui tantùm regi complacuerit, vt etiam (multis licèt murmurantibus) apud monasterium inter reges meruit sepulturam.

Roger Walden bishop of London.

Roger Walden sometime secretarie to the king and treasuror of the towne of Calis (in the twelfe yére of Richard the second) was made lord treasuror in the eightéenth of the same king, about the yére of our Lord 1365, in which office he continued the two and twentith of the said Richard the second. He was elected and made bishop of Canturburie, but after reiected and deposed, and thereupon was by pope Innocent the seuenth made bishop of London on the tenth of December, in the yére of Christ 1404, being the first yeare of Henrie the fourth, in the which bishoprike he continued about one yere, and died in the yeare 1406, being buried at saint Bartholomews priorie in Smithfield, who of a poore man (as saith Walsingham) was made lord treasuror of England.

G. bishop of saint Dauids in Wales.

G. bishop of S. Dauids was lord treasuror of England in the two and twentith yere of Richard the second, which bishop I suppose to be Guido de Mone, whom the booke Ypodigma & Thomas Walsingham call bishop of S. Dauids, and saie that he died in the yére of our redemption 1407, writing in this sort: Eodem anno Guido de Mone Meneuensis episcopus præsentis lucis sensit eclipsim, qui dum vixit magnorum malorum causa fuit.

William Scrope earle of Wiltshire.

William Scrope knight, vicechamberleine to Richard the second was lord treasuror, he bought of William Montacute earle of Salisburie the Ile of Man, with the crowne thereof. He was one of those to whom king Richard the second let the kingdom to farme, he was lord treasuror of England in the 21 of Richard the second, and was after created earle of Wiltshire, in the said 21 yere of the same Richard the second, in the yéere of Christ 1397. He was after beheded at Bristow in the 23 and last yeare of the then deposed king Richard. Of which William Scrope and others thus writeth that worthie poet sir Iohn Gower in his historie of Richard the second, commonlie taken as part of his worke intituled Vox clamantis.

*Henrie Bolingbroke cõming into England and deposing Richard the second.

* Dux probus audaci vultu, cum plebe sequaci

Sir John Northberie.

Sir John Northberie made lord treasuror in the first yeare of king Henrie the fourth, being the yeare that God toke on him the forme of a seruant, a thousand three hundred nintie and nine, and continued in the same in the third yeare of Henrie the fourth, in which yeare he was also keeper of the priuie garderobe in the tower.

Henrie Bowet.

Henrie Bowet made bishop of Bath, about the yeare of our redemption 1401, being also about the second yeare of Henrie the fourth, in which bishoprike he continued eight yeares, and was after at the kings instance in the yére of Christ a thousand foure hundred and seuen, about the eight yeare of Henrie the fourth remoued to Yorke. This man was lord treasuror of England in the fourth yeare of king Henrie the fourth, in the yeare of our redemption 1403, in which place he continued not aboue a yére, if so long.

William lord Rosse.

William lord Rosse, the sonne of Thomas lord Rosse, did possesse the honorable place of the lord treasuror of England, in the fift yeare of king Henrie the fourth, being about the yeare of our saluation one thousand foure hundred and foure, and shortlie after gaue place to the lord Furniuall. He married Margaret daughter of Fitzallen lord Matrauars, he had issue Thomas lord Rosse slaine in France, in the yeare one thousand foure hundred twentie and one, about the ninth yeare of Henrie the first, and manie other children.

Thomas lord Furniuall.

Thomas lord Furniuall kept the place and office of the lord treasuror of England, the first, seuenth, and some part of the eight yeare of king Henrie the fourth, as in Michaelmasse tearme of the same eight yeare, falling in the yeare of our redemption, one thousand foure hundred and six, after which this lord Furniuall (who had the custodie of the castell and honour of Wigmore, being in the kings hands by reason of the wardship and minoritie of Edmund Mortimer earle of March) was (as it séemeth) remoued from the treasurorship, in whose rome succeeded the bishop of London. To these lord Furniuals did Furniuals inne of Holborne sometime apperteine as their mansion house, being now an inne of chancerie for yong students of the law and atturneies, and belonging vnto Lincolns inne in Chancerie lane.

Nicholas Bubwith made bishop of London.

Nicholas Bubwith bishop of London in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred and six: being the eight yére of Henrie the fourth, must be that bishop of London (as farre as I can yet conceiue) who was lord treasuror of England in Michaelmas tearme in the said eight yeare of Henrie the fourth: which office it séemeth that he held not long, for in Easter terme after in the same eight yeare, the office of the treasuror remained in the kings hands, and the accompts of the same terme go vnder the same title of being in the kings hands.

Sir Richard Scrope lord Scrope of Bolton.

Sir Richard Scrope lord of Bolton (whereof is so much spoken before) was as I suppose the second time treasuror of England in this ninth yeare of Henrie the fourth: whereunto I am induced by this reason; that first the king would not keepe that office so long in his hands as almost amounted vnto two yeares, but that he would bestow the same vpon some other: secondlie, for that I read that this Richard Scrope father to William Scrope earle of Wiltshire beheaded (by this Henrie the fourth before he came to the crowne) at Bristow (in the last yeare of Richard the second, and in the first of this kings reigne) was after the death of the said William made treasuror of England, and so died in honour: thirdlie for that I cannot see how he might be treasuror in anie yeare since the death of the said William, vntill this ninth yeare of Henrie the fourth: and lastlie, for that I cannot in anie record or other author find anie other man mentioned to supplie that place in this yeare: for which causes I haue attempted to bestow him here, and that rightlie, for anie thing that I can yet learne.

Sir John Tiptoft knight.

Sir John Tiptoft or Tibetot knight, did possesse the place and office of the lord treasurorship of England in Michelmas terme, in the tenth yeare of king

Henrie

Henrie the fourth, being in the yere of our redemption one thousand foure hundred and eight.

Henrie lord Scrope. Henrie lord Scrope of Masham and of Flaxfleet, was made lord treasuror of England, in the eleuenth yere of the reigne of K. Henrie the fourth, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred and ten, as hath Walsingham: in which office he continued vntill the death of king Henrie the fourth, which hapned in the fourteenth yeare of the same king, and in the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred & twelue, after the account of England: but one thousand foure hundred and thirteene after the account of such as doo begin the yeare at Januarie. He rebelled against king Henrie the fift, and was beheaded at Southhampton in the third yeare of K. Henrie the fift, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred and fifteene the last of Julie. Of which Henrie so conspiring against Henrie the fift, I find these verses in a written booke of parchment, intituled Extractum breue de chronica Thomæ Helmham, prior Lenton de tempore regis Henrici quinti. In which verses by the capitall letters are set down the names of the principall conspirators, & the yere of our Lord wherein the same was done, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred & thirteene: the greater Romane capitall letters in the third verse seruing for the yere of Christ, & for the name Zorc deriued of this word COR in the fourth verse, & the English capitall letters onelie seruing for the names of the persons in this sort couched togither for common capacitie:

Mox rex nauigium parat vt mare transeat armis,

Hi tres, Richardus Zorc, Henri Scrúpque, Thomas Gray,
In regem surgunt proditione pares:

[a] This C serueth for the name of Scrope and the yeare of Christ.
[b] Richard is called by the first letters of the fourth verse, & Zorc by changing the letters of the word Cor, and adding to it the letter z, which signifieth a point.
[c] By the first letter of the words of the fift verse set togither backward ariseth the name of Thomas Gray.

Thomas Fitz Allen earle of Arundell and Surreie was aduanced to the honorable office of the lord treasurorship of England, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred and thirteene, being the first yeare of the reigne of the most victorious prince K. Henrie the fift, in which office it seemeth that he continued the first, second, and third of Henrie the fift. He in the yeare 1405, being the seuenth of Henrie the fift, on the nert date of the feast of saint Katharine, married Beatrice the bastard daughter of the king of Portingale, by whom he had no issue, hauing his sisters his heires, and died in the yeare 1415, being the third yeare of Henrie the fift, and was buried in the college at Arundell.

Sir Roger Lech knight. Sir Roger Lech (whom some call but not rightlie as I suppose sir Philip Lech, being brother vnto the said sir Roger) was treasuror of England, in Michaelmas and Easter tearme in the fourth yeare of king Henrie the fift, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred and sixteene. He was at the seege of Rone with this king Henrie, in the first yeare of his reigne, being also treasuror for the warres in that voiage.

Henrie lord Fitz Hugh. Henrie lord Fitz Hugh was aduanced to the office of the lord treasurorship of England, in the fift yeare of Henrie the fift, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred & seuenteene, in which office he continued (as I gather) vntill the death of the said king Henrie the fift, which happened in August, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred twentie and two.

John Stafford. John Stafford clerke was made lord treasuror of England in the first yeare of king Henrie the sixt, being the yeare that the word became flesh 1422, in which office he continued in Michaelmas terme, and fourth of the said king Henrie the sixt, falling in the yeare of Christ 1425, he was chosen bishop of Bath, in the third yeare of king Henrie the sixt, in the yere 1424, he was chancellor of England, and remoued to the archbishoprike of Canturburie, of whome is mention made hereafter in the discourse of the chancellors of England, & touching whom I will for this time onelie set downe heere what Matthew Parker writeth of him in the life of Henrie Chicheleie an archbishop of Canturburie. Archiepiscopus (saith he) in the yeare of Christ our redeemer 1424: Cantuariensis 12. Octob. clerum in ecclesia Paulina conuocauit, in ea Henricus Beauford Winton episcopus regni cãcellarius, & Iohannes Stafford Bathoniẽsis electus episcopus regni thesaurarius, ad bellũ Gallicum opẽ à clero petiuit, & interposita paucorum dierum deliberatione, Wilhelmus Lindwood officialis curiæ Cãtuariẽsis de arcubus, hos responsum ab inferiori cleri synodo acceptum episcopis declarauit: non esse penes cleri procuratores potestatem subsidium concedendi. Nam cùm in dicta synodo in singulis diocœsibus cõstituti essent, clerus his solutionibus consentiendi licentiã expressè ademit: quia tantis tributis diu pendendis ad magnam inopiam & egestatem deuenit. Itaque cancellarius à superiori synodo ad inferiorẽ transiens, longa & diserta oratione, ac regis iam minoris necessitate, ac de instanti in Gallia bello egit, ac nequicquam suasit.

Walter lord Hungerford. Walter lord Hungerford knight of the garter, the sonne of sir Thomas Hungerford knight, was made lord treasuror of England in the fourth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the sixt, being the yere of Christ 1425, in which office he continued about six yeares, vntill some part of Michaelmas tearme in the tenth yeare of king Henrie the sixt, falling in the yeare that the sonne of God toke on him the forme of a seruant, one thousand foure hundred thirtie and one. He was also one of the councell to the said king, of whome is mention made by Matthew Parker in the life of Henrie Chicheleie archbishop of Canturburie, in these words: Proximo anno (which was about the yeare of our Lord 1425) synodus sub eodem archiepiscopo, 15 Aprilis inchoata est. Qua Iohanne Kempo Eboracẽsi archiepiscopo & Waltero Hungerfordo milite, regijs conciliarijs (illo cancellario hoc thesaurario regni) regis nomine postulantibus regi decimam concessit. Ac eisdem his petentibus, triennio post in recenti synodo media decima regi à clero data est. This lord treasuror maried Katharine, the daughter and heire of Thomas Peuerell knight, by whom he had issue Walter lord Hungerford of Hatchberie knight of the garter, that died without issue, sir Robert lord Hungerford of Hatchberie. Edmund Hungerford knight, that died without issue, Margaret maried to sir Walter Rodneie knight, and Elisabeth maried to Philip Courtneie knight: which Robert lord Hungerford and Margaret his wife, John Cheineie of Pim esquier, John Meruin esquier and others did (by the kings licence granted vnto them in the eleuenth yeare of king Edward the fourth) build the hospitall of Hatchberie in Wiltshire.

John lord Scrope. John lord Scrope of Upsall and Masham, made lord treasuror in the tenth yeare of king Henrie the sixt, being the yeare of our redemption 1431, in which office he continued vntill some part of the twelfe yere of the said king, as I for this time doo gather. Of whom thus writeth Matthew Parker in the life of Henrie Chichelie archbishop of Canturburie, touching a synod holden in the yeare of our Lord 1430, at what time, of the clergie he saith that Iohan- nes Stafford episcopus Bathoniensis cancellarius, & D. Scrope thesaurarius regni, necnon Wilhelmus Lindwood, custos priuati sigilli, pro rege subsidium postularunt, & mediam decimam tandem aegrè impetrarunt.

Rafe lord Cromwell.

Rafe lord Cromwell, the son of Rafe Cromwell lord of Tatershall, possessed the place of the lord treasurorship of England, in Easter terme in the twelfe yeare of the after deposed K. Henrie the first, being the yeare of Christ 1434, and so continued in that office about ten years, falling (as I suppose) in the yeare of our redemption 1444. This man being knight was created lord Cromwell by the said king Henrie the first, and was lineallie descended of one of the heires of Robert lord Tatershall, that married one of the daughters and heires of William Dalbinie earle of Arundell. This Rafe lord treasuror died without issue, and made his testament in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fiftie and foure, being in the three and thirtith yere of king Henrie the first, after whose death the inheritance came to the three aunts being his heirs, whereof the first was married to the lord Bardolfe slaine at Bramcehome more in Northumberland, the second was married to sir William Fitzwilliams knight of the sepulchre, the third Elisabeth to sir John Clifton knight, & after his death to sir Edmund Benested knight. Of one Rafe lord Cromwell I find this note set downe by Leland. Dominus Radulphus Cromewell & Matildis vxor eius fundatores collegij sanctæ trinitatis de Tatershall, quúmque Roberti ordine domini erant de Tatershall, hos sequutus est Radulphus Cromewell.

Sir Rafe Butler lord Sudleie.

Sir Rafe Butler knight of the garter, lord Sudleie (descended from John lord Sudleie, and William Butler baron of Wem, which maried Jone daughter and heire to John Sudleie lord Sudleie) did possesse the honorable place of the lord treasurorship of England the seuenth of Julie, in the two and twentith yere of king Henrie the first, being the yere of our redemption one thousand foure hundred fortie and foure, which office he kept about three yeres; for in the fiue and twentith yeare of the said king, was the bishop of Carleill lord treasuror. This Rafe lord Sudleie builded the castell of Sudleie, in the time of king Henrie the first, and of Edward the fourth; who in the time of the said Edward the fourth was committed to prison by the king, first sending for him to come to his presence. Whereupon he going to the king, and resting on an hill, from whense he did behold Sudleie castell, said: It is thou, it is thou Sudleie castell and not I which am the traitor. After which comming to king Edward the fourth, he resigned the said Sudleie castell into the kings hands. Which castell came after to Jasper duke of Bedford, and is now in the yeare 1585 in the possession of Giles a Bridges lord Shandois. This Rafe being made baron in the twentith yeare of Henrie the first, maried Elisabeth the daughter of sir John Northberie, by whome he had issue Thomas his son that died without issue, leauing his two sisters to be his heires; wherof the eldest daughter called Elisabeth, was maried to sir John Northberie, whose heire generall was maried to John Halwell of Deuonshire, who had issue Jone his daughter and heire married to Edward lord Braie, of whome the lord Cobham now liuing is descended. The other sister married to sir Hamond Belknap, of whome is descended the worthie gentleman Thomas Wotton of Bacton Maleherbe in Kent esquire now liuing. The which Rafe lord Butler of Sudleie was Vexillifer, and high Butler of England, and steward in house to king Henrie the first.

Marmaduke bishop of Carleill.

Marmaduke bishop of Carleill was made lord treasuror of England in the fiue and twentith yeare of king Henrie the first, in which office he continued about two yeares, in the seuen and twentith yere of king Henrie the first, being about the yeare of our redemption 1448, or (as some haue) 1449.

James Fines lord Dale and Sele.

James Fines created at Burie baron of Dale and of Sele, on the third of March, in the fiue and twentith yeare of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of our redemption, according to the English account 1446, was constable of Douer castell, and lord treasuror of England in the eight and twentith yeare of the said king Henrie the first, and was from thense remoued (as some haue) in the nine & twentith yere of the said king, & was by the rebels of Kent Jacke Cade and his felowes taken out of the tower to the Guildhall, where he was areigned before the maior and other the kings Justices; who desiring to be tried by his péeres, was by the rebels forceablie taken from the officers, and beheaded at the standard in Cheape. The maner whereof shall be more fullie set downe hereafter in my large booke of the liues of the lord treasurors. Which his beheading some do attribute to the eight and twentith yere of the said Henrie the first, being the yeare of our redemption 1450. He had issue sir William Fines knight, and one daughter maried to sir William Cromer knight, shiriffe of Kent, beheaded at that time also with his father inlaw. Of which Cromer is James Cromer of Kent now liuing descended.

John lord Beauchampe.

John Lord Beauchampe, a person of great worthinesse, possessed the place of the treasurorship of England, the nine and twentith and thirtith yeares of king Henrie the first.

John Tiptoft.

John Tiptoft earle of Worcester possessed the place of the lord treasuror, in the one and thirtith and two and thirtith of king Henrie the first. Of whome is more mention made hereafter.

James Butler earle of Wiltshire.

James Butler, the sonne of James earle of Ormond, being earle of Wiltshire and Ormond, possessed the office of the lord treasuror of England in Easter tearme the three and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the first, falling in the yeare of our redemption 1455. Of whom is more spoken hereafter.

Henrie vicount Bourchier.

Henrie vicount Bourchier, borne of the noble house of the Bourchiers, the sonne of William Bourchier earle of Ewe in Normandie, was lord treasuror of England in the three and thirtith yeare of the reigne of the deposed king Henrie the first, in which office he did not long remaine.

John Talbot earle of Shrewsburie.

John Talbot earle of Shrewsburie, the sonne of John Talbot, the first earle of Shrewsburie of that name, possessed the place of the treasurorship of England in the fiue and thirtith and six and thirtith yeres of king Henrie the first, and then gaue place to the earle of Wiltshire. This earle was slaine at the battell of Northampton, in the eight and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of our saluation 1460. He maried Elisabeth the daughter of James Butler erle of Ormond, and had issue, John erle of Shrewesburie, James, Gilbert, Christopher, and George; Anne maried to sir Henrie Vernon, and Margaret: this man was buried in the priorie of Worksop.

James earle of Wiltshire.

James Butler, sonne to James the fourth of that name earle of Ormond, was the second time made lord treasuror of England, about the 37 yere of king Henrie the first, in which office he continued (as I suppose) in the eight & thirtith yeare of the said king. This man in the said eight and thirtith yeare of the king conueied himselfe awaie out of England into Dutchland (for feare of the nobilitie, as the duke of Yorke and others that rebelled against the king) sending backe his souldiers into England, which he had before assembled vpon the sea: but after he returned into England, and was againe put to flight at Mortimers crosse by Edward earle of March after king

by

by the name of king Edward the fourth. He was made earle of Ormond in the nine and thirtith yeare and last yeare of king Henrie the first. He married Eleanor the daughter of Edmund duke of Summerset, and died without issue, being beheaded at Newcastell in the yeare one thousand foure hundred sixtie one, in the first yeare of Edward the fourth.

Henrie viscount Bourchier.

Henrie viscount Bourchier was lord treasuror of England the second time, in the nine and thirtith and last yeare of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred & sixtie. Who vpon the deposition of the said king Henrie the first by Edward the fourth, was also removed from his office.

Thomas lord Bourchier.

Thomas Bourchier, made lord treasuror of England in the first yeare of the reigne of king Edward the fourth, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred sixtie and one, continued not long in that office, but gaue place to John earle of Worcester.

John earle of Worcester.

John Tiptoft earle of Worcester, the second time possessed the place of the lord treasuror of England, in the second and third yeare of king Edward the fourth. Of whom is more spoken before by me in my treatise of the conestables of England pag. 869.

Edmund lord Greie of Ruthine after earle of Kent.

Edmund lord Greie of Ruthine, the sonne of John lord Greie of Ruthine, did inioy the office of the lord treasuror ship of England, in the fourth yeare of the noble prince king Edward the fourth, being the yere of our redemption 1464. This man secretlie in hart forsaking the part of king Henrie the first, for iniuries received at the same king Henries hands, aided the said Edward the fourth, and was the chiefe means whereby he attained the crowne. In Michaelmas tearme in the said fourth yeare of the king, there was a sergeants feast held in Holborne in the bishop of Elies house, to which the maior and aldermen repaired, being bidden thither. But when the maior looked to be set to kéepe the state in the hall (forgetting that he was out of his owne liberties, for the bishops palace was an exempt place) as it had béene vsed (saith Iohn Stow) in all places of the citie & liberties of the same, out of the kings presence: the lord Greie of Ruthine then treasuror of England vnknowne to the sergeants, and (against their wils as they said) was placed in the highest rome. Whereupon the maior, aldermen, and commons departed. This Edmund doth Matthew Parker, in the life of Thomas Bourchier archbishop of Canturburie, make to be treasuror in the third yeare of Edward the fourth, being the yeare of Christ 1463: which may well inough stand with the former, being treasuror to John earle of Worcester in the said third yeare of the king. For vpon the removing of the said earle in the third yeare of Edward the fourth, came this lord Greie in place. The words of which Matthew Parker (with a note of the yeare of Christ 1463 in the margent) are in this order: Edwardus rex, duobus iam annis fœliciter gesto regno, parliamentum Westmonasterij tenuit, quo etiã tempore archiepiscopus (which was Thomas Bourchier the brother of Henrie Bourchier earle of Eller) & clerus in synodo conuenerunt. In hac synodo Iohannes comes Wigorniæ, Henricus comes Essexiæ, D. Edmundus Grey thesaurarius Angliæ, D. Humfridus Cromewell, D. Wenlocke, D. Iohannes prior sancti Iohannis, & Robertus Stillington legum doctor iustos priuati sigilli, regni conciliarij, allatis literis regijs petierunt a clero decerni regi ad Scotos repellendos subsidium. Quod quidem gratissimis omnium animis tam munifico regi concessum est: qui superiori anno ecclesiæ immunitates atque iura iniquis iudiciorum calumnijs (vti in Iohanne Stafford antea diximus) conuulsa & labefactata diplomate regio restaurauit.

Besides which, thus writeth Iohn Whethamsted, that learned abbat of saint Albons, of this lord Greie; declaring in what authoritie he was at first, in the daies of Henrie the first, and then in the reigne of Edward the fourth. His words be these. Anno 36 H. 6. venerunt tres viri monachi de cœnobio Cluniacensi, quibus ad audiendum eorũ nuntium missi sunt episcopus Dunelmensis custos priuati sigilli, dominus Edmundus Greie de Ruthine, & secretarius regis, quibus isti viri dixerunt eorum aduentum esse ob tria. Primò ad aperiendum quomodo reges Angliæ & præcipuè Henricus secundus fuerunt tam magni benefactores ad eorum ecclesiam, vt potius pro nunc dicatur earum patronus ac præcipuus fundator. Secundò venerunt ad petendum possessionem & confirmationem bonorum illorum, quæ dicti progenitores eis contulerant, & per tempus non paucum iamdudum à manibus eorum detenta & distracta erant. Tertiò ad impetrandum liberum licentiam ad ingrediendum singula loca religiosa ab eorum cœnobio dependentia, & quæ per nobiles progenitores regis posita fuerũt sub eorum regimine. Sed nihil hic eis gratũ fuit actum, ita vt tristes discederent. Out of the which words of Whethamsted maie other things be gathered, besides the doings of the lord Greie: as that the kings of England, and spectallie Henrie the second, haue bene great benefactors and founders of the Charterhouse monks: with manie mo matters conteined in the same, which I referre to the wise and learned reader, which made me the willinger to set downe his words so largelie.

Moreover, the same Whethamsted, continuing the historie of Henrie the first, writeth of the battell of Northampton, wherin was this lord Greie, in this sort. In prælio Northamptonensi Edmundus Grey dominus Ruthine corpore licèt præsens (euen as the lord Stanleie was in the battell fought betwixt Richard the third & Henrie erle of Richmond, after king by the name of Henrie the seuenth) in campo domini regis Henrici sexti steterat, cor tamen eius non erat rectum in eo, nèq; omnino fidelis habitus aut inuentus fuit. Nam venientibus turmis dictis ad fossam circumuallationis, & ipsam nõ multum promptè propter eleuationem vertiçis in parte vlteriore ascendere valentibus, occurrit ipsis dominus cum suis copijs obuiam, porrigendoq; ipsis dextram traxit eos per manus in campum Martium, iuxta votum suum. Thus much Whethamsted of Edmund Greie lord Ruthine, who was made earle of Kent in the fift yeare of king Edward the fourth, being the yeare of our redemption 1464.

This Edmund Greie being lord Hastings, Wellsford, and Ruthine (before he had the honour of this earledome) did by his deed of indenture dated the 18 of November, in the fiue and twentith yeare of king Henrie the first, falling in the yeare of our redemption 1446, giue to John Pinchbecke prior of Duffield in Northamptonshire in almesse, during the life of the said prior, his field called Challocke, belonging to the manour of Challocke, to kéepe the obits of sir John Greie, father to the said sir Edmund, and of dame Cullance the widow of the earle marshall, and daughter of John Holland duke of Exceter and erle of Huntington, mother to the said sir Edmund, with masse, &c. and such other collects as the said Edmund should deuise vnto the said prior. Out of this house of the Greies haue issued manie noble houses, and those of great antiquitie, whereof at this daie there yet remaineth two honourable houses: the one being Henrie Greie earle of Kent now liuing, a man of singular estimation in the countrie of Bedford where he now liueth, as well for the nobilitie of his race, being descended of this Edmund Greie lord treasuror of England, for the good gouernment and carriage of himselfe, and for the orderlie and wise managing of the affaires of that countrie, deserning no lesse honourable place in the commonwealth, than the honour of his race, and worthinesse of his behauiour do well merit.

The lord Greie of Wilton.

The other house at this daie in honour, is the lord Greie of Wilton knight of the garter, and sometime deputie of Ireland, a man of no lesse merit for his seruice abrode in the feats of armes, than is the other Greie for his seruice at home in the affairs of peace. But I will not saie all that I thinke and know of them both, least some more malicioullie than trulie blemish me with the note of flatterie. For I protest I am so farre estranged from that, as I being not at all knowne to the one, and but slenderlie to the other, and neuer benefited by anie of them both, there is no cause why I should vse anie flatterie: and yet such force hath vertue, as it will shine euen in despite of malice. But againe to the matter. There haue out of this house of the Greies, besides manie noble houses, issued one duke of Suffolke, two marquesses of Dorset, and fiue earles of Kent.

The seuerall houses of the Greies.

Againe I thinke it not impertinent for the continuance of antiquities, and of deserts of honour, to mention how manie seuerall houses there haue bin of the nobilitie of these Greis, and in what time they liued. First there was Reignold Greie lord Greie of Codnor, in the time of king Stephan: the second was Reignold lord Greie of Rotherfield, in the time of Richard the second: the third John Greie earle of Tankeruile in Normandie, in the time of Henrie the fift: the fourth this Edmund Greie lord Ruthine earle of Kent, and treasuror of England in the time of king Edward the fourth: the fift house Thomas Greie marquesse Dorset, in the time of king Edward the fourth: the first Edward Greie lord Lisle in the time of king Edward the fourth: the seuenth Edward Greie lord Powes, in the time of king Edward the fourth: the eight Henrie Greie duke of Suffolke, in the time of Edward the first. So that there were at one time, in one kings daies, which was the time of Edward the fourth, six noble men liuing of the name of Greies, which were the marquesse Dorset, the earle of Kent, the lord Lisle, the lord Powes, the lord Greie of Wilton, and the lord Greie of Rotherfield.

Wherefore to draw to an end of this lord treasuror, who hath occasioned me to be more liberall in treating of him and the Greies, than of any lord treasuror or noble name besides (for manie priuat reasons which I reserue to my selfe) I will yet speake more liberallie of him and the Greies in my large booke of the liues of the lord treasurors of England, and knit vp this Edmund Greie lord treasuror with the marieng of his wife Katharine, the daughter of Henrie Persie earle of Northumberland, by whome he had issue George Greie earle of Kent; Elisabeth, maried to Robert baron of Greistocke; and Anne maried to John lord Greie of Wilton.

Sir Walter Blunt knight

Sir Walter Blunt knight, who was the first lord Montioie, possessed the place of the lord treasurorship of England, in the fift yeare of king Edward the fourth, which fell in the yeare that the word of the father toke flesh in the wombe of the virgine 1465. Of this man is mention made in the booke of the law called Long Quinto of Edward the fourth. He maried the daughter of one Dirham, and had issue, William, John, and James.

Sir Richard Woduile.

Sir Richard Woduile knight, chamberleine to the king, and constable of England, was made baron on the ninth of Maie in the second yeare of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of Christ 1424, and was after created earle Riuers in the fift yeare of king Edward the fourth, being the yeare of our redemption 1465, who thus aduanced was after lord treasuror in the first, seuenth, & eight of Edward the fourth. In which eight yeare of Edward the fourth, Thomas Cooke late maior of London, was accused of treason and arreigned for the same. Who after that he had beene manie times purged thereof, was yet at last found giltie, and by this lord Riuers then lord treasuror so handled, as that he could not be deliuered vntill he had paied eight thousand pounds to the king, and eight hundred to the queene. This lord treasuror maried Iaquet the widow of John duke of Bedford, daughter to Peter of Lucenburgh earle of S. Paule, by whom he had issue Richard earle Riuers, Antonie lord Scales in the right of his wife, Edward Woduile knight slaine at the battell of S. Albine in Britaine in the third yeare of Henrie the seuenth: Lionell bishop of Salisburie, Margaret maried to Thomas erle of Arundell, Margaret maried to William Herbert erle of Huntington, Anne first maried to William Bucher erle of Esser and after to George Greie erle of Kent; Iaquet maried to John lord Strange, Elisabeth maried to sir John Greie yonger sonne to the lord Greie of Ruthine, and after the death of the said sir John Greie to king Edward the fourth: and Katharine maried to Henrie duke of Buckingham. Besides all which I haue read of one John, which was sonne to this earle Riuers, which John maried the old duchesse of Norfolke, & was beheaded with his father: the truth whereof I leaue to further triall. This Richard erle Riuers the lord treasuror in the ninth yeare of king Edward the fourth, being the yeare of our redemption 1469, was by Robert Hiltard, who named himselfe Robert of Ridesdale, taken in the forrest of Dene as some haue, others saie at Grafton, and from thence brought to Northampton, where he was beheaded.

John Longstrother

John Longstrother, prior of saint Johns Jerusalem in England, possessed the place of the lord treasuror of the realme, in the ninth yeare of king Edward the fourth, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred and nine, for in the same yeare he gaue place to the bishop of Elie.

William Bu bishop of El

William Greie bishop of Elie, was after the translation of Thomas Burcher from Eke to Canturburie, aduanced to that see by Nicholas the fift then bishop of Rome, who gaue it to the said William being then procurator for king Henrie the first at Rome, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred fiftie and foure. This man was lord treasuror in the ninth yeare of king Edward the fourth, being the yeare in which God became man one thousand foure hundred three score and nine, in which office he continued (as I gather) vntill the eleuenth of king Edward the fourth, or thereabouts. This Greie was borne of the noble house of the lord Greies of Codnor, as saith Bale, and trauelled into Italie to atteine great learning, where he heard the noble clerke Guarinus Veronensis read in Ferraria. He continued bishop of Elie foure and twentie yeares, eleuen moneths and two daies, departing this life at Dunham the fourth of August, in the yere that the word of the father toke flesh in the wombe of the virgine, one thousand foure hundred seuentie and eight, as I haue red; and was buried at Elie betweene two marble pillers, hauing bestowed great summes of monie vpon the reparation of that famous belfrie of the church of Elie, and vpon other ornaments of the same church.

Henrie Bu cher.

Henrie Bourcher erle of Esser did the third time possesse the honorable place of the lord treasuror of England, in the eleuenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the fourth, in which office he continued (as I gather) about twelue yeares, being all the rest of the life of the said Edward the fourth, who departed this world about the ninth daie of Aprill, in the yeare from the conception of the Messiah one thousand foure foure hundred foure score and three, which Bourchier being made earle of Eller in the first yeare of king Edward the fourth, in the yeare of Christ 1461, maried Elisabeth the daughter of Richard de Conisburgh earle of Cambridge the sister of Richard duke of Yorke, by whome he had issue William lord Bourchier, Thomas, John, Henrie, and Humfreie knights.

Sir Richard Wood.

Sir Richard Wood knight, whome some call sir John Wood, being before vnder treasurer in the three and twentith yeare of king Edward the fourth, was in the same yeare of the same king made knight, about a moneth before the death of the said king Edward the fourth. This man did possesse the place of the lord treasurer of England (as I gather out of the record of Pellis exitus of that yeare) in the second yeare of the reigne of the vnnaturall, bloudie, and vsurping tyrant king Richard the third, being the yeare of our redemption 1484, which office I suppose that he kept, vntill the said Richard the third was slaine by Henrie earle of Richmond afterwards king of England, by the name of Henrie the 7. And here I thinke it not amisse before I go anie further (although it be somewhat out of order, sith it is best to obserue Decorum, and vnorderlie to treat of vnorderlie officers vnder such an vnorderlie king as Richard the third was) to make report of sir William Hopton knight, whome some will haue to be treasurer in the first yeare of the reigne of the same king, in the yeare of Christ 1483, attending on him to his coronation. But trulie, sauing the correction of better séene antiquaries than my selfe, I can not as yet receiue him into the catalog of the lord treasurers of England, but rather suppose that he was treasurer of the houshold.

Sir William Hopton.

Sir Reinold Bzaie knight.

Sir Reinold Bzaie knight (the sonne of Richard Bzaie physician as some haue noted to king Henrie the first) being seruant to Margaret countesse of Richmond mother to Henrie the seuenth, was for the fidelitie to his ladie, & good seruice in furthering king Henrie the seuenth to the crowne, received into great fauour with the said king, and made lord treasurer of England, as appeareth by the record of Pellis exitus made vnder his name in the first yeare of the reigne of Henrie the seuenth, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand, foure hundred, eightie, and fiue: besides which office he had manie other offices and honours, part whereof were, that he was treasurer of the kings wars, that he was one of the executors to K. Henrie the seuenth, that he was made knight of the Bath at the coronation of the said king, and created a banneret at Blacke heath field. He died the eightéenth yeare of the Salomon of England king Henrie the seuenth, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred & three, and was honorablie buried at Windsore.

Sir John Dinham knight.

Sir John Dinham knight (the sonne of sir John Dinham knight) a faithfull seruant to the house of Yorke aswell in aiding the duke of Yorke, as in seruing king Edward the fourth sonne to the said duke of Yorke; to whom the said Edward the fourth, in the second yeare of his reigne had giuen one annuitie of fortie pounds by yeare, did after the death of the said king Edward the fourth, in the second yeare of king Henrie the seuenth, possesse the place of the lord treasurer of England, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred foure score and six, and so continued vntill in the sixtéenth yéere of king Henrie the seuenth, and then gaue place to Thomas earle of Surreie, of which lord Dinham thus writeth Leland: Diminus Denham primus fuit fundator sancti Nicholai alias Hortland. He was created lord Dinham in the first yeare of king Edward the fourth, shortlie after the coronation of the said king, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred three score and one, he died in the sixtenth yeare of king Henrie the seuenth, being the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred, and the thirtith of Januarie was brought to the Greie friers in London; there buried: he maried Elisabeth the daughter of the lord Fitzwater, by whom he had issue George and Philip, and sir Thomas Dinham his base sonne that maried one of the daughters and heires of sir John Dymond, which Thomas was buried at Alhzug three miles from Berkhamsted. Besides which children this lord Dinham or Denham, for so I find both written in chronicles, had by his legitimat wife diuerse daughters, which were Margaret maried to Nicholas baron of Carew, Joane maried to the lord Touch, Elisabeth maried to the lord Fitz Warren, and Katharine maried to sir Thomas Arundell of Cornewall knight.

Here I thinke it not amisse to saie somewhat of a note which I haue séene, that maketh John Touchet lord Audleie treasurer, which note is this. John Touchet lord Audleie treasurer of England, died the six and twentith date of December, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred foure score and ten, falling in the first yeare of king Henrie the seuenth, and had issue James lord Audelie beheaded the eight and twentith of June, in the yeare of Christ 1497, being the twelfe yeare of king Henrie the seuenth, he maried the daughter of sir Richard Dauell knight: thus much the note. But trulie for anie thing I can yet learne, I can not perceiue when this John Touchet should be treasurer, and so cannot perceiue where he should be placed in this catalog of the treasurers of England. But as I will not receiue him into anie place of this succession at this time; so I will not altogither reiect him, in hope that following time will informe me of the truth therein.

Thomas Howard erle of Surreie.

Thomas Howard the sonne of John lord Howard (created the first duke of Norffolke of that name in the time of Richard the third) was at the same time also created earle of Surreie. This man (after the slaughter of his father at Bosworth field, when the tyrant Richard the third was slaine by Henrie the seuenth) was after receiued into such fauour with the said king Henrie the seuenth, that he was aduanced to be lord treasurer of England, in the sixtenth yeare of king Henrie the seuenth, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred, which place he continued all the life of the said king Henrie the seuenth, who died in the foure and twentith yeare of his reigne, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred and nine. After which for the good seruice he vsed in the time of Henrie the seuenth, king Henrie the eight also permitted him to keepe that office, which he possessed vntill the fiftéenth yeare of king Henrie the eight, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred twentie and three.

This man was created duke of Norffolke on Candelmasse daie, in the fift yeare of king Henrie the eight, being the yeere of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred and thirtéene, at what time also his son Thomas Howard was made earle of Surreie. This duke was aduanced to that honour (in recompense of the death of the king of Scots, and for the good seruice that he did against that nation in the said fift yeare of Henrie the eight) with an augmentation of his armes, to beare the armes of Scotland in the bend of the arms of Howard. Touching which victorie and death of the king of Scots Buchanan lib. 13. writeth to this effect, that the said Thomas Howard (as a note of the conquest) gaue to his seruants his cognisance (to weare on their left arme) being a white lion (the beast which he bare before as the proper ensigne of that house) standing ouer a red lion (the peculiar note of the kingdome of Scotland) and tearing the same red lion with his pawes. This Thomas duke of Norffolke maried two wiues; his first wife was Elisabeth the daughter of sir Frederike Tilneie knight, by whom he had issue Thomas erle of Surreie after duke of Norffolke, Edward slaine at Bret admerall of England, & Edmund Howard, with Elisabeth maried to Thomas Bullene earle of Wilshire, and Muriell married to John Greie viscount Lisle. His second wife was Agnes daughter of sir Philip Tilneie knight, by whome he had issue William lord Howard of Effingham, with manie others. This Thomas duke of Norffolke died in the fiftéenth yeare of king Henrie the eight, in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred fortie and foure, and was buried at Thetford in Norffolke.

Thomas Howard.

Thomas Howard (sonne to the said Thomas duke of Norffolke) being earle of Surreie, possessed the place of the lord treasuror in the fiftéenth yeare of king Henrie the eight, being the yeare that Christ toke flesh of the virgine Marie one thousand fiue hundred twentie and three: the which office he continued in the eight and thirtith yeare of the said king, being the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred fortie and six; in which yeare on the eight and twentith of Januarie, the said king Henrie died (so that this duke and his father were lord treasurors of England almost eight and fortie yeares.) But about some few daies more than a moneth before the death of the said king, that is to saie, on the twelfe of December, this duke with his sonne Henrie earle of Surreie were committed to the tower, the one by water the other by land. Shortlie after which the said Henrie was beheaded at tower hill, the ninetœnth daie of Januarie: about nine daies before the death of the king. And the duke remained as condemned to perpetuall prison, till the beginning of the reigne of quœne Marie, who then set him at libertie. He married for his first wife Anne the daughter of king Edward the fourth, but had no issue by hir: after whose death he married Elisabeth daughter to Edward duke of Buckingham, by whome he had issue, Henrie earle of Surreie beheaded as before, Thomas vicount Bindon, and Marie married to Henrie Fitzroie duke of Richmont. He died about the beginning of the reigne of quœne Marie.

Edward Seimor.

Edward Seimor earle of Hertford was after the death of king Henrie the eight made lord treasuror of England, in the first yeare of king Edward the first: being the yeare of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred fortie & six, in which yeare he was also made protector of England and duke of Summerset: of whom thus writeth Matthew Parker, calling him Regni camerarium, in the life of Thomas Cranmer archbishop of Canturburie in these words page 397. In testamento (meaning king Henrie the eight) Edwardo principi minori nouem annis nato hæredi suo sexdecim tutores, ex episcopis solos Thomam Cranmerum Cantuariensem archiepiscopum & Cutbertum Tonstallum Dunelmensem episcopum dedit. And a little after pag. 398. followeth: Verum pluribus (vt diximus) ei minori (that was king Edward) a patre constitutis curatoribus, ne numero suo atque multitudine ad dissentiones faciles essent & proclines vnus electus est, qui ex consilijs reliquorum impuberis regis tutelam solus administraret. Is fuit Edwardus Seimerus comes Hertfordiensis, totius regni camerarius regisque auunculus. Qui suscepta tutela regis, totius regni atque dominiorum suorum protector & Somerseti dux nuncupatus atque creatus est. This duke of Summerset being treasuror of England continued in the same office vntill his death (as I gather) more than foure years, and was beheaded in the fift yeare of king Edward the first, being the yeare of our Lord, one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and one.

Sir William Paulet.

Sir William Paulet knight, marquesse of Winchester was made lord treasuror vpon the death of the duke of Summerset: in the fift yeare of king Edward the first, and the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and one, which office he kept by the space of twentie yeares and more: a longer time than euer anie other treasuror had done before, except the two last dukes of Norffolke. This man being a man of extreme age (as atteining to the yeares of ninetie seuen) died lord treasuror of England (the tenth of March, in the yeare of our saluation one thousand fiue hundred seuentie and one, being the fourteenth yeare of the reigne of the famous quœne Elisabeth) at his manor of Basing. He in his life time did see the children of his children children growne to the number of one hundred and three, a rare blessing of God to men of his calling. He married Elisabeth the daughter of sir William Capell knight, by whome he had issue John marquesse of Winchester, Thomas, Chidiocke, and Giles; Alice married to Richard Stowell, Margaret married to sir William Berkeleie, Margerie married to Richard Waller, and Eleanor married to sir Richard Peckshall.

Sir William Cecill.

Sir William Cecill knight of the garter and lord Burghleie, was aduanced to the honorable place of lord treasuror of England on the thirtéenth daie of Julie, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand, fiue hundred, seauentie and two, being the fourtéenth yeare of the reigne of our gratious quœne Elisabeth. This man was descended of the honorable familie of the Sitsylts of Wales, sometime lords of Beaupor in the daies of Henrie the first, as appeareth by this pedegrée here inserted.

Robert Sitsylt.

1 In the yeare of Christ one thousand ninetie and one, Robert Sitsylt came with Robert Fitzhamon to the conquest of the countrie of Glamorgan, and after wedded a ladie, by whom he had Halterennes and other lands in Hereford and Glocestershires: he had a sonne called James Sitsylt.

James Sitsylt.

2 James Sitsylt toke part with Pawd the empresse against king Stephan, and was slaine at the siege of the castell of Wallingford Anno quarto Stephani, hauing then vpon him a vesture, whereon was wrought in needle worke his armes or ensignes, as they be made on the tome of Gerald Sitsylt in the abbeie of Doze, which are afterward trulie blazed, in a iudgement giuen by commission of king Edward the third, for the ancient right of the same armes. This James had a sonne called John Sitsylt, and foure daughters.

John Sitsylt.

3 John Sitsylt, the sonne of James, was after the death of his father, in the same warres with Roger earle of Hereford, and constable of England, and being taken prisoner at the siege of Lincolne, Anno. 6. Stephani, he paid for his ransome foure hundred marks, and therefore sold his lordship of Beaupor, and all his lands in the countie of Glocester: he toke to wife a ladie called Pawd de Frenes and had issue Eustace.

Eustace Sitsylt.

4 Eustace Sitsylt the son of John was wedded to Elianor the daughter of sir Walter Pembridge knight, and had by hir Baldwin and John; and foure daughters, whereof one of them was the wife of sir Thomas Fitzneale knight.

Baldwin Sitsylt.

5 Baldwin Sitsylt the sonne of Eustace, was made knight by king Henrie the second, in the warres that the king had against the Welchmen, he was also killed in the same warres, at the siege of the castell of Cardiffe, his father being aliue; he toke to wife the daughter of Maurice de Bromptton, and had by hir Gerald Sitsylt, Eustace Sitsylt, Henrie Henrie Sitsylt, John Sitsylt, and Walter Sitsylt; and two daughters, Catharine and Elianor. Catharine was the wife of Hugh Wuredake, and Elianor was the wife of Walter Wallis. This Baldwin Sitsylt knight toke to his second wife, Margerie the daughter of Stephan Radnor knight, and had by hir, Stephan Sitsylt, Roger Sitsylt, Hugh Sitsylt, and Dauid Sitsylt; and three daughters, the first was Dawd and she was a Nun, the second was Jone and she was the wife of John de Solers, the third daughter Anne was the wife of Owen ap Meredith. This man gaue certeine lands in the townelhip of Rigestone, vnto the monks of Dore, and granted vnto the same monks fréedome of common and pasture, and other liberties in his woods.

Gerald Sitsylt.

6 Gerald Sitsylt, the first sonne of Baldwin Sitsylt knight, toke to wife Mabill the daughter of Sir William Moigne knight, and had by hir three sonnes, Gerald Sitsylt that died a child, Robert Sitsylt that married and had children, and Owen Sitsylt a monke of the abbeie of Dore. He had also three daughters, Catharine, that was wedded to sir Griffin ap Rosefod, and after to Dauid ap Euan, and the third time to Geffreie de Bret, sonne of sir Walter Bret knight. Anne the second daughter of Gerald Sitsylt was wedded to Robert the sonne of Richard Bromewich. And Ellen the third daughter of Gerald Sitsylt, was the wife of John Abrahall, father of sir John Abrahall knight.

Robert Sitsylt.

7 Robert Sitsylt, the sonne of Gerald toke to wife Alicia daughter of sir Robert Tregois knight, and had by hir James Sitsylt his first sonne, Gerald the second sonne, Thomas the third sonne, and Baldwin the fourth sonne; and Margaret the first daughter, and Elisabeth the second daughter.

James Sitsylt.

8 James Sitsylt the sonne of Robert, toke to wife Isabell the daughter of sir John Knell knight, and had by hir James and Gerald twins; James died yong: he had also Robert Sitsylt, and John Sitsylt; and fiue daughters, that is to saie, Alicia wedded to Walter Monington, Grace wedded to Roger sonne of William Blunt, Elianor wedded to Thomas Paine, Margerie wedded to Morgan ap Meredith, and Sibie married to Howell ap Blethin, and after to sir Hugh Bruge.

Gerald Sitsylt.

9 Gerald Sitsylt, sonne of James, toke to wife Margaret, daughter of Stephan Dalaber, and by hir had John Sitsylt; and after he wedded Bridget the widow of sir Simon Ward knight, and had by hir James Sitsylt, and the third time married the daughter of Martine Hopton, and had by hir Martine Sitsylt, Henrie Sitsylt, and Dauid Sitsylt, and Jone a daughter. And the fourth time the same Gerald Sitsylt toke to wife Jane the daughter of Robert Emerton, and had by hir one sonne named Stigand Sitsylt, that was slaine in the warres of Striuelin in the time of king Edward the second, and had no issue, as the register of the abbie of Dore maketh mention.

Chron. de Dor. John Sitsylt.

10 John Sitsylt, the sonne of Gerald, toke to wife Sibill the daughter of Robert of Ewyas, and had by hir sir John Sitsylt knight, George Sitsylt, and a daughter named Margaret, that was the wife of sir Robert Baskeruile knight, who had by hir sir John Baskeruile knight; and by his second wife he had sir Richard Baskeruile knight, that toke to wife Jane the daughter and heire of George Sitsylt second sonne of this John Sitsylt, and had by hir sir John Baskeruile knight.

Sir John Sitsylt.

11 Sir John Sitsylt knight, toke to wife Alicia, the sister of the said sir Roger Baskeruile, and sir Roger married his sister, as is afore said. This sir John Sitsylt had John Sitsylt and Roger Sitsylt.

✻ In the time of the warres that king Edward the third made against Scotland, at a place called Halidon hill nére Barwike anno 6. of Edward the third, there arose a great variance and contention betweene sir William de Facknaham knight, on the one side appellant, & this sir John Sitsylt knight, on the other side defendant, for an ensigne of armes, that is to saie; The field of ten barrets siluer and azure, supported of fiue scutcheons sable charged with so manie lions of the first rampants incensed geuls, which ensigne both the parties did claime as their right. But as both parties put themselues to their force to mainteine their quarrell, and vaunted to mainteine the same by their bodies; it pleased the king that iustice should be yelded for triall of the quarrell, without shedding of bloud: and so the bearing of the ensigne was solemnelie adiudged to be the right of the said sir John Sitsylt, as heire of blod lineallie descended of the bodie of Iames Sitsylt, lord of Beaupart slaine at the siege of Wallingford, as before is declared. The finall order and determination of which controuersie is laid downe by John Boswell gentleman, in his booke intituled The concords of Armorie, fol. 80. This sir John Sitsylt had a charge of men at arms, for the custodie of the marches to Scotland, in the eleuenth yeare of king Edward the third. D. Powell.

John Sitsylt.

12 John Sitsylt, the sonne of sir John Sitsylt knight, toke to wife Jone daughter of sir Richard Monington knight, and had by hir John Sitsylt (that died, his father being aliue) and Thomas Sitsylt.

Thomas Sitsylt.

13 Thomas Sitsylt married Margaret the daughter and heire of Gilbert de Winston, and had by hir Philip Sitsylt, and Dauid Sitsylt. This man was a great benefactor to the monks of Dore, and forgaue them great sums of monie which they did owe him.

Philip Sitsylt.

14 Philip Sitsylt married Margaret, the daughter of John Philips, and had by hir Richard, John, and Margaret.

Richard Sitsylt.

15 Richard Sitsylt or Cecill married Margaret the daughter of Philip Vaughan, and had by hir Philip Cecill, Margaret Cecill, John Cecill, Dauid Cecill, and James or Jenkin Cecill.

✻ These pedegrées & descents I gathered faithfullie out of sundrie ancient records and euidences, wherof the most part are confirmed with seales autentike thereunto appendent, manifestlie declaring the antiquitie and truth therof; which remaine at this present in the custodie of the right honourable sir William Cecill, knight of the noble order of the garter, lord Burghleie, and lord high treasuror of England, who is lineallie descended from the last recited Richard Sitsylt, father to Dauid Cecill, grandfather to the said sir William Cecill now lord Burghleie. And at this date William Sitsylt or Cecill esquier cosen german to the said lord Burghleie, remoued by one degrée onelie, is possessed of the foresaid house of Halterennes in Ewyas land as the heire male of the house of Sitsylts, and is descended of Philip Cecill, elder brother to the said Dauid. D. Powell.

This sir William Cecill lord Burghleie, liuing at this instant in the yeare of Christ, one thousand, fiue hundred, eightie and six, to the great support of this commonwealth, doth worthilie inioy the place of the lord treasuror of England, of whome (for auoiding the note of flatterie) I may not saie that good which we the subiects of England do féele by his meanes, and all the world doth sée in his rare and wise gouernment. And therefore leauing what may be said of him for his honorable deserts, from his countrie, his prince, and his countriemen, as well Fr. Thin.

for rare gouernement at home, as for graue managing of the matter of state abroad, I beseech the almightie Lord to lengthen his yeares with perfect health and happie successe of all his good desires, to answer the worth of those his honourable deserts. Thus knitting vp this discourse of the treasurors, with no lesse honorable person of the temporaltie in this our age, than I began the same discourse with a rare person of the spiritualtie in that their age: this being knowne as singular in policie as the other was supposed to be in prelacie, I here set end to that which with much labour of bodie, trauell of mind, and charge of purse, I haue brought to this forme what so euer it be. Thus this much by Francis Thin touching the treasurors of England.]

The earle of Northumberland beheaded.

The 22 of August Thomas Persie earle of Northumberland late of Topclife, who had beene before attainted by parlement of high treason, as one of the principall conspirators in the late rebellion, and now brought out of Scotland, whither he had fled, was beheaded at Yorke about two of the clocke in the afternoone, on a new scaffold set vp for that purpose in the market place. In this moneth of August sir Thomas Smith, one of the quéenes maiesties priuie councell, carefullie tendering the reformation of Ireland, sent his son Thomas Smith esquier thither with a certeine number of Englishmen to inhabit the Ards in Vlster, after the maner of a colonie vsed by the Romans.

Anno Reg. 15

A strange star appeared; the bignesse therof, and of what continuance.

The eightéenth of Nouember in the morning was séene a star northward verie bright and cléere, in the constellation of Cassiopeia, at the backe of hir chaire, which with thrée chéefe fired stars of the said constellation made a geometricall figure lozengwise, of the learned men called Rhombus. This starre in bignes at the first appéering séemed bigger than Iupiter, & not much lesse than Venus when she séemeth greatest. Also the said starre neuer changing his place, was caried about with the dailie motion of heauen, as all fired starres commonlie are, and so continued (by little and little to the eie appearing lesse) for the space of almost sixtéene moneths: at what time it was so small, that rather thought by exercises of oft vewing might imagine the place, than anie eie could iudge the présence of the same. And one thing is herein chéefelie to be noted, that (by the skill and consent of the best and most expert mathematicians, which obserued the state, propertie, and other circumstances belonging to the same starre) it was found to haue béene in place celestiall far aboue the moone, otherwise than euer anie comet hath béene séene, or naturallie can apéere. Therefore it is supposed that the signification therof is directed purposelie and speciallie to some matter, not naturall, but celestiall, or rather superceleſtiall, so strange, as from the beginning of the world neuer was the like.

Earle of Darbie deceased.

The foure and twentith of Nouember Edward earle of Darbie, lord Stanleie, & Strange, of Knocking, lord and gouernor of the Iles of Man, knight of the noble order of the garter, and one of the quéens maiesties priuie councell deceased at his house called Latham in Lancashire. His life and death deseruing commendation, and crauing memorie to be imitated, was such as followeth. His fidelitie vnto two kings and two quéenes in dangerous times and great rebellions, in which time, and alwaies as cause serued, he was lieutenant of Lancashire and Cheshire, and latelie offered ten thousand men vnto the quéenes maiestie of his owne charge for the suppression of the last rebellion. There was neuer gentleman or other that waited in his seruice, but had allowance from him, to haue as well wages as otherwise for horsse and man. His yerlie portion for the expenses of his house foure thousand pounds. His cunning in setting bones dislocated or broken, his surgerie and desire to helpe the poore, his deliuerie of the George and seale to the lord Strange, with exhortation that he might kéepe it so vnspotted in fidelitie to his prince as he had, and his zeale that he died in the quéenes fauour. Great frost and a sharpe winter.

This yéere a great and sharpe frost almost continuallie lasted, from before the feast of All saints, till after the feast of the Epiphanie of our Lord, with sometime great and déepe snowes, and sometime raines, which freésed as fast as the same fell to the ground: whereby through at Wrotham in Kent, and manie other places, the armes and boughs of trées being ouercharged with ise, brake off, and fell from the stockes of the same trées. Also the wind continued north and east, till after the Ascension daie, with sharpe frosts and snowes, whereby followed a late spring.

Lord priuie seale deceased.

The twelfe of Januarie William lord Howard, baron of Effingham, lord priuie seale, knight of the noble order of the garter, and one of the priuie councell deceased at Hampton court.

Earle of Worcester sent into France.

The eightéenth of Januarie William lord Sommerset earle of Worcester began his iourneie towards France, to the christening of the kings daughter there in stead of the quéenes maiestie of England, who sent with him a font of gold for that purpose, weieng thrée hundred and six and twentie ounces.

Earle of Worcester robbed on the sea.

The said earle with manie of his companie were robbed vpon the sea by pirats of much of their baggage, and thrée or foure of their men slaine. In France he and his traine were honorablie receiued. At the christening he gaue the child to name Elisabeth. They returned into England the seauen and twentith of Februarie.

The narrow seas scowred.

In the moneth of Februarie, thorough sundrie heinous complaints brought to the quéenes maiestie and hir councell of pirats that kept the narrow seas, doing manie robberies, as also the robbing of the earle of Worcester (as is aforesaid) hir highnesse, by the aduise of hir honourable councell, tooke order with the lord admerall of England, that he should send to the seas, ships and men to scowre the narow seas, & to apprehend so manie pirats ships as might be met with. And for the better doing thereof, it pleased hir maiestie to send one of hir owne ships, named the Swallow to be the admerall, vnder the charge of William Holstocke of London esquier, comptrollor of hir highnesse ships, who had with him the Gillian, the barke Garet, and the barke of Yarmouth, and thrée hundred and thrée score able marriners, gunners, and souldiors in the said thrée ships, and one barke which scowred the narrow seas, from the north foreland, as farre westward as Falmouth in Cornewall, and tooke twentie ships and barks of sundrie sundrie nations, to wit, English, French, and Flemings (but all pirats) and in fashion of warre. He apprehended in those ships and barks to the number of nine hundred men of all nations, and sent them toward to Sandwich, Douer, Wight, and Portesmouth (whereof three of them that robbed the earle of Worcester were shortlie after executed at Wight.) Also the said William Holstocke did rescue and take from the aboue said pirats ships, fifteene other merchants ships laden with merchandize, that were their prises, being of sundrie nations, and set at libertie the said fifteene merchants ships and goods: which done, he returned to Portesmouth, and there ended his voiage in March.

The fourth of March, a man was hanged in chains in saint Georges field beyond Southworke of London, for murthering the gailor of Horsham in the same field. The seuentéenth of March deceassed Reinold Greie of Ruthin, earle of Kent, at Herneseie, and was buried at saint Giles without Creplegate. About the same time died Edmund lord Shandois.

Rare qualities in a noble man.

The fiue and twentith of March being wednesdaie in Easter weeke, and the feast of the Annuntiation of our ladie, George Browne cruellie murthered two honest men neere to Shoters hill in Kent, the ons of them was a wealthie merchant of London named George Sanders, the other John Beane of Woolwich, which murther was committed in manner as followeth. On tuesdaie in Easter weeke (the foure and twentith of March) the said George Browne receiuing secret intelligence by letter from mistresse Anne Dzurie, that master Sanders should lodge the same night at the house of one master Barnes in Woolwich, and from thense go on fot to saint Marie Craie; the next morning he laie in wait for him by the waie, a little from Shoters hill, and there slue both him & John Beane seruant to master Barnes. But John Beane hauing ten or eleuen wounds, & being left for dead, by Gods prouidence did reuiue againe: and créeping awaie on all foure, was found by an old man and his maiden, and conueied vnto Woolwich, where he gaue euident marks of the murtherer.

Lord priuie seale deceased.

Earle of Worcester sent into France.

Immediatlie vpon the déed doing, Browne sent mistresse Dzurie word thereof by Roger Clement (among them called truslie Roger) he himselfe repaired forthwith to the court at Grenewich, & anon after him came thither the report of the murther also. Then departed he thense vnto London, and came to the house of mistresse Dzurie, where though he spake not personallie with hir, after conference had with hir seruant truslie Roger, she prouided him twentie pounds that same daie, for the which she laid certeine plate of hir owne, & of mistresse Sanders to gage. On the next morning being thursdaie (hauing intelligence that Browne was sought for) they sent him six pounds more by the same Roger, warning him to shift for himselfe by flight, which thing he forbare not to do. Neuertheless, the lords of the queens maiesties councell caused so spéedie and narrow search to be made for him, that vpon the eight and twentith of the same moneth he was apprehended in a mans house of his owne name at Rochester and being brought backe againe to the court, was examined by the councell: vnto whome he confessed the déed (as you haue heard) and that he had oftentimes before pretended and sought to do the same, by the instigation of the said mistresse Dzurie, who had promised to make a marriage betweene him and mistresse Sanders (whome he seemed to loue excessiuelie) neuertheless he protested (though vntrulie) that mistresse Sanders was not priuie nor consenting thereunto.

He confesseth his offence vpon his examination.

Upon his confession he was arreigned at the kings bench in Westminster hall the eighteenth of Aprill, where he acknowledged himselfe guiltie, and was condemned as principall of the murther, according to which sentence he was executed in Smithfield, on mondaie the twentith of Aprill: at which time also vntrulie (as he him selfe confessed afterward) he laboured by all meanes to cleere mistresse Sanders of committing euill of hir bodie with him, and then flung himselfe beside the ladder. He was after hanged vp in chains neere vnto the place where he had done the fact. In the meane time mistresse Dzurie and hir man being examined, as well by their owne confessions, as by falling out of the matter, and also by Brownes appeachment thought culpable, were committed to ward. And after mistresse Sanders being deliuered of child, and churched (for at the time of hir husbands death she loked presentlie to lie downe) was vpon mistresse Dzuries mans confession, and other great likelihods, likewise committed to the tower, and on wednesdaie the first of Maie she was arreigned with mistresse Dzurie at the Guildhall.

George Browne hanged in Smithfield, and afterward in chains on Shooters hill.

The effect of their indictment was, that they by a letter written had béene procurers of the said murther: & knowing the murther done, had by monie & otherwise reléeued the murtherer: wherevnto they pleaded not giltie. Howbeit they were both condemned as accessaries to master Sanders death, and executed in Smithfield the thirteenth of Maie, being wednesdaie in Whitsunweeke, at which time they both confessed themselues guiltie of the fact. Truslie Roger mistresse Dzuries man was arreigned on fridaie the eight of Maie, & being there condemned as accessarie, was executed with his mistresse at the time and place aforesaid. Not long after, Anthonie Browne brother to the foresaid George Browne, was for notable felonies conueied from Newgate to Yorke, and there hanged.

The tenth of Aprill seauen pirats which among others had béene taken on the north seas, were lead from Southworke to Wapping, and fiue of them were there hanged: the other two had their pardon at the gallowes. The seauentéenth of Aprill a chandelers wife without Aldersgate of London, who had practised hir husbands death by poisoning and otherwise, was set on the pillorie in Cheape, with three other women, who had béene of hir counsell: two of them were with hir there whipped.

The seauenth of June, betweene the houres of one and two of the clocke in the after none, a great tempest of haile and raine happened at Tocester in Northamptonshire, wherethrough six houses in that towne were borne downe, and foureteene more sore perished with the waters which rose of that tempest. The hailstones were square, & six inches about. One child was there drowned, and manie sheepe with other cattell, which when the water was fallen, manie of them were lieng on the high hedges, where the waters had left them. The sixteenth of June, Thomas Woodhouse, a priest of Lincolnshire, who had laine long prisoner in the Fleet, was arreigned in the Guildhall of London, and there condemned of high treason, who had iudgement to be hanged and quartered, and was executed at Tiburne the nineteenth of June.

The sixteenth of August, Walter earle of Essex, accompanied with the lord Rich, and diuerse other gentlemen, imbarked themselues in seuerall ships at Leirpole, and the wind sitting verie well, tooke their voiage towards Ireland. Sir Brian Makephelin had preied the countrie, and taken awaie what was to be carried or driuen, but on the first of September he came to Knockfergus, to the earle of Esser, and there made his submission: the number of kine were esteemed thirtie thousand, besides sheepe and swine.

After him Ferdorough Macgillaspicke the blind Scots sonne, Roze, Oge, Macwilline did the like: and diuerse other sent their messengers to the earle, to signifie that they were at his lordships disposition as the baron of Dongarrow, Condenell, Odonell, and the capteine of Kilulto. The earle of Esser hauing the countrie of Clantboie and other, the queens maiestie of England directed hir letters to the lord deputie of Ireland, willing him to make by commission the earle of Esser capteine generall of the Irish nation in the prouince of Ulster, and to diuide the countrie woone, Clantboie, and elsewhere, &c. The eleuenth of October, Peter Burchet gentleman of the middle temple, with his dagger suddenlie assailed, cruellie wounded, and meant to haue murthered a seruiceable gentleman named John Hawkins esquier, as he with sir William Winter, and an other gentleman rode towards Westminster, in the high street neare to the Strand, beyond the Temple barre of London: for which fact the said Burchet being apprehended and commited to the tower, was afterward examined concerning the fact. Who answered that he toke the said maister Hawkins for an other gentleman: and being further examined, he was found to hold certeine erronious opinions, for the which he was sent to the Lollards tower.

Peter Burchet found to be an heretike.

From thence being called into the consistorie of Paules church, before the right reuerend father Edwine bishop of London, and others, & by them examined, he stood in his opinions, till the sentence of death as an heretike was readie to haue beene pronounced against him on the fourth of Nouember: but through the earnest persuasions of diuerse learned men, who toke great paines in that matter, he renounced, forswore, and abiured his opinions for erronious & damnable, promising neuer to returne to them, and also willinglie to doo and performe all such penance as the bishop his ordinarie should inioine him.

Peter Burchet abiured his heresie, & submitted himselfe to doo penance.

The ninth of Nouember, the said Peter Burchet was remoued from the Lollards tower, to the tower of London, where on the next morrow about none, whilest one that had kept him companie was gone downe, and locked the doore after him, leauing an other with him called Hugh Longworth, who stood at the window reading in the bible, the said Burchet walking vp and downe in the chamber, toke a billets end out of the fire, and knocked the said Longworth on the head, and left not till he had striken him starke dead: for the which on the next morrow he was arreigned & condemned at Westminster, and then returned to Summerset house, where he remained that night: and on the next morrow being the twelfe of Nouember, he was brought to the gibet, where (after his right hand being striken off, and nailed to the gibbet) he was hanged nigh the place where hee wounded maister Hawkins. This yeare about Lammas, wheat was sold at London for three shillings the bushell: but shortlie after it was raised to foure shillings, fiue shillings, six shillings: & before Christmas to a noble, and seuen shillings, which so continued long after: beefe was sold for twentie pence, and two and twentie pence the stone, and all other flesh and white meats at an excessiue price, all kind of salt fish verie deare, as fiue herings two pence, &c: yet great plentie of fresh fish, and oft times the same verie cheape: peasе at foure shillings the bushell, otemeale at foure shillings eight pence: bate salt at three shillings the bushell, &c. All this dearth notwithstanding (thanks be giuen to God) there was no want of anie thing to them that wanted not monie.

The fourth of Aprill being Palme sundaie, there was taken saieng of masse in the lord Mozleis house within Algate of London, one Albon Dalman priest, and the ladie Mozleie with hir children, and diuerse others were also taken hearing of the said masse. There was also taken the same date and houre for saieng masse at the ladie Gilfords in Trinitie lane, one Oliuer Heiwood priest: and for hearing of the said masse, the said ladie Gilford with diuerse other gentlewomen. There was also taken at the same instant in the ladie Browns house in Cowlane for saieng masse, one Thomas Heiwood priest, and one John Cowper priest, with the ladie Browne, and diuers other were likewise taken being hearers of the said masse. All which persons were for the same offenses indicted, conuicted, and had the law according to the statute in that case prouided. There was also found in their seuerall chapels, diuerse Latine bookes, beads, images, palmes, chalices, crosses, vestments, pixes, pares, and such like.

The ninth of Julie at six of the clocke at night, in the Ile of Thanet besids Ramesgate, in the parish of saint Peter vnder the cliffe, a monstrous fish or whale of the sea did shot himselfe on shore, where for want of water, beating himselfe on the sands, he died about six of the clocke on the next morning, before which time he roared, and was heard more than a mile on the land. The length of this fish was twentie two yards, the nether law twelue foot the opening: one of his eies, being taken out of his head, was more than six horsse in a cart could draw, a man stood vpright in the place from whence the eie was taken. The thicknesse from the backe whereon he laie, to the top of his bellie (which was vpward) was foureteene foot, his taile of the same breadth: betweene his eies twelue foot, three men stood vpright in his mouth, some of the ribs were six foot long, his tong was fifteene foot long, his liuer two cart lode, into his nostrils anie man might haue crept: the oile being boiled out of the head was *parmasitie, the oile of his bodie was whitish and sweet of taste. The seuenth of August, a solemne obsequie was kept in saint Paules church at London for Charles the ninth king of France, who deceassed on the twentie day of Maie last before passed.

Also their seuerall examinations and confessions were there openlie read by the preacher, and afterwards published in print for the further posteritie hereafter to beware of the like deceiuers.

This yeare the maior of London went by water to Westminster, and there toke his oth, as hath bene accustomed: he kept no feast at the Guildhall, although great prouision had bene made for that purpose, but dined at his owne house with his brethren the aldermen: the companies dined at their seuerall halles. This was done by the speciall appointment of the quenes maiesties councell, to auoid infection of the plague, like to haue increased by comming togither of such a multitude. This weke from the two and twentith, vnto the eight and twentith of October, deceased in the citie and liberties, conteining an hundred and eight parishes, of all diseases, one hundred threescore & six, of the which number threescore and fiue were accounted to die of the plague. Michaelmas tearme, which had bene adiourned by proclamation, began at Westminster on the first of Nouember. The fourteenth of Nouember being sundaie, about midnight following, diuerse strange impressions of fire and smoke were seene in the aire to proceed forth of a blacke cloud in the north toward the south, which so continued till the next morning that it was daie light. The next night following, the heauens from all parts did seeme to burne maruellous raginglie, & ouer our heads the flames from the horizon round about rising did meet, and there double and roll one in another, as if it had bene in a cleare fornace. The eighteenth daie at night blew verie stormie & tempestuous winds out of the south, as hath not bene knowne the like out of that quarter, especiallie after midnight, till the next morning that it was daie light. This yeare at London after haruest, the price of wheate began by little and little to fall, from seuen shillings to three shillings the bushell, at which price it staied (little or nothing rising or falling) all the yeare after: but baie salt was raised from three shillings to foure shillings, fiue shillings, and six shillings the bushell, the like whereof had neuer bene seene or heard within this realme. The 24 day of Februarie, being the feast of saint Matthie, on which daie the faire was kept at Teukesburie, a strange thing happened there. For after a flood which was not great, but such as therby the medows neere adioining were couered with water, in the after none there came downe the riuer of Seuerne great numbers of flies & beetels, such as in summer euenings vse to strike men in the face, in great heapes, a foot thicke aboue the water, so that to credible mens iudgement there were seene within a paire of buts length of those flies aboue a hundred quarters. The mils there about were dammed vp with them for the space of foure daies after, and then were clensed by digging them out with shouels: from whence they came is yet vnknowne: but the daie was cold and a hard frost.

The six and twentith of Februarie, betweene foure and six of the clocke in the after none, great earthquakes happened in the cities of Yorke, Worcester, Glocester, Bristow, Hereford, and in the countries about, which caused the people to runne out of their houses: for feare they should haue fallen on their heads. In Teukesburie, Bredon, and other places, the dishes fell from the cupbords, and the bookes in mens studies from the shelues. In Norton chappell, the people being on their knees at euening praier, the ground mouing, caused them to run awaie in great feare that the dead bodies would haue risen, or the chappell to haue fallen: part of Ruthen castell fell downe with certeine bricke chimneies in gentlemens houses. The bell in the shire hall at Denbigh was also caused to toll twise, by shaking of the hall, &c.

And further I confesse, that the whole doctrine and religion established and published in this realme of England, as also that which is receiued and preached in the Dutch church here in this citie, is sound, true, and according to the word of God: whervnto in all things I submit my selfe, and will most gladlie be a member of the said Dutch church, from henceforth vtterlie abandoning and forsaking all and euerie anabaptisticall error. This is my faith now, in the which I do purpose and trust to stand firme and stedfast to the end. Matthew Parker archbishop of Canturburie deceased.

The seauentéenth of Maie about midnight following, the reuerend father in God Matthew Parker doctor of diuinitie archbishop of Canturburie deceased at Lambeth, and was there honorablie buried, on whose tombe (being of blacke marble) is written this most worthie epitaph here following:

Walter Haddon.

Sobrius & prudens, studijs excultus & vsu,
Integer & veræ relligionis amans,
Matthæus vixit Parkerus, fouerat illum
Aula virum iuuenem, fouit & aula senem,
Ordine res gessit, recti defensor & æqui,

Matthew Parker liued soberlie and wise,
Learned by studie and continuall practise,
Louing, true, of life vncontrold,
The court did foster him both yoong and old,
Orderlie he dealt, the right he did defend,
He liued vnto God, to God he made his end.

Io. St. 1182. Matthew Parker a learned antiquarie, and what monuments of his loue to learning he left behind him.

¶ This reuerend father examined throughlie the English translation of the holie bibles, wherein he partlie vsed the helpe of his brethren bishops, and other doctors, and caused the same to be newlie printed in the largest volume, for the due furniture of manie churches then wanting. Also making diligent search for the antiquities of the Britons, and English Saxons, to the end those monuments might be carefullie kept, he caused them to be well bound and trimlie couered: and such whereof he knew verie few examples to be extant (among the which was Matthew Paris, Matthew Florilegus, and Thomas Walsingham) he caused to be printed. The famous palace of his see at Canturburie, by long continuance decaied & consumed with fire, he renewed, builded, and fullie restored with the charges of more than fourtéene hundred pounds. He founded a grammar schole in Rochdale in the countie of Lancaster.

Founder of a grammar schole.

A benefactor to Corpus christi college.

To Corpus Christi college in Cambridge he procured thirtéene scholarships, and bare the charges in making and furnishing two chambers for scholars, and the inward librarie of the same college. Item he gaue to the outward and inward librarie of the said college a godlie companie of printed bookes, & a great number of written boks of great antiquitie & much value. Item he procured to the said college the patronage of saint Marie Abchurch in London. Item he hath founded two felowships in the said college, and procured one charter of mortmaine to the summe of one hundred pounds by yeare. Item he hath giuen to the same college of siluer plate double guilt three hundred nine ounces, and three quarters, & surrendred to them a lease with the improuement of fourtéene pounds and eight shillings yerelie for seuentéene yéeres. Item one hundred pounds to the maintenance of a fier in the hall from Halomas to Candlemas; and by his last will and testament fiue hundred pounds. Item to diuers scholars chambers within the said college diuerse bedsteads, with sufficient bedding & bokes to remaine for euer. Item he hath founded for euer fiue sermons to be preached in diuerse places of Norfolke euerie yéere in Rogation wéeke; and fortie shillings to be diuided at Norwich to the poore and others. Item to the citie of Norwich one bason and ewer of siluer and double guilt of one hundred seauentie and fiue ounces. Item to the towne of Watsall in Norfolke for euer an annuitie of fiftie shillings to be diuided to the poore with a sermon in Rogation wéeke. Item to Gunuill and Caius college one scholarship, with a standing cup, and a pot of siluer double guilt of fiue and fiftie ounces and three quarters, and one nest of goblets with a couer siluer and guilt; with a number of good bookes to their librarie. Item to Trinitie hall one scholarship, a standing cup and a pot of siluer and guilt of three and fiftie ounces, a nest of goblets siluer and guilt with a couer; and bookes to their librarie. Item to the vniuersitie librarie fiftie old ancient written bookes, and fiftie printed bookes. Of this prelat, to his further commendation the aforesaid doctor Haddon, in the second booke of his poems maketh very honorable mention, comprising in sir verses the ensignes of his ancestors, with those also which were accessarie by the grationsnesse of the prince, who preferred him to his prelacie. In the same verses also is comprehended as it were an harmonie or consent of most godlie qualities answerable vnto the ensignes that he bare; as thus:

On the first of June the nine women being led by the shiriffs officers, and the man also tied to a cart & whiped, were all conueied from Newgate to the waters side, where they were shiped awaie neuer to returne againe. The twelfe of June stood at Paules crosse fiue persons Englishmen of the sect termed the familie of loue, who there confessed themselues vtterlie to detest as well the author of that sect H. The two and twentith of Julie two Dutchmen anabaptists were burned in Smithfield, who died in great horror with roring and crieng. The thirtith of Julie in the afternoone was a great tempest of lightening and thunder, wherethrough both men and beasts in diuerse places were striken dead. Also at that time fell great abundance of haile, whereof the stones in manie places were found to be six or seuen inches about. The fourth of September being sundaie about seuen of the clocke in the morning, a certeine glasse house, which sometime had béene the crossed friers hall nere to the tower of London burst out on a terrible fire: whereunto the lord maior, aldermen and shiriffes with all expedition repaired, and practised there all means possible, by water buckets, hookes, and otherwise to haue quenched it. All which notwithstanding, whereas the same house in a small time before had consumed great quantitie of wood by making of fine drinking glasses; now it selfe hauing within it nere fortie thousand billets of wood was all consumed to the stone walles, which walles greatlie defended the fire from spreading further, and doing anie more harme.

A terrible example of Gods iust iudgement vpon such as make no conscience of swearing against their brother. The fifteenth of Februarie, Edmund Grindale sometime bishop of London, late archbishop of Yorke, was in the chapterhouse of S. Paules church at London elected archbishop of Canturburie. The first of March in the night through a great flaw of wind then in the northeast, a tilt bote with about the number of one and thirtie persons, men and women, comming from Grauesend toward London, were all drowned; one boie excepted. The fifteenth of June Martine Frobisher being furnished of aduenturors, with two small barkes & one pinnesse departed from Blackewall, vpon his voiage for the discouerie of a passage to Cataia by the northwest seas. Upon the first of Julie he had sight (as he iudged) of Freeland, but durst not approch the same, by reason of the great yce that laie alongst the coast. Not far from thense he lost his pinnesse and one of his barkes, who mistrusting the danger of tempests returned home, with report that their generall Martine Frobisher was cast awaie: which worthie capteine notwithstanding continued his course northwest, beyond anie man that hath heretofore discouered, and the twentith of Julie had sight of a high land, which he named Queene Elisabeths foreland; and after that another foreland with a great passage, diuiding (as it were) the two maine lands asunder: this place he named Frobishers streits. After he had passed sixtie leagues further, he went ashoare, found the same to be inhabited with sauage people, caught one of them into his barke, and returning, arriued in England in the moneth of August following. One of his companie brought from thense a peece of a blacke stone, much like to a seacole in colour, which being brought to certeine goldsmiths in London, to make a saie thereof, found it to hold gold, and that verie richlie for the quantitie.

The nineteenth of Julie a woman was burnt at Tunbridge in Kent for poisoning of hir husband: and two daies before a man, named Orleie, was hanged at Maidstone for being accessarie to the same fact. The tenth of August a rare peece of worke and almost incredible, was brought to passe by an Englishman borne in the citie of London named Peter Bales, who by his industrie and practise of his pen, contriued and writ within the compasse of a penie in Latine, the Lords praier, the creed, the ten commandements, a praier to God, a praier for the queene, his posie, his name, the date of the moneth, the yeare of our Lord, and the reigne of the queene. And on the seuentéenth of August next following at Hampton court he presented the same to the queens maiestie in the head of a ring of gold, couered with a christall, and presented therewith an excellent spectacle by him deuised for the easier reading thereof: wherewith hir maiestie read all that was written therein with great admiration, and commended the same to the lords of the councell, and the ambassadors, and did weare the same manie times vpon hir finger.]

Rare workemanship shewed in the compasse of a penie by the handwriting of an Englishman.

This yeare, by reason of the troubles in the low countries, the English merchants sustained great losses diuers waies. For the men of warre that kept the seas, aduowing themselues to be reteined with the prince of Orenge, vnder colour to serch for their aduersaries goods, oftentimes boorded the English ships as they met with them on the seas, smallie to the profit of them to whome the same ships and goods apperteined. Some they staied and toke awaie with them. And at length there was a generall restraint made by the prince of Orenge, that no English ships should passe to or fro the towne of Antwerpe by the riuer of Scheld, such being arrested and detetned at Flishing as were comming downe that riuer, and other likewise that were bound vp the same time towards Antwerpe.

Anno Reg. 18. 1576

English merchants sustaine great losse by sea, and why?

The English merchants, féeling themselues thus molested and damnified at sundrie seasons, exhibited their complaints to the queenes maiesties councell, who accordinglie dealt from time to time with the prince of Orenge and his deputies for redresse, but speciallie now vpon this generall restreint. And although great difficultie appeared in the matter, aswell for contenting of the aduenturors of Flishing, as for that there had beene foure ships belonging to the prince arrested and staied at Falmouth: at length yet such English ships as were kept and holden at Flishing were released and sent home; but not till two of the English merchants aduenturors * men of good calling and estimation (hauing first as hath bin said made a certeine manor of protest) were faine to enter into bond for the loane of a summe of monie, and were therewith kept at Flishing till the contract in that behalfe might be performed. Wherevpon the queenes maiestie, misliking that hir subiects should be thus hardlie dealt with, armed and set forth certeine of hir ships, which going to the seas to see that hir subiects might trauerse the same in safetie, toke diuerse of the Flishingers vessels, and brought them into the English streames. The Flishingers herewith on the other part toke and arrested other of the English ships, so that the troubles séemed rather to increase than to be in any wise appeased: although afterwards by sending to and fro, the matter was taken vp, and such order had as was thought to stand verie well for the suertie, commoditie, and good liking of the English merchants.

The English merchants complaine to the queene of their wrongs.

These foure ships were staied for satisfaction of one Simons ship, out of the which a Flishinger had taken certeine tuns of Canarie wines.

The troubles increase.

But in the meane time, and before this could be brought to passe, through a disordered mutinie which chanced among the Spanish souldiers, it so fell out, that the states of those low countries agreed with the prince of Orenge, and set themselues wholie against the Spaniards. Wherevpon the yong count de Egmont, the marquesse de Hauerie entered the towne of Antwerpe, with a power of souldiers for the States, and meant to haue kept that towne against the Spaniards that held the castell. But they doubting to be inclosed & shut vp by some siege, got more of their fellowes to them, entred the towne by force, & spitefullie killing no small number of people, sacked the towne, and put aswell the townesmen as others that were merchants resident there to their ransoms. Amongst other our Englishmen escaped not altogither free, so as diuerse were spoiled of that they had, and the whole number put to their ransome; although vpon the sending ouer of doctor Willson hir maiesties ambassador, so much of the ransome as remained vnpaid was promised to be remitted.

Thus were our merchants euill intreated on each hand, by reason of those ciuill tumults in the low countries, aswell this yeare as in the former yeares past, and small hope would be of better successe there, if some end should not be had of that ciuill dissention, which hath so long continued betwixt the king of Spaine and his subiects in those countries, not onelie to the hinderance of themselues, but also of others that haue to trade among them, specially for traffike sake and intercourse of merchandize. But at length they haue compounded their controuersies, and are growen to a full agréement and perfect conclusion of peace, which God grant may take place so effectuallie, as may turne to the quietnesse and publike commoditie not onlie of those countries but of their neighbors, whereby merchants and passengers may in suertie passe to and fro without disturbance, so as no occasion be giuen of breach of leagues and amities betwixt princes and countries, but that the same may be mainteined to Gods glorie, and the suertie of the christian commonwealth.

A conclusion of peace betweene the parties before diuided.

In this yeare the right honorable Walter Deuereux earle of Esser and Eu, earle marshall of Ireland, vicount Hereford and Bourcher, lord Ferrers of Chartlie, Bourcher & Louaine, knight of the most noble order of the garter, fell sicke of a lowsenesse of his bodie the one and twentith of August being fridaie, and for the space of two and twentie daies together he was so grieuouslie tormented therwith, that finallie on saturdaie the two & twentith of September he departed out of this transitorie life, passing from hence to the ioies of heauen, as by his godlie end all that were about him gaue testimonie. The losse of this noble man was greatlie bemoned, aswell by the English as Irish, for the noble courage, vertuous qualities, and tender zeale to the aduancement of the commonwealth which appeered in him.

Walter Deuereux earle of Essex departeth this life.

¶ So that it were a fowle fault in the highest degree, not to laie vp some commemoration of so worthie and well deseruing a gentleman, both of prince and people, in perpetuall records: which I will doo by Gods grace none otherwise than I am lead by such matter, yea memorable matter, as I find in a funerall sermon, made by the reuerend father in God Richard bishop of saint Dauis, at the buriall of this right honorable earle of Esser, in the parish church of Caermerthin in Wales, where the said bishop taking for his text these words of S. Iohn, in the 14 of the reuelation, Audiui vocem de cælo, dicentem: Beati mortui, &c. I heard a voice from heauen, saieng: Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, &c. After he had discoursed vpon the text as the spirit of God gaue him vtterance, he descended at last to a particular treatise tending wholie to the praise of this right noble man: saieng in sort as followeth.

Abr. Fl. ex concione funebri, vt patet in contextu.

Behold the heauie hand of God for our sins, vpon all the whole countrie in the death of this noble man, which is not onelie a messenger of Gods wrath towards this towne and countrie (wherein he was borne) but also in verie deed a great losse to the whole realme. And although this countrie, who shall misse so noble and so worthie a ruler and magistrate, that bore them so great affection, so readie to benefit all, and hurt none, and for the high calling he was of so able to pleasure and to doo good: although I saie this countrie by the death of this noble earle is most earnestlie & effectuallie cited to appeare before the Lord, and to fall to a reckoning: yet doo I beleeue that the quenes maiestie, hir highnesse councell, and all the nobilitie of the realme may hereby receiue admonition, and cause of further circumspection and aduigilancie. For such valiant and couragious noble men are the bulworks and walles of defense of the whole realme. They saie the realme is walled about, because it is inuironed with the sea: but I hold rather with their iudgements, that make the fidelitie and true harts of the subiects, and especiallie of such of the nobilitie that haue made themselues (by Gods especiall grace) expert to gouerne and rule vnder hir maiestie, aswell in warre as peace, the strong towers of defense both of hir maiestie and hir highnesse realme.

What noblemen are the walls of the realme.

This noble earle was one of these number: for I beleeue there is no prince in the world, that had a more faithfull noble subiect, than hir maiestie had of him in his time. And for the notable valiantnesse, experience, and vertues that were in him, I am persuaded that hir maiestie (if he had liued) might haue vsed his seruice to be a terrour to all enimies, forren or domesticall. And now that I may speake somewhat of his great nobilitie, his excellent, vertuous, and worthie qualities: first I thinke I may saie thus much in a generalitie, that it was easie for a man of any iudgement, that should behold his countenance and behauiour, to find in him nobilitie, maiestie and honor, planted by the especiall gift of God, euen from his mothers wombe. When I consider the nature of nobilitie with the causes efficient and finall, it séemeth vnto me that nobilitie may be compared vnto a riuer or a flood, which in the originall issueth out of foure principall wels, and all the foure rise out from the compasse of one hill. The welles of nobilitie are prudence, fortitude, iustice, and temperance: the hill whence they spring is the feare of God, or true religion.

The praise of the earle by sundrie considerations.

Comparison of true nobilitie vnto a riuer or flood, &c.

Although this worthie earle by progenie was of noble blood, whose ancestors were of great honour, which of it selfe, if a man degenerat not too far from his forefathers, deserueth honorable acceptation in this world: yet was he not therewith satisfied, as it may appéere by his studie and trauell in his life time: for he séemed to be of that iudgement that Alphonsus king of Aragon (of whome we read in stories) was of. When a certeine man toke in hand to set out the laud and praise of his nobilitie, he stood much in recitall that he was a king, a kings sonne, a kings nephue, a kings brother, and such like titles. The king interrupting his tale answered, that he neuer estéemed much of that kind of glorie: and that it was the praise and commendation of his ancestors, who by vertue and worthie qualities had deserued such high callings and honour, and not of him: and that his praise stood not in that which might fall vnto him by testament, but in the imitation and performing of the noble acts, prowesse, and valiantnesse of his forefathers. This noble earle likewise, not answered to his expectation in that he was a noble man by blood and inheritance, gaue himselfe wholie all the daies of his life to purchase and win the nobilitie that springeth immediatlie from the verie originall founteins of the same, as partlie I will put you in remembrance of. We will begin with prudence, which may be thus defined.

the children of men haue to deale with in this world. This noble erle was of great wisedome, deepe iudgement, graue consideration, and so blessed with vnderstanding, experience, and manifold vertues and gifts of God, that he was right worthie to serue his maiestie in princelie and weightie affaires, both in warre and peace. He was of such prudent and excellent discretion, that he had a speciall grace to interteine all states of men, superiour, equall, and inferiour, with such comelinesse and decencie, that for ciuilitie, humanitie, maners, and honorable behauior, he was a paterne and an example for nobilitie to imitate and to follow. In his youth he bestowed not the time in vanitie, idlenesse, or voluptuousnesse; but in atchiuing and winning of such sciences, properties and vertues, which might beautifie and increase his nobilitie, and preuailed therin so effectuallie, that he became excellent in all kinds of knowledge and qualities, meet, commendable, or necessarie for a man of honour. Concerning diuine matters, I haue in my time conferred with his lordship, and therefore can saie somewhat therein: and amongst others, one thing is notable, which in conference I receiued at his mouth. He affirmed this in effect, that there was nothing in the world that could blemish and abase the heroicall nature of nobilitie so much, as to haue the eies of vnderstanding so closed and shut vp, that a man in honour should not be able to discerne betwixt true religion, and the hypocriticall false religion; betwixt the right worshipping of God, & idolatrie; betwixt the traditions of men and Gods word: but remaine subiect to lies and superstition, and to call bad good, and good bad: and concluded that to be free from this seruile state, was a necessarie point of true nobilitie.

He therefore in his time had diligentlie trauelled in the scriptures, and so furnished himselfe with principles of christian religion, that he was able readilie to discerne sermons and disputations, and to find out who had veritie on their side: and also probablie to speake with authoritie of scripture in matters of controuersie. His vnderstanding by the especiall worke of the holie ghost was so illumined, that he claue & drew to true christian religion, as the adamant stone cleaueth and draweth to steele. His lordship therefore furthered and fauoured all preachers of Gods word, so that whosoeuer will iudge of the successe of Christs religion by humane reason, must confesse that the gospell hath lost a mightie protector, and an earnest defender. But God in setting out of his word, vseth to worke beside the expectation of man, and beyond the reach of reason. I haue yet further to speake of his lordship, that I beleeue there be verie few noble men in England, more readie and expert in chronicles, histories, genealogies, and pedegrees of noble men, and noble houses, not onlie within the realme, but also in forren realmes, than this noble earle was in his time. He excelled in describing and blasing of armes, and in all skill perteining thereto: and to be short, his vnderstanding and capacitie was so liuelie and effectuall, that it reached to all kind of matters that a perfect nobleman shall haue to deale withall in this world.

Fortitude is another founteine from whense nobilitie floweth, of Cicero In Tusculanis quæstionibus thus defined: Est affectio animi qua grauia patiendo legibus obtemperatur: It is an affection of the mind whereby to satisfie the lawes a man is content to suffer hardnesse; he meaneth mans lawes, and not Gods law. It seemeth therefore that it may be thus more euidentlie and fullie defined: Fortitude is an affection of the mind, whereby a man is made hardie and couragious to suffer difficulties and dangers, auoiding on the one side rashnesse, & repelling on the other side feare, to performe that which Gods law and honestie prescribeth and commandeth. Although by this definition we find, that the effect of fortitude resteth much in banishing of feare of bodilie hurts: yet doth it agree verie well with the feare of God. Iethro therefore counselling Moses to chose men to gouerne vnder him, saith; Prospice viros fortes, timentes Deum; Seeke out men indued with fortitude, fearing God, &c. Whereby we perceiue, that fortitude and the feare of God varie not, but are linked togither. Deepe was the flood of nobilitie that this valiant earle had fetched out of this founteine. For in this togither with the well of prudence, he found that excellent knowledge of chiualrie, the cunning to lead an armie, to guide and to rule soldiors, that experience of stratagems & warlike policies, that notable magnanimitie and inuincible courage, whereby he indured and ouercame so manie dangers and perils, for the which he is renowmed in England and Ireland, and shall neuer be forgotten. He was by nature the sonne of Mars; and by practising feats of war and exercise aforehand he had made himselfe in manner a perfect warrior, afore that euer he came to the wars; and was for prowesse, magnanimitie, and high corage to be compared to the old Romane capteins, that be so much in stories commended. This fortitude is no lesse necessarie for nobilitie in time of peace than in time of warre. For it belongeth vnto them to minister iustice betwixt partie and partie, without respect of persons, which cannot be performed without the assistance of this vertue. I haue good cause to thinke of this noble earle, that there was no subiect in England, that could feare or corrupt him from executing of iustice. He was to the proud and arrogant a lion, and to the meeke and humble a lambe, neither is there anie contrarietie in this: for true nobilitie discerneth a due and conuenient time and place to vse both the one and the other.

Exod. 18, 21

The earles chiualrie, martiall knowledge and prowesse aduanced.

Fortitude needfull both in time of peace and warre.

Iustice is the third well of nobilitie, it is a constant and a perpetuall will to giue euerie man his owne. This is a diuine vertue, precious, and commendable in all men, and especiallie in the nobilitie, who by reason of authoritie may do iniurie without remedie for the same. We see by experience that great is the number of them that would oppresse, if they had authoritie: we see also the iniuries that are done dailie by them that haue colour of authoritie, be it neuer so simple. But examine the life of this earle who will, and I beleeue there is no man liuing that can iustlie complaine of anie iniurie or wrong done by him. I once in my time heard him not a little offended with one of his men that was complained vpon; saieng that his seruant could do him no greater dishonor, than by pretense of his authoritie to do anie poore man wrong. Job in the time of his authoritie & wealth, was commended to be a iust & a righteous man. And in the explication of part of that iustice Job hath these words, Fui oculus cæco, vice pedum claudo, &c: I was the eies to the blind, and I was the fæt to the lame, I was a father to the poore, and when I knew not the cause I sought it out diligentlie, I brake the chawes of the vnrighteous man, and plucked the preie out of his teeth. Here we find that who soeuer will do iustice, must not onelie do no wrong, but must also with all his might, succour and comfort the helpelesse and oppressed. In this part of iustice there was neuer noble man more forward than this good earle. He was the comfortable refuge of all such as were in aduersitie, or oppressed by power.

Iustice a noble vertue, wherewith this erle was indued.

The paterne of a good earle indeed.

Of Titus Vespasianus emperor of Rome we read, that he answered one of his frends, admonishing him to hold his hands, and not to make his liberalitie and gentlenesse common to all men, saieng; that it becommeth not a prince to let anie man part from him with a heauie hart. This worthie erle was of like mind: for he was so full of humanitie and compassion, that he would be loth to let anie distressed part from him without some comfort and ease. In so much that in him (if euer in anie man) this adage, Homo homini Deus, A man a god to man, was as truelie performed, as in tyrants the contrarie adage, that is, Homo homini lupus, A man a wolfe to man. We read in chronicles of emperors, kings, & noble men, which for their bountifulnesse, gentlenesse, affabilitie, and goodnesse, deserued some honorable addition to their names; as amongst the emperors Antoninus pius, Anthonie the vertuous; amongst the British kings, Elidorus pius, Elidor the godlie; and amongst noble men, in the time of king Richard the second, sir Thomas Montacute the good earle of Salisburie; and in the time of king Henrie the first, sir Thomas Beuchampe the good earle of Warwike. This noble earle for the verie like qualities hath trulie deserued to be called, the good earle, the vertuous earle, and the valiant earle of Esser.

The humanitie, courtesie, affablenesse, and other vertues of this earle.

Temperance is the founteine of nobilitie; it is a vertue whereby a man obserueth a moderation, & a reasonable meane in the vse of all things perteining to bodie & mind: it is the mother of all other vertues, without which, the rest are blemished and disgraced. In the Dutch chronicles that tell of the liues of emperors, the first qualitie that is noted, is temperat, or not temperat, as an argument of the rest of his life and doings: for he is thought vnworthie to rule others that can not rule himselfe. This noble earle had a speciall grace, and an excellent gift of God in obseruation of this vertue, whether you respect diet, or the suppression of all vicious affections. I haue diuerse times noted in him, when vnderstanding was brought vnto him of some Thrasonicall contumelious word, spoken by some glorious inferior aduersarie against him, he would neuer be stirred to anie perturbation of mind thereby, but with graue wisedome and magnanimitie contemne it and smile, deriding the vanitie and waiwardnesse of that cankered stomach that vomited such sowre rotten infection: for he did effectuallie consider that it became no better a noble hart to take in & receiue wranglings, brallings, chasings, and anger, than it is conuenient to dawbe a golden piller with mire and claie. Salomon was of that mind, and therefore saith; Be not thou hastie to be angrie, for anger resteth in the bosome of fooles. I haue had occasion by that I noted in his lordship to call to remembrance this saieng of Christ; A good man out of the good treasure of his hart bringeth forth good things: & the euill man out of the euill treasure of his hart bringeth forth euill things. For though occasion were ministred, yet should you neuer heare him vtter anie opprobrious words, no not against his aduersarie, so pure & immaculate did he studie to preserue the nobilitie of his mind. There be some that count themselues worthie honor & estimation, when they teare God in peeces with chasing and horrible oths: which this noble earle detested and abhorred, as a matter not onelie vndecent, but also repugnant to the nature of true nobilitie, attributing due reuerence to the name of the Lord, & thereby prouing the founteins of his nobilitie to spring out of the hill of the feare of God.

Temperance, a noble vertue wherewith this erle was indued.

Ecclesi. 7. 9.

Luke 6. 45.

The earle could not awaie with swearing, chasing, nor anie disordered dealing, &c.

But what was his religion, what faith God had blessed him withall, what godlie disposition he was of, and how abundantlie God had inriched him with his holie spirit; the confession of his faith, his speeches, nate rather his sermons in his sickenesse afore his death shall testifie for euer. For I receiued by the relation of such as are worthie credit, and were present about him, although not all, yet manie of his learned godlie saiengs at that time. Concerning his saluation, he reposed his affiance and sure trust in the bloud of Jesus Christ. He forgaue all the world, and by inuincible faith apprehended, laied hold, and imbraced remission of his sinnes, in the merits of the sacrifice of Christs bodie offered vpon the crosse for the sinnes of the world. Trentals, masses, diriges, pardons, and such other papisticall trifles he vtterlie contemned, as wicked and blasphemous against the death and passion of Christ. He fared like the children of Israell in the wildernesse, which when they were stinged with serpents euen to death: yet when they lookt vp to the brasen serpent, they were made whole, safe, and sound. So it is noble earle grieued with the remembrance of his former vnthankefull life (as he iudged) immediatlie directed the eies of his mind to the passion of Christ, and forthwith felt such health of soule, that he was filled with ioie in the holie Ghost, and all his delight was in meditation of the ioie of the world to come, and the fruition of the presence of God for euer: insomuch that fiue or six daies before he died, he shewed himselfe more like an angell from heauen, than a man compassed with flesh and bloud.

Numb. 21. 9.

The heauenlie contemplation of this earle drawing to his end.

My lord the archbishop of Dublin (as I was informed) could moue him in no question or article perteining to saluation, that he was not readie in, and learnedlie, and godlie resolued: yea, and made such answers in all things, that my lord of Dublin had them in great admiration, and affirmed that his speeches at that time should serue him for sermons as long as he liued. How trulie he relinquished the vanities of this world, and how effectuallie he thirsted after the ioies of the life to come, his godlie admonitions ministred vnto such as visited him, and his heauenlie lessons & exhortations to his seruants, shall testifie for euer: for they were such that his seruants report they shall neuer forget, and such as they shall be the better for whilest they liue. Thus haue I briefflie and partlie declared vnto you, both the life and death of this worthie magistrate, to the end we should consider how seriouslie God doth call vs to a reckoning by the losse of such a good magistrat. Now a word or two to shew who they be that die in the Lord, and then an end. They principallie are said to die in the Lord, which suffer death vnder the beast, for confession of Christs religion, for they properlie die in the Lords cause. Such are the martyrs, as well of the primitiue church vnder the cruell emperours, as the martyrs of all ages since vnder antichrist of Rome. They also die in the Lord, which though they die not by the crueltie of the beast, yet they die in the faith of Jesus Christ, and are therefore blessed.

A wonderfull gift of the holie Ghost and most worthie to be chronicled.

How his seruants were affected at his last speeches.

Who they be that die in the Lord.

Of this number was this godlie earle, as I haue before declared. Wherfore I will conclude and direct my speech for two or three words to this good earle. O noble earle of Esser, in thy time the pearle of nobilitie: the mirrour of vertue and worthie qualities: the child of chiualrie: the beautifull floure of England: the pretious iewell and comfort of Wales: the trustie staie of Ireland. Thy life was most honourable: thy worthinesse incomparable: thy death pretious in the sight of God: for thou diedst in the Lord a right inheritour of the euerlasting kingdome of heauen. Wherefore by authoritie of the heauenlie oracle that saint John was commanded to write, thou art to be pronounced blessed for euer. Our sins haue shortened thy life, so that we could inioie the same no longer. Thou hast notwithstanding bequeathed thy bodie to be buried amongst vs here in Wales. Of verie dutie therefore O noble earle, thy tome shall be with vs in reuerence, estimation, and honor; the fame and name of thy nobilitie, valiantnesse, vertue, and worthinesse shall neuer be forgotten; but shall liue and be kept with vs in memorie from generation to generation while the world standeth. This epitaph with the ſaid earles whole genealogie or pedegree compiſed in heroicall verſe, and ioined with the funerall ſermon, was preſented to the right honourable lord Robert now earle of Eſſex and Ew, vicount of Hereford and Bourchier, lord Ferrers of Chartleie Bourchier & Louaine, at ſuch time as he was the queenes maieſties ward; with an epiſtle of the preſenter: which bicauſe it is a veine of godlie deuiſe, & tending to a verie honorable purpoſe, deſerueth here to be placed, anſwering the preſident heretofore ſet out in print, as followeth.

The epiſtle of E. W. prefixed before the genealogicall epitaph, and funerall ſermon publiſhed at the interring of the right honourable the lord Walter earle of Eſſex, &c.

MY lord, your abſence latelie from the funerals of my lord your father, was lamented by ſuch in Wales as would gladlie haue beheld the liuelie image of him in you; and if the tenderneſſe of your yeares ſhunned for ſo tedious and ſo vnſeaſonable trauell, had not by neceſſitie diſappointed their hope, then ſhould the lamentable ſpeech of the graue and reuerend father, the biſhop of ſaint Danies (expreſſed with abundance of dolour & tears) haue left in you a deepe impreſſion of griefe for the intollerable loſſe of ſo honourable a parent. But it maie be iudged that God hath turned your abſence to your more benefit; ſith the importunacie of ſuch as loue & honour you, and who couet to haue your fathers vertues deſcend with his inheritance, hath obteined the publiſhing of that learned ſermon: wherin you maie at good leaſure view in the laſt report of his life & death the paterne & forme of true nobilitie.

The death of the earle much lamented.

The heroicall deſcription of true nobilitie.

The heroicall deſcription that the biſhop maketh of nobilitie, comparing it vnto a mounteine, from which foure famous riuers muſt iſſue (the mounteine true religion, the riuers, prudence, iuſtice, fortitude, and temperance) is a rule to you: firſt to follow your father in truth of religion, then to be as he was, wiſe, iuſt, valiant, and temperat. The naturall and vnforced courteſie & affabilitie that was in your father, and that excellent mixture of diſpoſition and aptneſſe, both for warre and peace, doth promiſe to the world a ſingular perfection in you hereafter. For as your grandfather (who died in his yong yeares) did make ſhew of much more honour than was in the noble vicount his father: and this our earle by famous actions did altogither eclipſe the vertuous hope conceiued of your grandfather: ſo conſidering that God in nature continueth as it were the race by outward ſhew of good parts in you, and that you haue more aduantage of education, both by the place where you liue, and by the honour and wiſedome of your patrons than your grandfather or father had; we can not but hope of a further degree of excellencie in you to ouerthine the goodneſſe both of your father and grandfather.

A perſuaſion reaſon to moue the yong earle now liuing to an excellent imitation of his anceſtors.

Some people there be that can hardlie diſcerne betweene honour & profit, that do ouermuch thinke of the diſaduantage offered you by the earle your father, in diminiſhing ſome part of his patrimonie in his forren ſeruices; and will with you perhaps with a contrarie courſe to deſerue more of your heire, and worſe of the world. But as I wiſh in you a liberall frugalitie vnder this rule and profeſſation, that nothing can be profitable that is not honeſt: ſo to deſerue well (as your father did) of your ſouereigne and countrie in matters apperteining to hir maieſties obedience, rather throw the belue after the hatchet, and leaue your ruines to be repared by your prince, than anie thing to degenerat from honourable liberalitie. And as in attempting great things, it is good to be circumſpect, and with iudgment wiſelie to foreſee the end before you begin: ſo hauing entered into anie honourable attempt that maie be iuſtlie grounded vpon reaſon, follow the ſame with ſuch inuincible conſtancie in all extremities as your father did, for ſo ſhall you iuſtlie deſerue like teſtimonie as hir maieſtie gaue to him in hir gratious letters: namelie, that he was a rare iewell of hir realme, and an ornament of hir nobilitie.

Notable counſell to the earle to deſerue well of his ſouereigne and countrie.

The queenes teſtimonie of the earle.

True religion and wiſedome (vpon whome iuſtice dependeth) do proceed from God by grace, and therefore by inuocation, praier, and ſtudie to be obteined: but the other vertues, as fortitude, temperance, courteſie, affabilitie, liberalitie and conſtancie, be peculiar to your houſe, deſcending by nature, and grafted as it were in your principles. So that to degenerat into the lothſome contraries of theſe, & in ſtead of the habit of vertue, to diſguiſe your ſelfe with vice, ſhall be harder to you, and more impoſſible for the contrarietie of your nature, than to atteine in good things to the perfection of excellencie. And to the end that you may know what you are by birth and bloud, and that you should not by ignorance or lacke of knowledge of your selfe, do anie thing unworthie the noble houses from whense you are descended: a wellwillet of yours hath joined to this sermon (amongst other epitaphs conteining your fathers due praises) his stately descent in well digested Latine verses: not to puffe you up with anie swelling vanities, but to give you a reason how you beare your armour and badges of honour; and to remember you what errour you enter into, if you should blemish the vertues of your noble ancestours, or to do anie thing (as I said) unworthie your birth and calling.

Vertues naturallie incident to the erle by courſe of deſcent.

To what end the epitaph genealogicall was added to the funerall sermon.

Lastlie my lord, have always before your eies the feare of God, and the counsell of the earle your father at his death: namelie, that you should ever be mindfull of the moment of time, assigned both to your father and grandfather, the eldest having attained but to six and thirtie yeares, to the end that upon consideration of the short course of life that you in nature are to looke for, you might so employe your tender yeares in vertuous studies and exercises, as you might in the prime of your youth become a man well accomplished to serve hir maiestie and your countrie, as well in warre as peace: whereunto he commanded you to bend all your indevours, & with those conditions heaped his blessings upon you. I praie therefore that God will increase those conditionall blessings, and the causes of them in you, to the end that hir maiestie may thinke of you hereafter as of a true servant and humble subiect, one of the pillers of hir estate, hir maiesties kinsman by manie aliances, and the sonne of a most noble father.

The old earls counsell at his death to the yong earle now alive touching the shortnesse of life.

Your L. at commandement E.W.

Thus much concerning the two earles, the father departed, and the sonne surviving, of whose proceeding in the steps of his father, there is no doubt but within few yeares the world shall have full cause (as there is present hope) to beare witnesse: whome in all his attempts we will leave to such fortunat successe, as God the giver thereof shall vouchsafe to provide and afford.]

The tenth of November a proclamation was published for the free traffike of merchants to be restored as had been accustomed in times past betwixt the kingdoms and countries of the queenes maiestie of England and the king of Portingall, which traffike had been discontinued by reson of certeine stales and arrests made of diverse subiects on both parts, both their goods & ships. But now it was accorded in name of both their maiesties, that all maner of both their subiects of what kingdome or countrie so ever they be, from the fifteenth of the said moneth, might use the like mutuall traffike for merchandizes, and in the same places: that is to saie, hir maiesties subiects in the kingdomes of Portingale & Algarbia, and in the Iles of Medera and Azore: and likewise the subiects of the king of Portingale in England and Ireland, as they were lawfullie accustomed before the said arrests. This restitution of the said traffike to remaine from the said fifteenth daie of November in this yeare one thousand, five hundred, seaventie and six, during the space of three yeares next insuing. At the end of which terme, if by the said princes in the meane time it be not otherwise provided for continuance of the said traffike to indure perpetuallie, no new arrests shall be made of anie things brought into the kingdoms and Iles aforesaid, of either of the said princes during the time of the said three yeares. It was further agreed by the said princes for the more sure preservation of the amitie and friendship betwixt them, their said realmes and subiects, that neither of them shall receive anie pirat or rover into anie of the ports or creeks of either of their realmes, dominions, and countries, which may or shall have committed anie piracie or robberie upon either of their subiects, nor shall shew anie favour, give anie aid or succor, or suffer anie to be given directlie or indirectlie to the said rovers or pirats. Neither shall they during the time of the said amitie, in either of their kingdoms, or anie place of their dominions, favour, interteine, receive or reteine, nor suffer to be favoured, interteined, received, or retetined by anie of their subiects, anie rebels, traitors, or fugitives, subiects to either of them.

A proclamation for the free traffike of merchants as before, &c.

Thus farre have I continued this collection of the English histories, noting breefelie in these later yeares, such things as I find in the abridgement of Richard Grafton, and in the summarie of Iohn Stow, increased somewhat (as may appeare) in places with such helpes as have come to my hand; humblie beseeching the reader to accept the same in good part, and to pardon me where I have not satisfied his expectation: sith herein I must confesse, I have nothing contented my selfe, but yet at the request of others have doone what I could & not what I would, for want of conference with such as might have furnished me with more large instructions, such as had beene necessarie for the purpose.

THE CHRONICLES OF

England, from the yeare of our Lord 1576, where Raphaell Holinshed left; supplied and continued to this preſent yeare 1586: by Iohn Stow, and others.

A Diſciple of Socrates, by name Ariſtippus, a man ſuerlie of a verie ſharpe iudgement and pleaſant wit, when he was demanded what profit he tooke by the ſtudie of wiſedome, made this anſwer: Forſooth this profit, that with all ſorts of men I can frankelie and boldlie ſpeake. Which anſwer might well be of that mans making; bicauſe he bare a mind indifferentlie free, as well from hope as feare: for he ſerued no man, nor yet flattered anie perſon, nor otherwiſe behaued himſelfe than his hart gaue him. Of the ſame mind it were to be wiſhed that all ſtorie-writers were: for then ſhould Chronicles approch next in truth to the ſacred and inuiolable ſcripture, and their vſe not onelie growe more common, but alſo of greater account. And right good reaſon whie. For therein is conteined the rich and pretious treaſure of time, the wiſeſt counſellor vnder the cope of heauen. And that ſaw Thales the philoſopher well inough, who being aſked what of all was the eldeſt? anſwered, God: what of all the faireſt? the world: what of all the greateſt? place: what of all the ſwifteſt? the mind: what of all the ſtrongeſt? neceſſitie: and what of all the wiſeſt? time. Time in Greeke is called χρόνος, whereof the word Chronicles ariſeth, termed τὰ χρόνικα, that is, obſeruations of time: ſo that if nothing in wiſedome dooth excell time, then who can but wax wiſe by reading and peruſing the obſeruations of time, which are meerelie & ſimplie Chronicles? Chroniclers therefore deſerue a reuerence of dutie, whome time hath called and culled out as it were by the hand, to vſe their miniſterie and ſeruice for the diſpoſing and diſtributing of the riches of his wiſedome to all ages, that ſucceſſors may be taught by their predeceſſors, wit by their follie, fealtie by their diſloialtie, obedience by their rebellion, vnitie and peace by their diſſention, plainneſſe by their doubleneſſe, ſobrietie by their vntemperance, courteſie by their churliſhneſſe, pitie by their vncharitableneſſe; finallie all goodneſſe by their badneſſe; for the which (as we may ſee by a ſea of examples in this booke) ſith they were greeuouſlie puniſhed, it is our gaine by their ſmart to be admoniſhed.

For surelie herein standeth a speciall vse of chronicles, that whilest some offending against the lawes of God, of nature, and of nations, doo draw vnto themselues deserued vengeance: others by loue allured, or by feare inforced, seeing their rufull fals, and auoiding the meanes, may happilie escape the paine. This frute hitherto hath this historie of chronicles afforded, no lesse heereafter by the continuation following is like to be performed; besides manifold matters of recreation, policie, aduentures, chiualrie, &c. abundantlie ministred; and all vnder the golden reigne of blessed queene Elisabeth, the sweet floure of amiable virginitie;

Cui vitam, studiúmque Deus, regnique coronam
Perpetuet, beet, & tranquillo fœdere iungat
Pòstque hanc exactam vitam, studium atque coronam,
Cœlesti vita, studio, diademate donet.

THE CONTINVATION of the chronicles of England from the yeare of our Lord 1576, to this present yeare 1586, &c.

1. Stow. In vnnaturall brother murthereth his naturall brother, but the vnnaturall brother was hanged as he well deserued.

THe tenth day of November, in the citie of Worcester, a cruell & vnnaturall brother (as an other Cain) murdered his owne naturall & louing brother, first smiting his braines out of his head with an ax, and after cutting his throte to make him sure, and then buried him vnder the hearth of a chimneie, thinking thereby (though wrongfullie) quietlie to haue inioied his brothers goods long before in his possession: but not long after this secret murder comming to light, the murderer was rewarded according to his deserts, and to the terror of such vnnaturall murdering brethren. The seuententh of March, through a strange tempest which hapned in the North, nere to a towne called Richmond, not onelie cotages, trees, barnes and haiestakes, but also the most part of the church called Patrike Brumton was ouerthrowen, with most strange sights in the aire, both fearefull and terrible.

Tempest in Richmondshire.

1577 Tower on London bridge taken downe.

In the moneth of Aprill, the decaied stone house called the tower vpon London bridge was begun to be taken downe, and the heads of traitors that were wont there on poles to be fixed, were remoued thense, and set on the gate at the bridge foot toward Southwarke. The seuentéenth daie of Maie, Richard Robinson goldsmith was drawne from the tower of London to Tiburne, and there hanged for clipping of gold. The one and thirtith daie of Maie, Martin Frobisher with one ship and two barks furnished for that purpose, sailed from Harwich in Essex towards Cataia by the northwest seas, and entered the streicts beyond quéene Elizabeths foreland, about thirtie leagues, where he went on shore, and finding store of the blacke stone, which the goldfiners had said to hold gold, and therefore called the same gold ore, he straught his ship & barke, caught a man, a woman, and a child of that countrie, and then on the foure and twentith of August returning from thense, arriued at Milford hauen in Wales on the twentith of September next following.

Strage sicknesse.

The fourth, fift, and sixt daie of Julie, the assises being holden at Oxford, there was arreigned and condemned one Rowland Jenkes, for his seditious toong, at which time there arose amidst the people such a dampe that almost all were smouldered, verie few escaping that were not taken at that instant: the iuros died presentlie, shortlie after died sir Robert Bell lord chiefe baron, sir Robert de Olie, sir William Babington, maister Wineman, maister de Olie high shiriffe, maister Dauers, maister Harecombe, maister Birls, maister Phetipace, maister Greenewood, maister Foster, maister Nash, sergeant Baram, maister Stephans, &c. There died in the towne of Oxford three hundred persons, and sickened there, but died in other places two hundred and od, from the first of Julie to the twelfe of August, after which daie died not one of that sickenesse, for one of them infected not an other, nor anie one woman or child died thereof.

Assise at Oxford.

¶ Of this sickenesse there passed a report in print, published vnder the name of W. B. who (as he saith himselfe) was present with sir William Babington, and therefore was able, and did (as he thought good) set downe the certeintie of that heaule accident, for the satisfaction of such friends of his as desired to know the vndoubted truth. And the same W. B. setting downe the opinion, that diuerse conceiued of this venemous maladie, saith that some supposed it to be of two sorts; howbeit (saith he) it is not so. For those that bled till they died, stroue so much with their sickenesse, that the bloud issued out at their vents: but yet had perfect memorie, euen to the yéelding of their breath, as was verie well perceiued by sir William Babington, who neuer ceased to call vpon God in his great agonie, &c. This reported W. B. as a certeine truth, to stop the fleing rumors of those that (as he saith) haue spoken vntrulie in this behalfe, and published their owne fantasies.]

Ab. Fl. ex relatu W. B. impress. 1577.

Tempest in Suffolke.

On sundaie the fourth of August, betweene the houres of nine and ten of the clocke in the forenone, whilest the minister was reading of the second lesson in the parish church of Blibrough a towne in Suffolke, a strange and terrible tempest of lightening and thunder strake thorough the wall of the same church into the ground almost a yard déepe, drawe downe all the people on that side aboue twentie persons, then renting the wall vp to the reuestre, cleft the doore, and returning to the steeple, rent the timber, brake the chimes, & fled toward Bongie a towne six miles off. The people that were striken downe were found groueling more than halfe an houre after, whereof one man more than fortie yeares and a boie of fiftéene yeares old were found starke dead: the the other were scorched. The same or the like flash of lightening and cracks of thunder rent the parish church of Bongie, nine miles from Norwich, wrong in sunder the wiers and wheles of the clocks, slue two men which sat in the belfreie, when the other were at the procession or suffrages, and scorched an other which hardlie escaped. The tower on London bridge being taken downe, and a new foundation drawne, sir John Langlete lord maior of the citie of London laid the first stone on the eight and twentith daie of August, in the presence of the shirifes of London & the two bridgemasters, which new tower was finished in the moneth of September, Anno 1579.

The tower on London bridge new builded.

Anno Reg. 20. Cuthert Maine executed. An example of sorcerers, and such as seeme to worke wonders to deceive men of their monie.

The thirtith daie of November, Cuthert Maine was drawne, hanged, and quartered at Lancelton in Cornewall for preferring Romane power. The seuenteenth of Januarie, one Simon Penbroke dwelling in saint Georges parish in Southwarke, being a figuretlinger, and vehementlie suspected to be a conjurer, by commandement of the ordinarie iudge for those parties, appeared in the parish church of saint Saulors in Southwarke, at a court holden there. Which Simon being buried in interteining a proctor, and having monie in his hand, leaned his head vpon a pew wherein the proctor stood: which after he had done a certeine space, the proctor began to lift vp his head to see what he ailed, and found him departing out of life, and streightwaie the said Simon fell downe, ratling a little in the throte, and neuer spake word after. This was done euen as the iudge came into the church, who said it was the iust iudgement of God towards those that vsed sorcerie, and a great example to admonish other to feare the iustice of God. After, his clothes being opened, there were found about him fiue diuelish bookes of conjuration, and most abhominable practises, with a picture of tin of a man, hauing three dice in his hand with this posie: Chance dice fortunatlie; & diuerse papers of such like matters, as he had dealt in for men, such men I meane as are mentioned in Leuiticus the twentith chapter and first verse: If anie soule turne himselfe after such as worke with spirits, and after sothsaiers, to go a whoring after them (saith the Lord) I will put my face against that soule, and will cut him off from ameng my people.

Nelson and Sherewod executed.

The third daie of Februarie, John Nelson for deuiseng the quenes supremacie, and such other traitorous words against hir maiestie, was drawne from Newgate to Tiburne, and there hanged, bowelled, and quartered. And on the seuenth of the same moneth of Februarie, Thomas Sherewin was likewise drawne from the tower of London to Tiburne, and there hanged, bowelled, and quartered for the like offense. The fiue and twentith of Februarie, John de Loy a Frenchman, and fiue English gentlemen, was conueied from the tower of London towards Norwich, there to be arreigned and executed for coining of monie counterfeit. And on the ninth of March, seuen pirats were hanged at Wapping in the ouze beside London.

Counterfetters of coine executed.

Pirats hanged.

1578

The ladie Margaret countesse of Lennox deceased on the tenth of March, at hir house in the parish of Hackneie besides London, and was buried at Westminster on the third of Aprill. The one and thirtith and last of Maie, Martine Frobisher with fiftéene saile of good ships, manned, victelled, and otherwise well appointed, departed from Harwich in Essex on his third voiage towards Catais. And on the one and thirtith and last daie of Julie, after manie attempts, and sundrie times being put backe by Ilands of ice in the streicts, he recouered his long wished port, and came to anchor in the Ilands, newlie by hir maiestie named Meta incognita, where (as in the yeare before) they straight their ships with the like stone or gold ore out of the mines; and then on the last of August returning thense, arriued safelie in England about the first of October.

Frobishers third voiage.

The two and twentith of Januarie being thursdaie, about seuen of the clocke at night, John Casimere countie palatine of Rhen, duke of Bauare, landing at the tower of London, was there by diuerse noble men and others honourablie receiued, and conueied by cresset light and torch light to sir Thomas Gresh-ams house in Bishops gate street, where he was receiued with sounding of trumpets, drums, fiefs, and other instruments of musicke, and there both lodged and feasted till sundaie next, that he was by the nobilitie fetched and conueied to the court at Westminster, where after he had talked with hir maiestie, he returned vnto Summersets house at the Strand, and was there lodged. In the weeke following he hunted at Hampton court. On sundaie the first of Februarie he beheld a valiant iusting and running at the tilt at Westminster. On the next morrow in the same place he saw them fight at barriers with swords on horsse backe. On tuesdaie he dined with the lord maior of London; on wednesdaie with the dutchesse of Suffolke, at hir house called the Barbican in Red crosse street; on thursdaie at the Stilliard, &c. On sundaie the eight of Februarie, the queene made him knight of the garter, by deliuering to him the collar, & putting the garter on his leg at White hall. And on the fourteenth of Februarie, he departed from London to Rochester homewards, with great rewards giuen to him by the quenes maiestie, the nobilitie, men of honour, the lord maior of London, and other citizens of that citie.

Anno Reg. 21. The receiuing of Casimere.

1579 Deepe snow

The same moneth of Februarie, to wit, on the fourth daie, and in the night next following, fell such abundance of snow, that on the first daie in the morning, the same snow was found in London to lie two foot deepe in the shallowest, and otherwise being driuen by the wind, verie boisterous in the northeast on banks one ell or a yard & a half deepe. In the which drifts of snow, farre deeper in the countrie, manie cattell, and some men and women were ouerwhelmed and lost. It snowed till the eight daie of that moneth, and friseld till the tenth, and then followed a thaw with continuall raine a long time after, which caused such high waters, and great floods, that the marishes and low grounds being drowned for the time, and the water of the Thames rose so high into Westminster hall, that after the fall thereof, some fishes were found to remaine in the said hall.

Great land waters.

A murtherer hanged on Mile end greene.

The seuenteenth of Februarie, an Irishman for murdering of a man in a garden of Stepenheth parish, was hanged in chaines on the common called Mile end greene. This common was sometimes, yea in the memorie of men yet liuing, a large mile long (from White chappell to Stepenheth church) and therefore called Mile end greene, but now at this present, by grédie (and as seemeth to me vnlawfull) inclosures, and building of houses, notwithstanding hir maiesties proclamation to the contrarie, it remaineth scarse halfe a mile in length. The twentith daie of Februarie deceased sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper of the great seale of England, who was honourablie buried vnder a sumptuous monument or tombe (by him in his life time erected) in S. Pauls church of London, on the ninth daie of March. This sir Nicholas Bacon in his life time gaue for six scholers, to be found in Bennets college in Cambridge, to each of them three pounds six shillings and eight pence the yeare for euer.

Lord keeper deceased.

¶ The said sir Nicholas Bacons tombe aforesaid, bearing ing certeine representations of his wiues and children in imagerie worke, is adorned with a notable epitaph, wherein is pithilie described the meanes whereby he grew to be noble, as also immortall. The same being conteined in these verses following, and iustifiable by the verie epitaph, whereof this is a true transcription, & great pitie but it shuld be perpetuall.

Great snow in the moneth of Aprill.

This yeare in the moneth of Aprill, to wit on the foure and twentith daie, fell such a snow betweene the hours of foure of the clocke in the morning, & nine of the clocke before none of the same daie, that in London the same snow was found to lie one foot deepe.

Sir Thomas Bromleie lord chancellor.

The 25 daie of Aprill, sir Thomas Bromleie knight was made lord chancellor of England.

The chancellors of England, collected out of sundrie ancient histories.

The collection of Francis Thin.

THe creation of this sir Thomas Bromleie lord chancellor, hath occasioned me to treate of the chancellors of England, a matter which I haue beene the willinger to set downe, because I would minister cause to others (who haue long wanted of their cunning in this matter) to impart to the world some of their great knowledge herein, to the benefit of their countrie. But since I doubt that they will not accept this in good part till that come. And as I may, & perhaps doo (in this) somewhat more largelie (than in the iudgement of others shall seeme answerable to the most receiued opinion, touching the chancellors) treat of the antiquitie of them; so yet I haue no mind to erre, or to leade anie other into error. Wherefore, if things be not in perfection vpon this first rough hewing (as nothing is at the first so erquisit, as time doth not after amend it) yet disdaine it not, sith this may giue more light than before was knowen. And I determine God willing, either to amend, or to confesse and auoid in the large description of their liues, whatsoeuer imperfections haue now distilled out of my pen, either for mistaking or misplacing of name, person, or time; and so to the matter.

It hath beene some question amongst the best antiquaries of our age, that there were neuer anie chancellors in England, before the comming of Edward the confessor out of Normandie, whome they suppose to haue brought the same officer with him from thense into this realme. But sith I am with manie reasons and ancient authorities led to beleue the contrarie; I will imbrace the contrarie opinion thereunto, and hold in this discourse (as the order thereof shall prooue) that there were chancellors before saint Edwards time; for the confirmation whereof and for the authoritie of them; for the etymologie and originall of the name, and for the continuance of their office, thou shalt find an ample discourse in my booke purposelie written of the liues of the chancellors, whereunto I wholie refer thee: who I hope shall within these few yeares be partaker thereof, and in the meane time giue thee this taste of the age and names of the chancellors, and vicechancellors, and such keepers of the great seale, as serued in place of chancellors. For euerie one that was keeper of the great seale, was not intituled chancellor, no more than euerie chancellor was intituled the keeper of the greatseale. But because the one did serue in the vacancie of the other (so that after a certeine sort, the keeper of the great seale was vicechancellor, and possessed the place, though not the name of a chancellor; as in our age, sir Nicholas Bacon did: we therefore haue set downe the names of the one and the other, as they followed in succession of time, after this manner.

Turketill.

Turketill chancellor to Ethelbald, who began his reigne about the yeare of Christ 718, which Turketill gaue sir manours to the abbeie of Croiland, as I haue seene noted.

Saint Swithin.

Saint Swithin bishop of Winchester was chancellor, and chiefe of councell to the great monarch king Egbert, though some attribute him to Edgar, which Egbert began his reigne about the yeare of Christ 802.

Wilfinus.

Wilfinus, chancellor to king Athelstan, who began his reigne in the yeare of our redemption nine hundred and foure and twentie.

Adulphus.

Adulphus, chancellor to king Edgar, who began his reigne in the yeare that the world became fleshy, nine hundred fiftie and nine: of this man speaketh Hugo Petro Burgensis; and Leland calleth this Adulph Cancellarium & archigrammatum: chancellor or chiefe secretarie.

Hist. Elienſ. lib. 2. written in the time of K. Stephan.

Alfius or Aelfius the second abbat of Elie, chancellor to king Ethelred, who began his reigne in the yeare of Christ nine hundred seuentie and eight, this man, being by Ethelwold bishop of Winchester, consecrated abbat at the appointment of the said king Ethelred or Egelred, and being then abbat of Elie, when Ethelred gaue with his commandement that the abbat of Elie should then, and for euer, be chancellor; I doubt not to place him here amongst the chancellors: the proofe of which matter I haue here verbatim set downe, out of the second booke of the historie of Elie. Statuit (which was Ethelred) atque concessit quatenus ecclesiam de Eli, ex tunc & semper in regis curia cancellarij ageret dignitatem, quod etiam aliis sancti videlicet Augustini & Glesconiæ ecclesijs constituit, vt abbates istorum cœnobiorum vicissim adsignatis succedendo temporibus annum trifariè diuiderent, cum sanctuarijs & cæteris ornamentis ministrando: &c.

Leofricus.

Leofricus Bathonicus chancellor to Edward the confessor, in the yeare of Christ one thousand fortie and fiue, and some yeares before: this man was bishop of Cridington in Cornewall, which see was after translated to Excester.

Wilfinus.

Wilfinus, or Wulfinus chancellor to Edward the confessor, in the latter end of the said yeare of Christ one thousand fortie and fiue, being the third yeare of his reigne; this man cannot be he which some would haue to be Wilfinus the abbat of Westminster. For that Wulfinus died one and fortie yeares before this Wulfinus the chancellor; sith that Wulfinus was made abbat of Westminster, about the yeare nine hundred fiftie and eight, and died in the yeare one thousand and foure; being bishop of Shireburne. Yet I will not at this time iudiciallie resolue, although I suppose it true, whether this Wilfinus the chancellor, and Wulfinus the bishop of Lichfield, witnesse to a deed, wherein Edward the confessor granted certeine liberties to Leofwine, abbat of the abbeie of Couentrie, built by Leofrike erle of Mercia, be all one man or no. Againe, there is an other man which was abbat of saint Albons called Wulfinus, which for affinitie to the name of this man I thought onelie to touch in this place.

Resen-

Resenbaldus. Resenbaldus, or Rembaldus, for I take them both by manie and ancient authorities to be all one man; was chancellor to Edward the confessor, and seale bearer, witnesse amongest others; to manie deeds which I haue seene of the confessors; some dated in the yeare one thousand three score and six, and some otherwise. He was buried at Cirencester, or Cicester.

Mauricius. Mauricius chancellor to William the Conqueror in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three score and seuen, being the first and part of the second yere of William the Conqueror.

Osmundus. Osmundus, after bishop of Sarum, chancellor to William the Conqueror, in the yere one thousand three score and seauen, and after in the yere one thousand three score and fifteene, about the ninth yeare of the kings reigne.

Arfastus. Arfastus bishop of Helmane, who translated his see from Helmane to Tetford, was chancellor to William the Conqueror, in the yere of Christ one thousand three score and eight, being in the second and third yere of the Conqueror, and also in the yere one thousand seuentie and seuen, being about the tenth yeare of William Conqueror.

Hirmanus. Hirmanus that was first made bishop of Suring or Wilton, and translated his see from Wilton to Shirburne, from thense to Sarum; he is that Hirmanus which I suppose was chancellor to William the Conqueror, and called Hirmannus, and that wrote the life and miracles of saint Edmund king of the Eastangles.

William Melson. William Melson borne of a noble house, chapleine and chancellor to William the Conqueror (as hath Robertus Montensis) succeeded Arfastus in the bishoprike of Tetford, to whom by the gift of William Rufus succeeded in that see Herbertus Losinga abbat of Ramsete, which translated the bishops see to Norwich; of which Losinga were (as hath Matthew Westminster) these verses here set downe compiled:

Surgit in ecclesia monstrum genitore Losinga,
Simonidum secta, canonum virtute resecta,
Petre nimis tardas, nam Simon ad ardua tentat,
Si præsens esses, non Simon ad alta volaret,
Proh dolor! ecclesiæ nummis venduntur & ære,
Filius est præsul, pater abbas, Simon vterque.
Quid non speremus, si nummos possideamus?
Omnia nummus habet, quid vult facit, addit & aufert,
Res nimis iniusta, nummus sit præsul & abbas.

William Gifford. William Gifford bishop of Winchester was chancellor in the time of the Conqueror, and of William Rufus, of Henrie, who made him bishop of Winchester in the yeare one thousand and one hundred, and was consecrated in the yere of Christ one thousand one hundred and seuen: though it seemeth that Robert Bluet came in place of this William Gifford, remoued about the fourth of the same Rufus from his office of chancellorship, as I suppose will be well proued, but after placed againe in that office. Of the death of this William is much contrarietie, for Matthew Westminster placed it three seuerall yeares, the eight and twentith and nine and twentith yeare of Henrie the first, and againe in the yeare of Christ one thousand one hundred fortie and two, being the seuenth yeare of king Stephan.

Robert Bluet. Robert Bluet, Bloet, or Bloscit made chancellor in the yere of Christ one thousand and ninetie, being the fourth yeare of William Rufus, he was made bishop of Lincolne in the yeare of our redemption one thousand ninetie and two: but as it appeareth to me by some authoritie that I haue seene, he did execute that office being bishop of Lincolne: he died at Woodstocke in the yeare of Christ one thousand one hundred twentie and three, being about the three and twentith yere of the reigne of Henrie the first, whose epitaph Henrie Huntington reciteth in this manner:

Pontificum Robertus honor, quem fama superbe
Perpetuare dabit, nec obiturus obit:
Hic humilis, diues (res mira) potens, prius vltor,
Compatiens, mitis, quam pateretur erat,
Noluit esse suis dominus, studuit pater esse,
Semper in aduersis murus & arma suis:
In decima Iani mendacia somnia mundi
Liquit, & euigilans vera per hennè vidit.

Ranulphus. Ranulphus in the time of William Rufus, which might be that man which was after chancellor in the time of Henrie the first.

Waldricus. Waldricus chancellor to Henrie the first, about the yeare of our Lord one thousand one hundred and three, being the third yeare of his reigne.

Herbertus. Herbertus chancellor in the fourth yeare of Henrie the first, in the yeare of our saluation one thousand one hundred and foure (as appeareth by an anonymall pamphlet in written hand) of whome I am not yet resolued whether this were Herbertus Losinga bishop of Norwich or no.

Roger. Roger bishop of Salisburie, whome Henrie the first called a meet chapleine to serue souldiors, was chancellor to king Henrie the first, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand one hundred and one, being the first yere of king Henrie the first, and in the yere one thousand one hundred and seuen, about the seuenth yeare of the said Henrie the first, being chosen bishop in the yere of Christ one thousand one hundred and two, and consecrated in the yeare one thousand one hundred and seuen.

Galfridus. Galfridus Rufus bishop of Durham, witnesse to a deed wherein Henrie the first confirmed to the priorie of Christs church a peece of ground without Aldgate called Knighton guild, in the presence of Gefrie chancellor, Gefrie Clinton, and William Clinton: he was also chancellor in the two and twentith yere of Henrie the first, and so vntill the three and thirtith yeare of the reigne of Henrie the first, and then was made bishop of Durham, which Gefrie died about the yere of our redemption one thousand one hundred fortie and one.

Ranulphus. Ranulphus, called by Matthew Westminster Ranulphus, chancellor to Henrie the first, and Richard the chapleine, keeper of the great seale, being at one time. This Ranulph was chancellor in the yeare of Christ one thousand one hundred and sixteene, being the sixteenth of king Henrie the first, in which office I suppose that he continued, vntill the yeare of Christ one thousand one hundred twentie and three, being the three and twentith of the said Henrie, in which yeare this chancellor (for so is he then called) fell from his horse and brake his necke on a hill not far from Dunstable, where the king kept his Christmasse.

Reginald. Reginald chancellor to king Henrie the first, as Leland hath set him downe, writing in this sort in his notes of Pontacute abbeie: Reginaldus cancellarius, so named (belike) of his office, he was a man of great fame about king Henrie the first: he fell to religion, and was prior of Pontacute, and inlarged it with great buildings and possessions, &c.

Roger. Roger bishop of Salisburie againe chancellor in the latter end of the reigne of king Henrie the first, and in the beginning of king Stephan, in the yere of Christ one thousand one hundred thirtie and six, which Henrie the first died in the yeare of our redemption one thousand one hundred thirtie and fiue, being the fiue and thirtith yeare of the reigne of the said Henrie. This Roger died in the yeare of Christ one thousand one hundred thirtie and nine, being about the fourth yeare of king Stephan.

Godfrey. Godfrey chancellor to Henrie the first (as I gather out of Matthew Parker in the life of William Corbell or Corbeis) the six and thirtith archbishop of Canturbu-

an. Reg. 21.

Canturburie, to which dignitie this William was aduanced in the three and twentith yeare of Henrie the first, being the yeare of Christ 1123, of which Godfreie the said Matthew further writeth in this sort, speaking of the said William the archbishop returned from Rome with the pall: Deinde Alexandrum Lincolniensem episcopum Cantuariæ, Godefredum regni cancellarium Bathoniensem episcopum Londini consecrauit. Concerning which Godfreie we will speake more hereafter in the liues of the chancellors, onelie at this time setting downe that this Godefredus was the quænes chapleine, and could not be that Galfridus before named, which was bishop of Durham; for this Godefredus died sir yeares before that Galfridus, for this bishop of Bath died in the yeare of our Lord 1135, being the last of king Henrie Beauclerke, and the first of king Stephan; & that bishop of Durham died in the yeare of our Lord 1141, being about the first yeare of the said king Stephan; and this Godfreie was the second bishop of Bath and Wels after the uniting of those two cities to one bishoprike by John de Towres, the first bishop of those two places in the yeare of our Lord 1092, being about the fift yeare of William Rufus.

Alexander bishop of Lincolne. Alexander bishop of Lincolne (as may be after a sort gathered out of Wilhelmus Paruus lib. 1. cap. 6.) being cousine or nephue to Roger bishop of Salisburie was chancellor: the words of which W. Paruus be these: Eidem (that was to king Stephan) quoque sublimato in regem, se (that was Roger bishop of Salisburie) talem exhibuit, vt obsequiorum gratia præclaram apud illum habere fiduciam videretur. Tantis ille beneficijs ingratus, & in ipsum episcopum (cuius opera nunquam episcopalia fuere) vltor diuinitus ordinatus, eundem tanquam exigui hominem momenti primo carcerati custodia, postmodum eum cibi inopia, & nepoti eius (qui cancellarius fuerat regis) intentato supplicio ita coarctauit, vt duo illa præclara castella (which were the castels of Vise otherwise called de Deuises, and the castell of Shirburne) in quibus thesauri eius erant reposita resignaret. Thus much Wilhelmus Newburgensis, the truth whereof I leaue to other to consider, sith the words of those authors may be diuerslie expounded, either that this Alexander was chancellor, or his sonne, or else the sonne of Roger bishop of Salisburie. But be it any or none of them, as the truth shall hereafter be made plaine, yet bicause I haue mentioned Alexander in this place, I thinke it not amisse to set downe such verses as Henrie Huntington hath recited of this Alexander, which are:

This was about the beginning of the fourth yeare of K. Stephan, being An. Do. 1138, but Mat. Paris giueth it to An. Dom. 1139: who saith, Collo sibi qui cancellarius fuit lacum anne, &c. And Henrie Huntington agreeing wholie with W. Paruus.

Splendor Alexandri, non tam reniteſcit honore,
Quàm per eum reniteſcit honor, flos námque virorum,
Dando tenere putans theſauros cogit honoris,
Et gratis dare feſtinans ne danda rogentur,
Quod non dum dederit non dum ſe credit habere
Oh decus! oh morum directio! quo veniente,
Certa fides, hilaris clementia, cauta poteſtas,
Lene iugum, doctrina placens, correctio dulcis,
Libertáſque decens, venere pudórque facetus.
Lincoliæ gens magna prius, nec maxima ſemper,
Talis & iſte diu ſit nobis tutor honoris.

Robert. Robert chancellor of England in the time of king Stephan, but I find not in what yeare, bicause the charter is without date, neither can I learne what he was, bicause I know not his surname.

Philip. Philip chancellor to king Stephan, about the fourth yeare of his reigne, being about the yeare of our Lord 1139, witnesse to manie deedes which king Stephan made to the monks of Elie, and to Nigellus the bishop of that see.

Reinold. Reinold abbat of Walden, whome I haue seene in one anonymall briefe written chronicle to be termed chancellor: but in what time he liued, or what other name he had I do not yet know, but by the course of the historie much about this time.

John. John chancellor of England in the time of king Henrie the second, but what he was or in what yeare of king Henrie he liued I do not know, and therefore leaue it to him that both can and ought to giue life to these persons whom he imprisoneth in the east castell of London; not doubting but in time he will do his countrie good, and correct other men; though now he be so streict laced, as that he will not procure anie furtherance of other mens trauels.

Thomas Becket. Thomas Becket made chancellor (as some write) in the first yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the second, others saie in the fourth yeare: but the best authors agree that he gaue ouer the seale in the yeare of Christ 1162, being the eight yeare of the victorious prince the said Henrie the second against the will of the prince, he died in the yeare of our redemption 1170, as these verses do proue, being such as the curiositie of that superstitious age would permit:

Pro Chriſto, ſponſa Chriſti, ſub tempore Chriſti,
 In templo Chriſti, verus amator obit,*
Anno mileno, centeno, ſeptuageno,
Anglorum primas corruit enſe Thomas.
Quis moritur? præſul: cur? pro grege: qualiter? enſe:
Quando? natali: quis locus? ara Dei.

* Christes church in Canturburie.

Rafe Warneuile. Rafe Warneuile archdeacon of Rone and treasuror of the church of Yorke, was made chancellor about the yeare that the word became flesh 1173, being about the eightéenth yeare of king Henrie the second: of this man speaketh Matthew Paris and Matthew Westminster.

Walterus de Constantijs. Walterus de Constantijs archdeacon of Oxford after bishop of Lincolne, in the yeare of our redemption 1182, from whense he was aduanced in the yeare 1184, being the one and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the second vnto the archbishoprike of Rone, of this man is more spoken in my discourse of the protectors of England pag. 1069.

Geffreie. Geffreie the ballard sonne to king Henrie the second, after that he had surrendered the bishoprike of Lincolne, whereof he was neuer consecrat bishop, but kept the place and receiued the reuenues, was made chancellor much about the six and twentith yeare of king Henrie the second, being the yeare of Christ 1180: yet be there some that saie he resigned the bishoprike in the seuen and twentith yeare of king Henrie the second, in the yeare of Christ 1181. The difference whereof groweth (as I suppose) for that some accompt the beginning of the yeare of our Lord from the first of Januarie, as all other nations of Europe do; some from the birth of Christ, as we in England did long time since the conquest; and some from the fiue and twentith of March, on which it is supposed that the world began first to be created: which last accompt we in England (and the Scots as hath Lesleus) do keepe, together with them of Genoa or Gene in Italie, contrarie to the order of all other nations. The begining of which maner of accompt amongst vs I cannot as yet certeinlie learne: but I suppose it began much about the time of king Edward the third, for all the former historiographers begin the yeare from the birth of Christ.

William Longchampe. William Longchampe the proud bishop of Elie, legat of England for the bishop of Rome, chiefe iustice of the south and west parts of England, and deputie of that part of the realme, when Richard the first went to the warres of the holie land, was made chancellor in the said first of king Richard, being the yeare of our redemption 1189: of the sumptuous feast of whose inthronization thus writeth Ferthulphus (or Ferculphus) by the waie of comparison:

Præuiſis alijs, Elienſia feſta videre,
Eſt quaſi præuiſa nocte videre diem.

He died in the yeare of Christ 1197, going to Rome, in the abbeie of Pimie, being of the charterhouse order.

der. About which time in the first yeare of Richard the first, there was a vicechancellor called Malus Catulus.

Eustachius. Eustachius deane of Salisburie, was chancellor of England, being elected bishop of Elie the third ides of August, in the yeare that the word became flesh 1196, being the ninth yeare of king Richard the first, of whome thus writeth Matthew Parker, in the life of Hubert archbishop of Canturburie, contrarie to that which others affirme, writing that Eustachius succeeded William Lonchampe in the office of chancellor, and in the bishoprike of Elie. The words of Matthew Parker in the life of Hubert be these: Hubertus deposito magistratu ciuili, ecclesiæ curæ totus vacabat, consecrauitque postea Robertum de Salopesbi episcopum Banchorensem, & Eustachium qui in cancellary munere ei successit Elienſem episcopum, Westmonasterij debita accepta ab vtroque subiectionis professione.

Hubert Walter or Walter Hubert. Hubert Walter or Walter Hubert, for such a transmutation of the name is vsed by authors, being first bishop of Salisburie and then archbishop of Canturburie, was made chancellor shortlie after the coronation of king John, which was in the yeare that the virgine brought forth Christ 1199, at what time a certeine noble man said vnto him in scorne, I haue often seene of a chancellor made a bishop, but I neuer before saw an archbishop made a chancellor.

Simon. Simon or rather Hugh, of which is more hereafter, archdeacon of Welles in the first yeare of king John (after as I suppose that Hubert had left the office being so disgraced & abased as he thought) was witnesse to a deed, in which king John granted to the citizens of Yorke a guildhall, hanse, and other liberties, as I haue seene noted in the copie of the same charter, for which cause I haue here set it downe as an other man, although in truth I am fullie resolued that this Simon and the Hugh following were all one person, leauing it yet for euerie mans iudgement.

Hugh de welles. Hugh de Welles archdeacon of Welles, witnesse to the deed in which king John, in the first yeare of his reigne, confirmed to the monasterie of Westminster, Gittlep or Islep in Oxfordshire, in which house Edward the confessor was borne, he was made bishop of Lincolne about the tenth yeare of king Johns reigne, in the yeare of our Lord 1209, and died in the yeare of our Lord 1235.

Walter Bzaie. Walter Bzaie chosen bishop of Chester, in the yeare of our Lord 1210, was bishop of Worcester and after bishop of Yorke, a man of extreame age, was made chancellor in the seuenth yeare of king John as one anonymall chronicle saith, to hold that office during his life. Others saie that he was made chancellor in the yeare of Christ 1209, being the tenth yeare of king John after Hugh de Welles. But I suppose he surrendred that patent to hold it during his life, when he came to be bishop of Yorke. Of this man is more spoken in my treatise of the protectors of England, pag. 1069.

Richard de Marischo. Richard de Marischo, whom Matthew Paris termeth Tholenarius, as it were tolegatherer or treasuror if you list, being archdeacon of Northumberland, was chancellor in the fourth yeare of king John, as appeareth by a deed that I haue seene: and further he was made chancellor in the 15 yeare of king John, in which office he continued to the 17 yeare of the said king, and as some do write during king Johns life, and died about the calends of Maie in the yeare of our redemption 1226, in the tenth yeare of the long reigne of king Henrie the third, as some haue. But the booke of Durham saith, that he was made bishop of that see by Gwado the legat, and consecrated by Walter Bzaie bishop of Yorke, in the yeare of our redemption 1214, being about the sixteenth yeare of king John, and died suddenlie at Peterborow the first daie of Maie, in the yeare of Christ 1226, being the tenth yeare of king Henrie the third, after that he had béne bishop of Durham nine yeares, of whom a monke of Durham made this epitaph in formall deuise as you see following:

Culmina qui cupiſti — laudes pompásque ſiri
Eſt ſedata ſi — ſime penſare veli
Qui populos regi — memores ſuper omnia ſa
Quod mors immi — tis — non parcit honore poti — tis Vobis præpoſi — ſimilis fuerem bene ſci
Quod ſum vos eri — ad me currendo veni

And here sith I am entered into the surname of Marischus, I will set downe what I found ingraued on the wall of the doze of the chapter house of the monasterie of Bath (almost defaced with the wether) written in Greeke Saxon characters. ✠ Hic iacet Alexander de Alueto, & Ernluerga vxor eius, & Fulco de Alueto filius eorum: & Lucia de Mariſcis filia eius, & Iordanus de Mariſcis filius eiuſdem Luciæ, & Wilhelmus de Mariſcis filius eiuſdem Iordani. Which name of the Mariches, Marshes, or Mores, if it like them to expound it, as I doubt not but manie will quiddle therevpon, was as great a name in Ireland as it was in England.

Rafe Neuill bishop of Chichester. Rafe Neuill was confirmed (as it seemeth) chancellor by the whole consent of the nobilitie, in the yeare that the word became flesh 1226, being about the tenth yeare of king Henrie the third, after which he was made bishop of Chichester in the eleuenth yeare of king Henrie the third, being the yeare of our redemption 1227, or as hath Matthew Westm. he was made bishop of Chichester in the yeare of Christ 1223, being before chancellor. After which the king in the two and twentith yeare of his reigne, offended with Neuill, tooke from him the great seale, & deliuered it to Gefreie of the temple, as hath Matthew Paris, and to John de Lerinton: although that the said Neuill remained still chancellor, and receiued the profits thereof, to whom the king would after haue regiuen the seale in the yeare of Christ 1239, being the three and twentith yeare of the said king Henrie, but Neuill would not receiue it. This man died in the yeare of Christ 1243, being the seuen and twentith yeare of king Henrie the third, at his palace at London not far from the new temple.

Gefreie the Templer. Gefreie the Templer & John de Lerinton were made keepers of the great seale. But shortlie after this Gefreie had the seale taken from him, bicause he grew in mislike of the nobilitie in continuall prouoking them to anger.

Hugh Pateshall chanon of Paules. Hugh Pateshall chanon of Paules is by Matthew Paris fol. 656, called chancellor in the three and twentith yeare of king Henrie the third, which I much doubt to be true. Of this man shall be more said in the treasurors of England.

Simon the Norman. Simon the Norman keeper of the great seale in the three & twentith yeare of king Henrie the third, being the yeare of our Lord 1229: he had the seale shortlie after taken from him, and was banished the court, bicause he would not seale the patent, whereby Thomas earle of Flanders might take foure pence for custome of euerie sacke of woll that came out of England into Flanders. This Simon died in the yeare of Christ 1249, being the three and thirtith of king Henrie the third.

Richard Grasse abbat of Euesham. Richard Grasse or Grossus abbat of Euesham (the said Simon expelled) had the keeping of the great seale in the three and twentith yeare of king Henrie the third, he kept the seale three yeares, and being chosen bishop of Chester, he resigned the same in the yeare of Christ 1242, being the six & twentith yeare of king Henrie the third: he died (being wise & learned in the canon and ciuill law) in the same

yeare in Gascoine, in a citie called in Latine Riola or Regula, where he was buried.

John de Lerinton. John de Lerinton was againe made keeper of the seale in the six and twentith yeere of king Henrie the third, being the yeare of our redemption 1242, to execute that office, Rafe Neuill being in life and still chancellor, but in the kings disgrace, shortlie after which this Neuill died. This John Lerinton died 1257, being the 41 yeare of Henrie the third.

Ranulfe Briton. Ranulfe Briton (as I read) is said to be chancellor and treasuror of the chamber, about the seuen and twentith yeare of Henrie the third, being the yeare of our Lord 1242. I suppose that he onelie had the keeping of the great seale as the rest had before him, during the life of Rafe Neuill, and so I leaue him to the iudgement of others, sith Matthew Paris continuallie nameth him treasuror and once chancellor, who suddenlie died after dinner beholding plaiers at dise, in the yeare of Christ 1246, being the thirtith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third: of whom thus writeth the said Matthew Paris in his greater historie fol. 954. Ranulphus Brito quondam domino familiarissimus regi & reginæ (multis posthabitis nobilibus) & eiusdem cancellarius specialis, quum post mensalem refectionem aleatores certatim insexisset colludentes, lætalis apoplexiæ inexpectato vulnere corruit sugillatus.

Rafe Neuill bishop of Chichester.

Syluester de Euersden. Sylvester de Euersden receiued the great seale the nine and twentith yeare of Henrie the third, being the yeare that the son of God became flesh one thousand two hundred fortie and six: he was vicechancellor & consecrated bishop of Carleill (being a man most cunning in the custome of the chancerie) in the yeare of Christ 1247, being the one and thirtith yeare of Henrie the third.

John Mansell. John Mansell treasuror of Yorke, parson of Maidstone in Kent, and parson of Wigan, chancellor of Paules, maister or ruler of Beuerleie, chiefe iustice of England, one of the priuie councell to Henrie the third, his chapleine, ambassador into Spaine, and a worthie souldier, crossed to go to Jerusalem, who at one feast had two kings, two quéenes, and I know not how manie noble men, and whose spirituall liuings were about foure thousand marks of yerelie reuenues (as I haue gathered) he was at the will and instance of the king made keeper of the great seale as vicechancellor (for Matthew Paris saith, Custodiam sigilli regij accepit tancellarij vices acturus & officium) about the one & thirtith of king Henrie the third, in the yeare that God tooke on him the forme of a seruant 1247, he built a house of regular canons at Romneie two miles from the sea. To this man king Henrie the third, in the thirtith yeare of his reigne, did grant that his towne of Wigan should be a burrow.

Geffrey the Templer.

Hugh Patehall chanon of Paules.

John de Lerinton. John de Lerinton, being after chiefe iustice of the forest from the riuer of Trent southward, was againe keeper of the great seale, vntill some part of the two and thirtith yeare of Henrie the third, in the yeare of Christ 1248.

Simon the Norman.

John Mansell. John Mansell againe keeper of the great seale, who at Woodstocke in the two and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the third, did receiue the great seale of the said John Lerinton, which he kept (as I suppose and that with some good profe) vntill the three & thirtith yeare of the said king, being the yeare of our redemption 1248. Of which John Mansell thus writeth an old anonymall chronicle concerning the barons warres: Sed & Johannes Mansell multarum in Anglia ecclesiarum rector seu potius incubator, reddituum quoque quorum non erat numerus possessor magnificus, ita quòd ditior eo clericus non videbatur in orbe episcopali, puta dignitate minimè insignitus, metu baronum aufugit & latenter vltra mare de turri London, in qua rex Angliæ & regina sua tunc temporis tenuerunt se. Quem quum Henricus filius regis Alemaniæ fugientem insequeretur, & ipse capitur quum applicuisset Bononiæ à magistro Gerando de Fenes procuratore vt putabatur reginæ, &c.

Richard Grasle abbat of Euesham.

Radulphus de Diceto. Radulphus de Diceto was chancellor (as I read & suppose) much about this time: but for certeintie I refer the same to the large booke of their liues, where he shall not faile to haue his right time and place.

William of Kilkennie. William of Kilkennie, being a modest, wise, and faithfull man, learned in the canon and ciuill lawes, was made keeper of the great seale, in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred and fiftie, being the foure & thirtith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third. He was elected to the bishoprike of Elie, as saith the historie of Elie, the eighteenth kalends of September, in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred fiftie & fiue, being about the nine and thirtith yere of Henrie the third. But others saie that he being then vicechancellor, was elected bishop of Elie in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred fiftie and foure, being the eight and thirtith yeare of Henrie the third, after that he had faithfullie and to his great commendation vsed and borne the great seale, he was cõsecrated to that bishoprike in the yere of Christ 1255, and died in the yere 1256 being about the one and fortith yeare of king Henrie the third, whose heart was buried at Elie.

Henrie de Wingham. Henrie de Wingham was made chancellor in the nine and thirtith yeare of Henrie the third, and continued in the one and fortith and two and fortith yeare of Henrie the third, in which yeare (as some haue) and in the 43 of Henrie the third (as others haue.) He was chosen bishop of Wincheſter, vpon condition that he should giue place to Athelmer halfe brother to king Henrie the third, & son to Hugh Brune earle of March, and of Eleanor king Henrie the thirds mother, being banished by the barons, if that he should againe returne into England, and then leaue the bishoprike of Wincheſter vnto him, which he did vpon the comming againe of the said Athelmer into England, and for that cause was after chosen bishop of London, being chosen thereto in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred fiftie and nine, being the three and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the third, and still chancellor, and is buried in Paules on the south side of the quier (next to Eustachius bishop of London) in a monument of marble, with this inscription on the wall to tell who it was: Hic iacet Henricus de Wingham quondam episcopus huius ecclesiæ, qui multa bona contulit ministris ecclesiæ sancti Pauli.

Walter Merton. Walter Merton chancellor in the foure and fortith yere of king Henrie the third, being the yeare 1260.

Nicholas of Elie. Nicholas of Elie made chancellor by the barons, in the said yeare of our redemption one thousand two hundred and sixtie, and Walter Merton displaced. But king Henrie the third, disdaining to haue officers appointed him by his subiects, did in the moneth of October following, in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred and sixtie, or rather one thousand two hundred sixtie and one, depriue the said Nicholas, and replaced the said Walter Merton.

Walter Merton bishop of Rochester the second time made chancellor as before appeareth. Walter Merton the second time.

John de Chesill. John de Chesill archdeacon of London and treasuror of England, was made keeper of the great seale, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand two hundred sixtie and foure, being the eight and fortith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third. This man was consecrated bishop of London in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred seuentie & foure, the third kalends of Maie, as hath Matthew Westminster: he died in the yeare that the word of the father became flesh one thousand two hundred seuentie and nine, the fourth ides of Februarie, in the seuenth yeare of the scourge of the Scots and Welshmen.

Vita Thomæ Cantelupi.

Thomas de Cantelupe, borne of the noble house of the lords Cantelupes (the son of William Cantelupe and Philesent, which as saith Leland drew hir originall from the countesses of Pozke) being archdeacon of Stafford, was doctor and after bishop of Hereford in the yeare one thousand two hundred seuentie and six, and before that made chancellor, after the feast of saint Peters chaire, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand two hundred sixtie & fiue, being the nine and fortith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third. He died beyond the seas comming from the court of Rome, in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred seuentie and eight, being the sixt yeare of the reigne of king Edward the first, or more truelie (as others haue) in the yeare one thousand two hundred eightie & three, being the eleuenth yeare of king Edward the first, whose bones were brought to Hereford.

Walter Giffard bishop of Bath and Welles.

Walter Giffard bishop of Bath and Welles, whome manie do call William, did inioy the state of the chancellor, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred sixtie & six, being the fiftith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third: he was translated from Bath to Pozke, in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred fiftie and nine, being the nine and fortith yeare of the same Henrie the third, and died the seuenth kalends of Maie in the twelfe yeare of his bishoprike, in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred seuentie & seuen, being the sixt yeare of king Edward the first, or (as hath Nicholas Triuet) in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred seuentie and nine, being the seuenth yeare of king Edward the first.

Geffrey Gifford.

Geffrey Gifford was chancellor also in the one and fiftith yeare of king Henrie the third, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand two hundred sixtie and seuen. This man was bishop of Worcester about the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred ninetie and nine, where he sat foure and thirtie yeares, foure moneths, and foure daies, and died in the yeare one thousand three hundred and foure, being about the two and thirtith yeare of king Edward the first.

John de Chesill.

John de Chesill was the second time honoured with the place of the chancellor, in the yeare that the word became flesh one thousand two hundred sixtie and eight, being the three and fiftith yeare in which king Henrie the third of that name did hold the scepter of England.

Richard de Middleton.

Richard de Middleton, so surnamed of the place where he was borne, was aduanced to the office of the chancellorship, in the said three and fiftith yeare of king Henrie the third, in the moneth of Julie, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand two hundred sixtie and eight, and was also (as appeareth by a charter which I haue seene) witnesse to the same deed, in the foure and fiftith yeare of the said king Henrie, who (as farre as I can gather) died in August, in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred seuentie and one, being the six and fiftith yeare of the long gouernment of king Henrie the third. There was a writer of England that wrote many volums of this name liuing at this time, whom I doubt not (for anie thing that I can yet learne) to be the same man which was chancellor.

John de Kirbie.

John de Kirbie, after the death of Richard Middleton, was made keeper of the great seale in the said six and fiftith yere of king Henrie the third. Whether this were the same John Kirkbie, which after was bishop of Elie, and treasuror of England, I haue not as yet to determine, although I rather hold the affirmatiue than the contrarie.

Walter Merton.

Walter Merton the third time made chancellor of England, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred seuentie and three, being the first yeare of the reigne of that famous prince king Edward the first of that name: he was bishop of Rochester, and built Merton college in Oxford, and died in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred seauentie and eight, being the sixt yeare of the reigne of king Edward the first.

Robert Burnell.

Robert Burnell the eleuenth bishop of Bath and Wels (after the uniting of those two sees in one by John de Toures in the yeare of Christ one thousand ninetie and two) was made bishop of Bath in the yeare of our Lord (as saith Euersden) one thousand two hundred seuentie & foure, and chosen archbishop of Canturburie in the yeare one thousand two hundred seuentie and eight, but refected by the pope: he was chancellor in the second yeare of the said Edward the first, in which place it seemeth that he long continued: of whom thus writeth an anonymall chronicle; Dominus Edmundus comes Cornubiæ fundauit nouum studium ordinis Cisterciensis apud Oxonias, & monachos de Thame primò ibidem introduxit, & dedit eis prima donatione manerium de Erdington, & fecit dedicare locum abbatiæ tertij idus Decembris: per dominum Robertum Burnell episcopum Bathon & Welles, cancellarium regis, & posuit fundamentum nouæ ecclesiæ eodem die Northosneiæ. This bishop was required with the son of Edward the first, and Gilbert de Clare earle of Glocester, in the time of Edward the first, to be deliuered for pledges for Lhewelin prince of Wales for his safe returne, if he came to the parlement, whereunto he was summoned by the said king Edward. In the time of this chancellor the court of chancerie was kept at Wistow. This man died in the yeere of Christ one thousand two hundred ninetie and three, being the one and twentith yere of the reigne of king Edward the third.

John de Langhton.

John de Langhton made chancellor of England in the yeere of our Lord one thousand two hundred ninette and three, being the one and twentith yeare of the scourger of the Scots, king Edward the first, in which office he remained vntill the thirtith of the said king, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred and two. He was made bishop of Chichester about the six and twentith or rather the seauen and twentith yeare of king Edward the first, being the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred ninette and eight, or rather one thousand two hundred ninetie and nine: and in the said yeare one thousand two hundred ninetie and nine he was before chosen bishop of Elie, but refected by the pope, who made him archdeacon of Canturburie: from which Langhton this Edward did take the great seale in the thirtith yeare before said, and deliuered it to John Drokensford.

Matthew Parker.

John Drokensford.

John Drokensford keeper of the wardrobe was made keeper of the great seale in the thirtith yere, as before, in which office he continued from about the fiftéenth daie of August vntill Michaelmas.

William de Greinfield.

William de Greinfield, deane of Chichester, and canon of Pozke, was aduanced to the place of the chancellor, in the yeare that God became man one thousand three hundred and two, being about the thirtith yeare of the said king Edward the first, which office was giuen vnto him at saint Radigunds (as saith Anonymus M.S. He was after chosen bishop of Pozke, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred and three: who in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred and eight buried the bodie of the said king Edward the first at Westminster, though that king died in the yeare of our Lord God one thousand three hundred and seauen. This bishop died about the yere of our saluation one thousand three hundred and fiftéene (being about the first yeare of king Edward the second) at Calwood, after that that he had béene biſhop nine yeares, eleuen moneths, and two daies, and was buried in ſaint Nicholas porch of Yorke, receiuing his conſecration at Rome in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand three hundred and fiue (after that he had béene there two yéeres) of pope Clement. This Greinfield was a man verie eloquent and pithie in counſell.

William de Hamelton.

William de Hamelton, deane of Yorke, was created chancellor of England, in the yeare that the virgine brought forth the ſonne of God one thouſand three hundred and fiue, being the three and thirtith yeare of that noble prince king Edward the firſt. This William ſurrendred his borrowed life in the yeare of our Lord one thouſand three hundred and ſeuen, being about the fiue and thirtith yeare of the ſaid king, at the abbeie of Fontneſſe in Yorkſhire, being a man that well deſerued of the commonwealth.

Ralfe Baldocke.

Ralfe de Baldocke choſen biſhop of London, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand three hundred and three, was confirmed at Tiſnehall by Robert of Winchelſeie biſhop of Canturburie, and conſecrated at Lions by Peter of Spaine biſhop of Alba, the third calends of Februarie, in the yere of our redemption one thouſand three hundred and fiue. He was made lord chancellor of England, after the death of the ſaid William Hamelton in the ſaid fiue & thirtith yere of king Edward the firſt, and receiued the great ſeale in the Rogation weeke following, being ſome foure or fiue weekes after that he was aduanced to that office at the exchekер. Shortlie after which died king Edward the firſt; for which cauſe the ſaid Baldocke ſent the great ſeale to king Edward the ſecond then at Carleill, by reaſon of his fathers death. This Ralfe Baldocke died on ſaint James éeuen in the yeare of our redemption one thouſand three hundred and thirtéene, being the ſeuenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the ſecond.

John Langhton.

John Langhton biſhop of Chicheſter againe made lord chancellor of England, in the yeare that the word of the father toke on him the forme of a ſeruant one thouſand three hundred and ſeauen, being the firſt yeare of king Edward of Carnaruan, in which office it ſéemeth that he continued, vntill the yeare of our Lord one thouſand three hundred and ten, being the third yeare of the reigne of the after depoſed king Edward the ſecond.

William Melton.

William Melton, hauing two others ioined with him, had the great ſeale deliuered vnto them for a certeine time, to execute all ſuch things as were to be done therewith during the kings pleaſure. This man was a canon of Yorke, prouoſt of Beuerleie, treaſuror of England, and archbiſhop of Yorke, as ſaith Anonymus M.S. He was conſecrated biſhop of Yorke at Rome, where he tarried two yeares for the ſame: he was a man neuer wearied with trauell. He firſt of all the biſhops of Yorke (after a long controuerſie betweene the deane and canons of Yorke) viſited the chapter by due order: he was wiſe, rich, ſeuere in correction, gentle, familiar, and humble: he finiſhed the weſt part of the church of ſaint Peters in Yorke with three hundred pounds, he was archbiſhop of Yorke two and twentie yeares, fiue or ſix moneths, and two daies: he died at Cawood on ſaint Georges éeuen, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand three hundred and thirtie, and was buried in the minſter of Yorke nére to the font.

Walter Reinolds.

Walter Reinolds biſhop of Worceſter, treaſuror of England and archbiſhop of Canturburie, was made keeper of the great ſeale, and chancellor of England on the firſt of Julie one thouſand three hundred and ten, in the ſaid yeare of our Lord God one thouſand three hundred and ten, being the ſaid third yeare of that king Edward, whome his ſonne Edward the third depoſed from his kingdome. Of this man & all other chancellors, which were archbiſhops of Canturburie, ſhall be ſomewhat more ſaid at another time, in the order and placing of the biſhops of that ſée; which caution I haue here ſet downe, becauſe I would once for all make repetition thereof in one place, and not ſeuerallie in manie places, vnder the ſeuerall names of euerie chancellor that was inueſted with that metropolitan honor of Canturburie.

John de Sandall.

John de Sandall clerke, biſhop of Wincheſter, & treaſuror, was at Yorke made chancellor of England, in the yeare that the virgin Marie was deliuered of the firſt begotten ſon one thouſand three hundred and foureteene, being the eight yeare of king Edward the ſecond, in which place he continued two yeares and more; ſome part thereof being after that he was biſhop of Winchеſter (as I gather) and then deliuered backe the ſeale at Weſtminſter, in the yeare of our redemption one thouſand three hundred and ſeuenteene, being the eleauenth yeare of the ſaid king Edward the ſecond. Of this man is more ſpoken in the treaſurors of England.

John Hotham.

John Hotham biſhop of Elie was created lord chancellor of England in the yere of Chriſt one thouſand three hundred and ſeauenteene, being the eleauenth yeare of king Edward the ſecond, in which office he continued vntill the yeare of our Lord God 1319, being the thirteenth yeare of the laſt before named king Edward. During whoſe gouernment of the ſée of Elie, in the yeare one thouſand three hundred fortie and one, the ſteeple of the chaire fell downe, which made ſuch terrible noiſe and ſhaking of the ground that it was ſuppoſed to haue béene an earthquake. He died of the palſeie in the yere of our redemption one thouſand three hundred thirtie and ſix, being the tenth yeare of that king Edward the third that firſt wrote himſelfe king of both realmes, England and France.

John Salmon biſhop of Norwich.

John Salmon biſhop of Norwich was aduanced to be chancellor, in the yeare that God toke on him the forme of a ſeruant, one thouſand three hundred and nineteene, being the thirteenth yeare of that king Edward the ſecond, againſt whome the nobles rebelled for the miſdemeanor of Piers de Gauеſtone (the Gaſcoine) earle of Cornewall. In this yeare one thouſand three hundred and nineteene (as ſaith one anonymall chronicler M.S.) was William Airemine keeper of the ſeale vicechancellor taken priſoner by the Scots. The words of the which author for the more certeintie thereof we haue here ſet downe, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand three hundred and nineteene. Epiſcopus Eborum, epiſcopus Eliæ theſaurarius, abbas beatæ Mariæ Eborum, abbas de Selbie, decanus Eborum dominus Willielmus Arymenee vicecancellarius Angliæ, ac dominus Iohannes Dabeham cum 8000 fermè hominum, tam equitum quàm peditum & ciuibus properanter * ciuitatem egredientes, quoddam flumen * Swale nuncupatum ſparſis cuneis tranſeuntes, & indiſpoſitis ſeu potiùs confuſis ordinibus cum aduerſarijs congreſſi ſunt. Scoti ſiquidem in martegnari amplitudinem eorum exercitus cautè regentes, in noſtros agminibus ſtrictis audacter irruerunt, noſtrorum denique in breui laceratis cuneis atque diſſipatis, corruerunt ex noſtris tam in ore gladij quàm aquarum ſcopulis ſuffocati, pluſquam 4000, & capti ſunt domini Iohannes de Pabeham miles & dominus Willielmus de Arymenee vt præfertur de cancellaria, &c.* Which William Airemenée was alſo in the fifteenth of the ſaid king Edward the ſecond, one of the keepers of the great ſeale, as I haue ſéene regiſtred.

* Dr Pabeham. * Yorke. * Twelue miles from Yorke.

Robert Baldocke.

Robert Baldocke archdeacon of Middleſex, a man euillie beloued, and whom the old Engliſh chronicle calleth a falſe péeld prieſt, was made chancellor of England in the ſeauenteenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the ſecond, at the caſtell of Pike-Histor. episc. Norwich.

ring in Yorkeshire, he was after made bishop of Norwich, and did his fealtie for restitution of his temporalties in the nineteenth yeare of the said king Edward the second at Woodstocke in Oxfordshire, he was apprehended in the 20 yeare of Edward the second, being the yere of our Lord 1326, or (as others haue) one thousand three hundred & fiue and twentie, & first committed to the custodie of Adam Carleton or de Orleton bishop of Hereford, & after was put in the prison of the Newgate in London, in which twentith yeare of the said Edward the second the great seale was againe deliuered to William Airemé, who I suppose was then also made bishop of Norwich, and this Baldocke deposed from that see, of which Baldocke thus writeth a Polychronicon of Durham: Robertus de Baldocke cancellarius An. 1325 captus cum Hugonibus de despensers, quia clericus fuit & sacerdos in noua porta Londiniarum, poni fecit Edwardus princeps & Isabella mater eius, vbi pro nimia miseria mortuus fuit infra breue.

William Airemce keeper of the seale.

John Hotham bishop of Elie.

John Hotham bishop of Elie the second time was at Westminster made chancellor of England, in the yeare that the word became flesh 1326, being the first yeare of the reigne of that king which first intituled himselfe king of England and France: but he continued not long in the same office, for he was removed in the second yeare of the said king, being the yeare of our redemption, one thousand three hundred twentie and eight. He was elected bishop in the yere of Christ one thousand three hundred and sixténe, in which place he ruled twentie yeares, and died in the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred and six and thirtie of the palsey at Summertham, being buried in the church of Elie vnder a goodlie monument of stone, with the image of a bishop carued out of alabaster vpon his towne.

Henrie Cliffe master of the rolles.

Henrie Cliffe master of the rolles had the charge and keeping of the great seale of England, in the said yeare of Christ 1328, being the second yeare of king Edward the third, and was the kings chancellor also.

Henrie Burghwalh bishop of Lincolne.

Henrie de Burgh, Burghwalh, or Burgesse, nephue vnto sir Bartholomew Bladismere baron of Leeds in Kent, hauing béene treasuror of England, inioied the honor of the chancellor in the second yére of king Edward the third, being the yeare that the sonne of God toke on him the forme of a seruant 1328, and was made chancellor at Northampton, which office he did not long inioie. Here bicause I haue a little mentioned sir Bartholomew Bladesmere, I will saie somwhat more of him, which is, that being orator for the king in diuers weightie affairs, he spent in those businesses 15000 pounds of the kings monie, and yet produced little or nothing to effect in the kings causes, except the procuring of this Henrie Burghwalh to the bishoprike of Lincolne, who was buried in the east end towards the north of the church of Lincolne, at whose feet was also buried Robert his brother a knight of great fame in the warres, in which church is also buried Bartholomew sonne to the said Robert. They founded a grammar schole, and fiue prests, & fiue poore scholars in Lincolne.

John Stratford.

John Stratford bishop of Winchester, and after of Canturburie, and sometime treasuror of England, was made chancellor of the realme, in the yére of our redemption one thousand three hundred and thirtie, being the fourth yeare of the said king Edward the third, who being sent in the first yeare of Edward the third, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred two and thirtie, ambassador beyond the seas about the affaires of the king & kingdome, did not (like cardinall Wolsele the chancellor in the daies of K. Henrie the eight) presumptuouslie carrie the great seale with him beyond the seas, but left the same in his absence with others, who both could and would answer the well or euill vsing therof whilest he was in France. This man continued in the office vntill the eight yeare of Edward the third.

Richard de Burie, otherwise called Richard de Angerule (being borne in a little village beside saint Edmundsburie, commonlie called the Berrie abbeie, was so surnamed Burie of that place) had to his father sir Richard Angerule knight. This man being first kept at schole by his vncle sir John Willobie priest, was afterward treasuror of England, chancellor and bishop of Durham: to which place of chancellorship he was aduanced in the yeare that the second person in trinitie was brought into the world 1334, being the eight yeare of that king of England which first quartered the armes of England and France. Which office he receiued by the kings gift at Westminster, in which yeare he was inthronized (being first consecrated bishop in the yere of Christ 1333) in the bishoprike of Durham by William Cowton prior of Durham: he kept the see 11 years two moneths and 12 daies, & died in the yeare 1345, & was buried in the south angle of the church of Durham.

Richard de Burie otherwise called Richard de Angerule.

John Stratford the second time lord chancellor, being now archbishop of Canturburie, was installed therein at Yorke in the yeare of Christ 1335, being the ninth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third.

John Stratford archbishop of Canturburie.

Robert de Stratford or Strafford (as some haue written, but as I thinke corruptlie) being archdeacon of Canturburie (which office was first ordeined by Anselme archbishop of the said citie of Canturburie) was made chancellor of England on the foure and twentith date of March (being the éeue of the annuntiation of the virgin Marie) at Westminster, in the yeare that the word of the father toke on him the forme of a seruant 1336, being the eleuenth yeare of the gouernement of king Edward the third. He was after made bishop of Chichester, desiring to be remoued from that office of chancellorship, which was granted vnto him: wherupon he surrendered vp the seale to the said king Edward the third in the twelfe yeare of his reigne, being the yeare of our redemption 1338.

Robert de Stratford.

Richard de Bintworth chosen bishop of London, and confirmed by John Stratford archbishop of Canturburie at Otford in the tenth kalends of June 1338, was at Waltham aduanced to the honour of lord chancellor in the moneth of Julie, in the said yeare of Christ 1338, being the twelfe yeare of that king which first ordeined the knights of the order of the garter.

Richard de Bintworth bishop of London.

John Stratford the third time lord chancellor of England, in which office he did not now long continue.

John Stratford archbishop of Canturburie.

Robert bishop of Chichester, being the foresaid Robert Stratford, was againe made lord chancellor of England, in the yere of our redemption 1340, being the fourtéenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, who was put out of that office, and should with the treasuror of England haue bene sent into France for a pledge for the paiment of certeine summes of monie.

Robert bishop of Chichester.

Robert de Bourchier, borne of the honourable house of the lord Bourchiers, was in the towre of London made lord chancellor of England in December, in the said fourtéenth yeare of king Edward the third, being the yeare of our Lord 1340, though some saie he was made chancellor in the fiftéenth yeare of the said king.

Robert de Bourchier.

Robert Pernig, Pernicke, or Pernwicke, also treasuror of England, was made chancellor of England,

Robert Pernig iustice at the law.

Robert de Shaddington.

John Offord or Alford.

John Thorsbie.

William de Edington.

Simon Langham.

land in the yeare that the virgine brought forth the Messiah 1341, being the fiftéenth yeare of king Edward the third. He died in the yeare 1343, being the seuentéenth yeare of the foresaid king Edward the third. This man was a sergeant in the third yeare of Edward the third, when he began to plead as a sergeant, in which he continued vntill about the eleuenth yeare of Edward the third, and was after that iustice, treasuror, and chancellor, and did in the common place, being chancellor, sit and argue amongst the iustices, as appeareth in the law bookes of those yeares of Edward the third, of whom is last mention made in the seuentéenth yeare of Edward the third, where he is named chancellor.

Robert de Saddington. Robert de Saddington knight, was inuested with the dignitie of lord chancellor after the death of Perning in the yeare of Christ 1343, and the seuentéenth yeare of the often mentioned king Edward the third. There was also one sir Richard Saddington knight treasuror of England, of whome I haue spoken in my discourse of the lord treasurors.

John Offord or Ufford. John Offord or Ufford, deane of Lincolne, was made chancellor of England, in the yeare of our redemption 1345, being the nineteenth yeare of king Edward the third. He was elected to be bishop of Canturburie, and so was installed, but neuer receiued the pall. He died in the moneth of Maie, in the yeare of Christ 1349, being the three and twentith yeare of the reigne of that victorious king Edward, which neuer received greater honour than that he was father vnto Edward surnamed the Blacke prince the flower of chiualrie, and worthie conqueror of the French dominions.

John Thorsbie. John Thorsbie bishop of Worcester, archbishop of Yorke and cardinall, was installed in the seat of the lord chancellor, in the yeare that God became man, one thousand three hundred fortie and nine, being the three and twentith yeare of that king Edward the third, so often before recited, who at his great suite was discharged of the office of chancellor, by deliuerie of the great seale in November, in the thirtith yeare of the said king, being the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred fiftie and six, after that he had kept that place by the space almost of seauen yeres. He in the tenth yeare of his bishoprike in the third calends of August, began the frame of the quére of S. Peters church in Yorke, & laid the first stone therof, to which he gaue a hundred pounds. He died at Thorpe, and was buried at Yorke in the yere of Christ 1363, or as other haue 1373, after that he had béene archbishop one and twentie yeares, and one and twentie dates.

William de Edington. William de Edington, bishop of Winchester, lord treasuror of England, was made chancellor of this realme in November in the said yeare of Christ 1356, and the thirtith yeare of the reigne of that king Edward, which at Sauoie in England kept king John of France his prisoner. See more of him in the treasurors of England.

Simon Langham. Simon Langham, abbat of Westminster, bishop of Elie, archbishop of Canturburie, and lord treasuror of England, was made lord chancellor in Februarie, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred sirtie and three, being the seauen and thirtith yeare of the gouernment of king Edward the third, and was chancellor in the fortith yere of the reigne of that king: being the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred sirtie and three. Of this Simon were these verses made, when he was remoued from Elie to the bishoprike of Canturburie:

Exultent cœli quia Simon transit ab Eli,
Cuius in aduentum flent in Kent millia centum.

Of whome also, bicause he richlie indowed the abbeie of Westminster with great gifts, of singular cost & value, a certeine monke compiled these verses:

Reses de Langham tua Simon sunt data quondam, Octingentena librarum millia dena.

Of this man is more spoken in the former discourse or treatise of the lord treasurors of England.

William de Wikeham. William de Wikeham, so called of the place of his birth, was by surname from his parents called Perot, and Long, whome Leland maketh treasuror of England, which by anie possible meanes cannot be so for anie thing that I can yet learne. This man being bishop of Winchester, and aduanced to that place in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred sirtie and seuen, in the one and fortith yeare of the reigne of Edward the third, in which place he sat seauen and thirtie yeares, was sometime keper of the priuie seale, and made also chancellor of England, in the yeare that the virgine brought forth the first begotten sonne one thousand three hundred sirtie and seauen, being the one and fortith yeare of the gouernement of the foresaid Edward the third, in which office he remained about foure yeares; and (in March in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred seauentie and one, being the fiue and fortith of king Edward the third) did deliuer vp the great seale to the king at Westminster. He was buried in the bodie of Winchester church, which he new built with the other places about it: of whome were these verses composed for the building of his colleges, the one at Drenford and the other at Winchester:

Hunc docet esse pium fundatio collegiorum
Oxoniæ primum stat Wintoniæque secundum.

Robert Thorpe. Robert Thorpe knight, being before iustice of the law in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred and seauentie, was after at Westminster aduanced to the chancellorship, in March, the fiue & fortith yeare of king Edward the third, being the yeare of our redemption (as is before said) one thousand three hundred seauentie and one, who going home to his owne house, left the great seale with foure of the gardians or maisters of the chancerie, whereof the one was called Walter Powze, to keepe and vse as néed required.

Sir John Knluet or Knluell. Sir John Knluet or Knluell (as some bookes haue by the transcriber corrupted) was made chancellor of England in Julie, in the yeare of Christ one thousand three hundred seauentie and two, being the six and fortith yeare of king Edward the third, in which office he continued (as I for this time do gather) vntill the fiftith yeare of the said king Edward, in which yeare (as here at hand appeareth) came in place of the bishop of S. Dauids.

Adam de Houghton. Adam de Houghton, bishop of Menenia or of Saint Dauids in Wales, was aduanced to the office of lord chancellor in the yeare of our redemption 1376, being the fiftith yeare of king Edward the third, who in the one and fiftith yeare of the said king, was with the earle of Salisburie, and the bishop of Hereford, sent ambassador beyond the seas. ¶ And here I thinke it not amisse to set downe the originall of the rolles in chancerie lane in this sort.

Henrie the third did build a house for the Iewes conuerted to the faith of Christ, which house is at this daie (& hath béene long before this time) appointed for the kéeping of the kings rolles and records, being now called and knowne by the name of the rolles in chancerie lane besides Lincolns inne. In which house the maister of the rolles (for the time being) hath a goodlie and statelie lodging. In which also there is a faire chappell, called the chappell of the rolles, being a place commonlie appointed wherein men accustom to paie monie vpon contracts. Wherein also is buried John Yong, sometime maister of the rols and doctor of both laws, on the left side in his doctors wéed: and maister Allington vnder a state-lie tome of white marble, iet, and other rich stone, on the right side of the said chappell, the epitaphs of both which persons are hereafter recited: besides which in this chappell are the ancient records of all inrolments, confirmations of the prince, & of other sales in the chancerie kept in chests and pzesses, built on each side about the middle part of the chappell, beneath the chaire oz place of service. At the west end whereof (on certeine apointed daies therefoze) the maister of the rols doth in the afternoones sit in a place formed and railed in, after the manner of the courts of Westminster, to heare and determine matters depending in the chancerie: which maister of the rolles now liuing is sir Gilbert Gerrard knight, sometime generall attorneie to the noble pzincesse queene Elisabeth. And here before I leaue this chappell, I thinke it not amisse to set downe the epitaphs of the two persons before named there buried, with these words.

The epitaph of maister Alington is in this sort.

But after the death of this king Edward, the said William Burstall maister of the rolles (belike not supposing this to be a sufficient grant) procured this house by act of parlement, in the first yeare of king Richard the second, to be more stronglie established, to the vse of the maister of the rolles for the time. After which John de Waltham, maister of the rolles, after bishop of Salisburie and treasuror of England, procured K. Richard the second in the 6 yeare of his reigne, by his letters patents to confirme the said house to the said Waltham and his successors maisters of the rolles. And whereas by the patent of Edward the third, the maister of the rolles was appointed and installed in that house by the chancellor, it is to be noted, that the same manner of induction and installment continued as long as the maister of the rolles were of the clergie, as I haue seene set downe by others, and as the presidents of those installments and the writs themselues extant of record do well proue.

Sir Richard Scrope.

Sir Richard Scrope knight lord of Bolton, hauing beene lord treasuror in the time of the deceased king Edward the third, was now in October about the latter end of the yeare 1378, or the beginning of the yeare 1379, being the second yeare of the after deposed king Richard the second, made lord chancellor, and had the great seale deliuered vnto him, who in the third yeare of the said king at a parlement did surrender vp his office. Of this man is more set downe in the discourse of the treasurors.

Simon Sudburie.

Simon Sudburie, so surnamed of the place of his birth, but by descent called Tibold the sonne of Nicholas Tibold, descended of a gentlemanlie race dwelling at Sudburie in Suffolke. This Simon was archbishop of Canturburie, and made chancellor about the yeare of Christ 1380, in the third yeare of Richard the second, and was by the rebels beheaded at the towre of London, in the fourth yeare of the disquieted gouernment of that vnfortunat, but valiant king Richard the second; after whom in the first yeare of the said king Richard, was R. B. of London, whereof I haue seene and taken a note: which bishop was (as I coniecture & haue some authoritie to prowue) Robert Bratbrooke which followeth, & was made chancellor againe after sir Richard Scrope.

Sir Richard Scrope lord Scrope of Bolton.

Sir Richard Scrope knight lord of Bolton, made chancellor againe about the latter end of November, by the lords of the parlement (as I take it) in the first yeare of the reigne of king Richard last mentioned, and was the yeare following, being about the yeare of our Lord 1383 againe deposed from his office, and the king receiuing the great seale, kept it a certeine time, and therewith sealed such grants and writings as it pleased him, and in the end deliuered the same to Robert Bratbrooke. Of this man see more in the treasurors before.

Robert Bratbrooke bishop of London.

Robert Bratbrooke bishop of London made lord chancellor in September following the moneth of Julie, when sir Richard Scrope was deposed, was aduanced to that dignitie on saint Matthews eeue, in the first yeare of the reigne of the said king Richard the second, in which he continued not longer than the March following, as hath Anonymus M. S. he was consecrated bishop of London the first of Januarie 1381, he died the seuententh of August in the yeare 1404, being the fift yeare of king Henrie the fourth.

Michaell de la Pole earle of Suffolke.

Michaell de la Pole, or at Pole (as hath Thomas Walsingham) was made chancellor in the moneth of March, in the first yeare of the said king Richard the second, and was made earle of Suffolke in the ninth yeare of the said king, being after deposed from his office of chancellorship at his owne and earnest request in the tenth yeare of the said king. This man hauing fled the realme, for that he was pursued by the nobilitie, died at Paris in the thirteenth yeare of the said Richard the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1389, of whom that worthie poet sir John Gower, liuing at that time, in his booke intituled Vox clamantis, composed these verses:

Est comes elatus, fallax, cupidus, sceleratus,
Fraudes per mille stat cancellarius ille,
Hic proceres odit, & eorum nomina rodit
Morsibus à tergo, fit tandem profugus ergo:
*Sic Deus in cœlis mala * de puteo Michaelis*
Acriter expurgat ne plus comes ille resurgat.

* Michael de puteaco, or of the Pole.

Thomas Arundell bishop of Elie.

Thomas Arundell, of the noble house of the earles of Arundell, was first bishop of Elie, and then of Yorke, and last of all of Canturburie, he was made lord chancellor of England in the tenth yeare of the reigne of the vnfortunat king Richard the second, being about the yeare of our redemption 1386, in which office he remained about two yeares, as farre as my search will giue leaue to vnderstand.

William Wickham.

William Wickham was againe made lord chancellor of England, in the twelfe yeare of the said king Richard the second, but was in the end remoued from thense in September, in the fifteenth yeare of the troublesome gouernement of the said king Richard.

Thomas Arundell.

Thomas Arundell aforesaid was the second time created lord chancellor of England (in the said fifteenth yeare of king Richard the second) in place of William Wickham, in which office he remained about fiue yeares, and was deposed and banished the realme in the twentith yeare of the said king Richard.

John Scarle master of the rols.

John Scarle, Scirlée, or Serle, maister of the rolles, of the chancerie, and keeper of the great seale: he was chancellor, or in place of the chancellor, in the first yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the fourth, being the yeare in which the sonne of God descending from the bosome of his father, toke flesh in the wombe of his mother, one thousand three hundred ninetie and nine.

Edmund Stafford.

Edmund Stafford keeper of the priuie seale, bishop of Exceter, and sometime bishop of Rochester, and last of all bishop of Yorke, keeper of the priuie seale, and borne of the noble house of the Staffords, was made lord chancellor of England about the moneth of March, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand and foure hundred, being about the second yere of the vsurping king Henrie the fourth, in which office he continued vntill the yeare of our Lord one thousand foure hundred and three, being the fourth yeare of the said king Henrie the fourth. He being keeper of the priuie seale was made bishop of Exceter the twentith of June, in the yeare of our redemption one thousand three hundred ninetie & fiue, being the daie before king Richard the second began

the

the one and twentith yeare of his reigne. He was consecrated at Lambeth, and kept the see of Excester three and twentie yeares. He increased two fellowships in Stapletons inne in Oxford, reformed the statutes of the house, and called it Excester college: he died the fourth of September, in the seuenth yeare of king Henrie the fift, being the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred and nineteene. About the making of this Stafford chancellor (as farre as my memorie serueth) Ypodigma is much deceiued, if I haue not for want of the booke mistaken his iudgement.

Henrie Beaufort.

Henrie Beaufort, the sonne of Iohn of Gaunt by Katharine Swinesord, made bishop of Lincolne in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred ninetie and eight (as hath Ypodigma) was aduanced to the dignitie of chancellor in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred & three, being the fourth yeare of king Henrie the fourth his elder brother, by the daughter of the earle of Hereford, in which office he was in the fift yeare of king Henrie the fourth, and first of the same king (as our chronicles doo remember.) He was made bishop of Winchester in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred and foure, being the fift yeare of Henrie the fourth.

Thomas Langleie bishop of Durham.

Thomas Langleie priest, and bishop of Durham, was at Westminster made chancellor, in the yeare of our saluation one thousand foure hundred and fiue, being the first yeare of the reigne of the said king Henrie the fourth, in which office he continued (as farre as I know) vntill he was made bishop of Durham, which was on the seuenth of Maie, being the seuenth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie last before named, being the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred and six. He was bishop one and thirtie yeares, and died in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred thirtie and seuen, being the sixteenth yeare of king Henrie the first. See more following.

Thomas Fitzalen.

Thomas Fitzalen, brother to Richard earle of Arundell, being returned out of exile with Henrie of Bollingbroke duke of Hereford and Lancaster, and after king of England by the name of Henrie the fourth, was the third time being bishop of Canturburie, made lord chancellor of England, the ninth yeare of the said king Henrie the fourth, and continued therein about two years, being remoued from that place about September, in the eleuenth yeare of the reigne of the said king, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred and ten.

Thomas Beaufort.

Thomas Beaufort knight, the sonne of Iohn of Gaunt son to king Edward the third, & brother to king Henrie the fourth, was made lord chancellor in the eleuenth yere of the said king Henrie the fourth, being the yeare that the sonne of God toke on him the forme of a seruant one thousand foure hundred and ten, in which office he remained not full three yeares, but left the same office together with his life, as I suppose, in the thirteenth yeare of the same king, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred and twelue.

John Wakering clearke.

John Wakering clearke, maister of the rolles, was made keeper of the great seale, when Thomas Beaufort left the office of chancellor, which seale hee kept about the space of a moneth. For in Ianuarie after that he receiued the seale, there was a chancellor created.

Thomas Arundell archbishop of Canturburie.

Thomas Fitzalen or Arundell, archbishop of Canturburie, was the fourth time inuested with the chancellorship, in the yeare of our saluation one thousand foure hundred and twelue, being the thirteenth yeare of king Henrie the fourth, in which office hee continued during the life of the said king Henrie the fourth, who died in the fourteenth yeare of his kingdome, and in the yere of our Lord one thousand foure hundred and thirteene.

Henrie Beaufort bishop of Winchester.

Henrie Beaufort bishop of Winchester, and after cardinall in the time of Henrie the first, being vncle to king Henrie the fift then reigning, was the second time made chancellor, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred and thirteene, being the first yeare of the fift king Henrie, in which place he remained vntill the fift yeare of the said king Henrie, being the yeare of our Lord one thousand foure hundred and seuenteene.

Thomas Langleie bishop of Durham.

Thomas Langleie bishop of Durham was the second time made lord chancellor of England, in the said yere of our redemption one thousand foure hundred and seuenteene, being the fift yeare of that worthie conqueror king Henrie the fift, which office he receiued at Southwicke, and continued in that honour (as farre as I can learne) by the space of six yeares or more, whereof fiue yeares were fullie ended in the life and death of the said Henrie the fift, and the first yeare ended in the last of the first or beginning of the second yeare of king Henrie the first.

Henrie Beaufort bishop of Winchester.

Henrie Beaufort bishop of Winchester before named, was the third time made lord chancellor of England, in the second yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the first, being about the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred twentie and three, or one thousand foure hundred twentie and foure. For the second yeare of that king fell part in the one and part in the other of the said yeares of our Lord, in which office he continued about foure yeares, vntill he was made cardinall, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand foure hundred twentie and six.

John Kempe bishop of London.

John Kempe, bishop of London, was made lord chancellor of England in the fourth yere of that king Henrie, who in his youngest yeares was crowned first king of England, and then king of France in Paris; in which office he remained (as I suppose) about six yeares.

John Stafford bishop of Bath.

John Stafford deane of S. Martine & of Welles, prebend of Shilton in Lincolne church, bishop of Bath and Welles, lord chancellor and treasurer of England, and bishop of Canturburie, was made lord chancellor of England in the moneth of Februarie, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred thirtie & one, falling in the tenth yeare of king Henrie the first: he remained in that office vntill Iohn Kempe was againe made lord chancellor, which was about the eight and twentith yeare of king Henrie the first. And here I think it not vnmeet to remember that some haue noted William Wanflet that was bishop of Winchester, and chancellor of Oxford, to be chancellor of England, when he built Magdalen college in Oxford, in the fiue and twentith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the first: which possiblie can not be, sith this John Stafford held that office from the tenth of Henrie the first, vntill the eight & twentith of the same king, which was eightene yeares: during which time they place this Wanflet to bee chancellor of England. Which error (I suppose) they haue commited, in that they finding him chancellor at the time of the building of his college, in the said fiue and twentith yeare of king Henrie the first, haue taken him to be chancellor of England, when he was then but chancellor of Oxford: although in deed afterward he was chancellor of England, in the fiue and thirtith yeare of the said king, as after shall appeare.

John Kempe bishop of Yorke.

John Kempe bishop of Yorke and cardinall, was the second time made lord chancellor in the eight and twentith of king Henrie the first, being about the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred and fiftie, in which office he died, being bishop of Canturburie, in the yeare of our redemption (as saith saith Matthew Parker, one thousand foure hundred fiftie and three, being the two & thirtith yeare of the reigne of the simple king Henrie the first. This man was first bishop of Rochester, next of Chicester, thirdlie of London, then of Yorke, where he sat eight and twentie yeares, and lastlie he was archbishop of Canturburie.

Ann. Reg. 21.

Richard Neuill earle of Salisburie.

Richard Neuill earle of Salisburie, the sonne of Rafe Neuill earle of Westmerland, and father to the valiant Richard Neuill earle of Warwike, was after the death of John Kempe by parlement made lord chancellor in the two & thirtith yeare of K. Henrie the first: though others make it to be in the three & thirtith yeare of the same king, in which place he continued not long. For in the yeare following an other was substituted, and he remoued.

Thomas Bourchier earle of Eller.

Thomas Bourchier (brother to Henrie Bourchier earle of Eller) bishop of Elie, and bishop of Canturburie, was made chancellor in the three & thirtith yeare of the gouernement of king Henrie the first, in which he remained much about two yeares. In whose time, as saith Matthew Parker, about the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred three score and one, was the art of printing inuented at the citie of Argentorat in Germanie. About the which matter, and especiallie for the exact & certeine time thereof, manie writers although their count about one time dooth disagree: yet at the inuention of that worthie thing were these verses composed in the commendation of the same most excellent art.

In vita Thomæ Bourcherii episcopi Cantuar.

O felix nostris memoranda impressio tectis,
Inuentore nitet vtraque lingua tuo.
Desierat quasi totum quod fundis in orbe,
Nunc paruo doctus quilibet esse potest.
Omnes te homines igitur nunc laudibus ornent,
Te duce quando ars hæc mira reperta fuit.

William Patan or Paten, alias William Wanflet.

William Patan or Paten, borne of a gentlemanlie familie, being commonlie called William Wanflet of the place of his birth, and being prouost of Eaton, and bishop of Winchester, was lord chancellor in the fiue and thirtith, six and thirtith, and the seuen and thirtith yeare of the vnfortunat king Henrie the first, as haue the records of the exchequer. By which appeareth the error of those, as I haue before noted, that mistaking the fiue and twentith of king Henrie the first, in which time he was but chancellor of Oxford, for the fiue and thirtith of the said king, in which he was chancellor of England.

George Neuill archbishop of Yorke.

George Neuill (the sonne of Richard Neuill earle of Salisburie, and brother to Richard Neuill earle of Warwike) being made bishop of Exceter, came to that see in the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred fiftie and fiue; in which see he continued ten yeares, and was remoued to Yorke in the yeare that God became man one thousand foure hundred three score and fiue, he was made lord chancellor in the eight & thirtith yeare of the reigne of the after deposed K. Henrie the first, in which office he remained about eight yeares, & then was remoued in the seuenth yeare of the worthie K. Edward the fourth, being the yeare that the word became flesh one thousand foure hundred three score & seuen. He was a great friend to saint Albons, & procured Edward the fourth in the fourth yeare of his reigne to giue & confirme to John Whethamsted, abbat of saint Albons, the priorie of Penbroke. This bishop Neuill did after in the thirteenth yeare of king Edward the fourth grow in such disgrace with the king, that he was spoiled at one time of twentie thousand pounds, as in his life shall be more at large declared. To this man did Hugh Veine giue the manour of Hener Cobham, and Hener Brokas in Kent, in the fourth yeare of king Edward the fourth. He died at Blithlaw comming from Yorke, being almost fortie yeares old, and was buried at Yorke. And here I thinke it not amisse, to note the mistaking of time of such historiographers as haue set downe, that Edward the fourth did, in the fourth yeare of his reigne, take the chancellorship from the bishop of Exceter (brother to the earle of Warwike, which must néeds be this George Neuill) & gaue the same to the bishop of Bath. For by that which I haue seene, this Neuill liued vntill the seuenth yeare of Edward the fourth, and that for this time I suppose to be the truest.

Robert Kirkham maister of the rolles.

Robert Kirkeham maister of the rolles was made lord keeper of the great seale (vpon the remouing of George Neuill) in the moneth of Julie in the said yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred three score and seuen, being the seuenth yeare of king Edward the fourth.

Robert Stillington doctor of the lawes.

Robert Stillington doctor of the lawes, keeper of the priuie seale in the third yeare of Edward the fourth, bishop of Bath & Wels, being made chancellor in the seuenth yeare of king Edward the fourth, did still so continue (as I gather) vntill the thirteenth yeare of the said king.

Henrie Bourchier earle of Eller.

Henrie Bourchier earle of Eller, and first aduanced to that title of honor by Edward the fourth, came in place of the last chancellor, about the fourteenth yeare (as some vntrulie haue noted) of Edward the fourth. But in my poore opinion, the same was in the thirteenth yeare of the said Edward the fouth: in which place he remained not much more than one Trinitie terme. For in the said thirteenth yeare, about the moneth of August, was Booth lord chancellor of England.

Laurence Booth bishop of Durham.

Laurence Booth sometime maister of Penbroke hall bishop of Durham, and after of Yorke, was made lord chancellor about August or rather before, betweene that and Trinitie terme (after Henrie Bourchier) in the said thirteenth yeare of the valiant king Edward the fourth, after his redemption of the kingdome of England. This bishop (being brother to William Booth sometime bishop of Yorke) did build the bishop of Yorks house at Baterseie, which manour he before bought of Nicholas Stanleie, whome Leland the minser and refiner of all English names dooth most curiouslie in Latine call Nicholaum Stenelegium. He continued in the see of Yorke three yeares & nine moneths, and died at Southwell in the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred and foure score, being the twentith yeare of king Edward the fourth.

Thomas Scot alias Rotheram.

Thomas Scot surnamed Rotheram, because of the towne of Rotheram in Yorkeshire where he was borne and bred vp, was bishop of Rochester, and then of Lincolne, where he sat nine yeares, and after that was bishop of Yorke: whereinto he installed first at Yorke, and then at Ripon, being prouost of Beuerleie, he was made chancellor of England in the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred seuentie and foure, being the fourteenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the fourth. This bishop, in the fiftenth yeare of the said king, went ouer the sea (as I haue seene noted) with the said Edward the fourth, when he went to haue an interuiew with the French king: of which meeting monsieur de Argentine by name Philip Comineus (besides our English chronicles) dooth make mention, as a person that bare a part in that pageant.

John Alcot bishop of Rochester.

John Alcot bishop of Rochester was made chancellor during the absence of king Edward, as I haue found recorded.

Thomas Rotheram.

Thomas Rotheram, being before lord keeper of the priuie seale, was after his returne out of France the second time made lord chancellor; about the time in

in which the said king had gotten Berwike from the Scots, being about the twentith yeare of the said Edward the fourth. For the free gaining of the towne was not much before his death; in which office this Rotheram continued all the life of king Edward the fourth, & in the time of the little or no reigne at all of the guiltlesse murthered yong prince king Edward the fift; vntill it was ascribed to him for ouermuch lightnesse, that he had deliuered in the beginning of the rebellious gouernement of the protectorship of the bloudie and vnnaturall Richard duke of Glocester the seale to the quéene, to whome it did not apperteine, and from whome he receiued it not. He founded a college at Rotheram, dedicated it to the name of Jesus, & indowed it with great possessions & ornaments, and annexed therto the churches of Langthton and Almanburie.

John Russell bishop of Lincolne.

John Russell bishop of Lincolne, a graue and learned man, had the seale deliuered to him by the said protector of England, during the time of the short reigne of the yong king Edward, when the same seale was taken from Rotheram: and so this Russell was made chancellor in the moneth of June, in the yeare of our saluation one thousand foure hundred foure score and three, being the first yeare of the vsurped gouernement of the bloudie tyrant the misshapen king Richard the third. This Russell is buried in the church of Lincolne, in a chappell cast out of the vpper wall of the south part of the church.

Thomas Barow maister of the rolles.

Thomas Barow maister of the rolles was made keeper of the great seale (as I haue séene recorded) which I suppose, was in the third and last yeare of the said king Richard the third: for in that yeare he was maister of the rolles.

Thomas Rotheram.

Thomas Rotheram made againe lord chancellor, in the first entrance of king Henrie the seuenth into the gouernement: but verie shortlie after he was displaced, and the bishop of Worcester placed in that rowme; he was archbishop of Yorke nintéene yeares & ten moneths; he was verie beneficiall to all his kinred, and aduanced some with mariages, some with possessions, and some with spirituall liuings. He died the nine and twentith daie of December, in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred, being the sixtéenth yeare of king Henrie the eight, at Cawood in Yorkshire the morrow after the Ascension, being of the age of three score and sixtéene yeares or more: he was buried in Yorke minster on the north side in our ladie chappell, in a tome of marble which he caused to be made whilest he was liuing.

John Alcot bishop of Worcester.

John Alcot bishop of Worcester, made in the yeare one thousand foure hundred three score and sixtéene, was lord chancellor of England in the first yeare of the said K. Henrie the seuenth, the Salomon of England, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred foure score & fiue: shortlie after the entrance of the said Henrie into the gouernement of England. For though Rotheram were chancellor when he got the victorie, for that he had béene so before, & for that the king was neither prouided nor minded suddenlie to haue a man not méete for that place to execute the same: yet this Rotheram kept not that rome manie moneths, but that Alcot came in place; because the king found Alcot a méeter person to execute the same office, answerable to the disposition of the kings humor. All which notwithstanding, whether for malice of others, or for his owne deserts, or both, or for more especiall trust that king Henrie put in Warton bishop of Elie, who had béene the meanes to bring him to the crowne, this Alcot fell shortlie in the kings disgrace, was displaced of his office, and Warton came in his rowme. So that in this first yeare of the said king Henrie the seuenth, there seemed to be three chancellors in succession one after another, if I haue not misconceiued the matter: all which before Warton in this first yeare of king Henrie the seuenth, may perhaps more properlie be termed keepers of the great seale, than chancellors.

John Warton bishop of Elie.

John Warton doctor of the ciuill law, an aduocat in the ciuill, of the councell to Henrie the first and to Edward the fourth, to whome also he was maister of the rolles, was made bishop of Elie in the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred three score and eightéene, and lord chancellor of England, (vpon his returne from beyond the seas) in the first yeare of the worthie prince K. Henrie the seuenth, being the yeare that the word became flesh, one thousand foure hundred foure score and fiue: after which he was aduanced to the bishoprike of Canturburie; he died in the yeare of our redemption one thousand foure hundred foure score and nintéene, in the fiftéenth yere of the reigne of king Henrie the seuenth, as hath Matthew Parker.

William Warham archbishop of Canturburie.

William Warham aduocat in the arches, maister of the rolles, bishop of London, and then bishop of Canturburie; was (before his aduancement to the see of Canturburie) made chancellor of England in the time of Henrie the seuenth, in which office he continued vntill about the latter end of the seuenth yeare of king Henrie the eight. At what time surrendring the seale by reason of his age and weakenesse, the same great seale was deliuered to Thomas Wolsele.

Thomas Wolsele.

Thomas Wolsele somtime chapleine to Henrie Deane archbishop of Canturburie, after the kings almoner and abbat of saint Aulkins, who possessing manie other abbeies and bishoprikes, as in other places shall more largelie appeare, was aduanced to the gouernment of the great seale, about the beginning of the eight yeare of the triumphant reigne of king Henrie the eight, being the yeare of our Lord and Sauior Jesus Christ one thousand fiue hundred sixtéene, to hold the same during his life (as I gather) in which office yet he continued not aboue thirtéene yeares, vntill the one and twentith of the said king Henrie the eight, being the yeare of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred twentie and nine. During which time of his chancellorship, in the nintéenth yere of king Henrie the eight, being the yere of Christ one thousand fiue hundred twentie and seauen, he went into France, representing the king of Englands person, to set order for the deliuerie of pope Clement the seuenth and Francis the French king, at what time he carried the great seale ouer the seas to Calis, which seale he left with doctor Taylor maister of the rolles, to keepe the same at Calis vntill the cardinals returne out of the French dominions. He died in Leicester abbeie (not without suspicion of poison as was thought, which he had prepared for himselfe, and giuen to his apothecarie to deliuer when he called for it) the two and twentith of king Henrie the eight, in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred and thirtie.

Thomas Moze.

Thomas Moze knight, sometime vndershriffe of London, and chancellor of the dutchie of Lancaster, was aduanced to the honor of chancellorship of England, in the yere that the word became flesh one thousand fiue hundred twentie and nine, being the one and twentith yéere of that king Henrie which expelled pope Clement the seauenth his authoritie out of his dominions, in which office this rare witted knight (to vse Erasmus his epitheton) and learned chancellor continued not full three yeares; but in the foure and twentith yeare of the reigne of the said king Henrie the eight, with much labor and earnest sute he left his office. Touching which it shall not greéue me to set downe the words of Matthew Parker

Ann. Reg. 21.

ker of the liues of the bishops of Canturburie in the life of Thomas Cranmer writing after this maner: Interea rex dum papæ meditabatur excidium, singulorum de papali auctoritate sensus iudicijs haud obscuris collegit. Inter quos Thomas Morus, quia regis conatus pontificys valdè suspectos fuit, cancellarij munere, veniaregis ægrè impetrata, sese abdicauit.

Thomas Audleie attornie of the dutchie of Lancaster, sergeant at the law (as most affirme) and speaker of the parlement, was made knight and lord kéeper of the great seale the fourth of June, in the foure and twentith yere of the reigne of the famous prince king Henrie the eight, being the yeare of our Lord God one thousand fiue hundred thirtie and two, not long after which he was indued with the title and honor of lord chancellor of England. This man in the tenth yere of his chancellorship, being the yere of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred fortie and two, and the fiue and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the eight, changing the name of Buckingham colledge in Cambridge, did name it the college of saint Marie Magdalen, and indued it with some possessions. He died on Maie éeuen in the yeare of our saluation one thousand fiue hundred fortie and foure, being the fiue and thirtith yeare of Henrie the eight.

Thomas Audleie.

Ibid. Cantab. in Caium. 78.

Thomas Wriothesllie knight of the garter, being created baron at Hampton court on the first of Januarie, in the fiue and thirtith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight, in the yere of Christ one thousand fiue hundred fortie and thrée, was after aduanced to the honor of the great seale and chancellorship of England, about the beginning of Maie, in the sir and thirtith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight, being the yere of grace one thousand fiue hundred fortie and foure, in which office he continued vntill the death of the said king Henrie the eight, and in the beginning of the reigne of king Edward the first, vntill for his obstinacie in the Romane religion he was the first of March remoued, and the seale was deliuered to William Paulet lord Sent-John of Basing. This Wriothesllie (being created earle of Southampton by king Edward the first) died at his house of Lincolne place in Holborne the 30 of Julie, in the fourth yeare of the said king Edward, in the yéere 1550, & was buried at saint Andrews in Holborne commonlie called Holborne.

Thomas Wriothesllie.

William Paulet knight being first steward of the lands of the bishoprike of Winchester, then treasuror of the houshold, lord Sent-John of Basing, lord great maister of the kings house, afterwards earle of Wiltshire, marquesse of Winchester, and treasuror of England, being of the priuie councell to king Henrie the eight, king Edward the first, quéene Marie, and quéene Elisabeth, had the kéeping of the great seale committed vnto him the seuenth date of March, in the yeare that the second person in trinitie descended from the bosome of the father into the wombe of the mother one thousand fiue hundred fortie and seuen, being the first yere of the reigne of the yong king Edward the first, which seale he had in custodie about seuen moneths, vntill the thrée and twentith or foure and twentith of October following, at what time sir Richard Rich was made lord chancellor.

William Paulet.

Sir Richard Rich knight, lord Rich, was aduanced to the dignitie of lord chancellor of England about the 23 of October in the yere of our saluation one thousand fiue hundred fortie and seuen, being the first yeare of the reigne of the noble king Edward the first, in which place he remained about fiue yeers.

Sir Richard Rich.

Thomas Goderich or Goderike being bishop of Elie had the great seale deliuered to him, and was made lord chancellor of England the twentith of December (as Iohn Stow hath noted in his chronicle) in the yeare of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and one, being the first yeare of the reigne of king Edward the first, in which office he continued all the life of the said king Edward, which died in Julie one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and thrée, being the seuenth yeare of his reigne, and about one moneth after vntill the thirtéenth or fourtéenth daie of August, in which quéene Marie made Stephan Gardener hir chancellor.

Thomas Goderich.

Sir Nicholas Hare, maister of the rolles, had at the comming of quéene Marie to the crowne the kéeping of the great seale, after the death of king Edward, as lord kéeper by the space of one fortnight, and shortlie after was Stephan Gardener made chancellor.

Sir Nicholas Hare.

Stephan Gardener bishop of Winchester was in August, in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and thrée, being the first yeare of the reigne of the vnfortunat quéene Marie, made chancellor of England. This man going in ambassage vnto Calis left the great seale in the custodie of William Paulet marquesse of Winchester, which bishop after his returne into England continued in that office all the time of his life, which he ended the 19 of Nouember, in the yeare that the word became flesh one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and fiue, being the third yeare of quéene Marie. After which the great seale lieng in the custodie of the prince, she on the new yeares daie following made a new chancellor.

Stephan Gardener.

Nicholas Heath bishop of Rochester, almoner to the king, ambassador into Germanie, bishop of Worcester, president of Wales, and archbishop of Yorke, was vpon new yeares daie, in the yeare of our Lord God one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and fiue, being the third yeare of the reigne of quéene Marie, aduanced to the honorable dignitie of the chancellorship. But quéene Marie deceasing the seauentéenth daie of Nouember, in the yeare of grace one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and eight, and the first yere of hir gouernement, this Heath vpon the placing of the worthie quéene Elisabeth vpon the throne of the English gouernment, was remoued from his office, and maister Bacon aduanced.

Nicholas Heath.

Sir Nicholas Bacon esquier, attourneie of the court of wards, was made knight, and lord kéeper of the great seale the two and twentith of December, in the yeare of our redemption 1558, being the first yeare of the now reigning Elisabeth the Saba of England. Which name of lord kéeper he still kept during his life, and the time of his office. In whose time there was an act of parlement established, to make the power of the keeper of the great seale equall with the authoritie of the chancellor. This man continued in this office, and worthilie executed the same, being a man of rare wit and déepe experience, during the time of his life, which continued vntill the twentith of Februarie, in the yeare of our saluation 1578 after the account of England, being the one and twentith yeare of the rare and singular gouernement of the worlds wonder the famous quéene Elisabeth, which place this man kept eightéene yeares, being (as I suppose) double as long time as anie other chancellor or kéeper of the great seale possessed that place, except Rafe Neuill bishop of Chichester, and John Stafford bishop of Bath and Wels, both which held it equallie eightéene yeares with him: a strange thing, that in the course of almost 600 yeares, no such officer might possesse that place by twentie years togither.

Nicholas Bacon.

Thomas Bromlete, the generall solicitor of quéene Elisabeth, a councellor of the law, and one of the inner temple, was aduanced to the dignitie of lord chancellor on the fiue and twentith day of Aprill, in the yeare of our redemption 1579, being in the one & twentith yeare of the reigne of the said quéene Elisabeth,

Thomas Bromlete.

Elisabeth, which office at this daie he beareth.

Thus (although I maie be a little wethod in passing ouer the deepe sea of this difficultie of the chancellors, in which I am sure I am not ouer head and eares) I haue at length brought my chancellors to end: a worke of some labour and difficultie, of some search and charge, which I haue done onelie of my selfe without the furtherance or help of some others, who more inconsideratlie than trulie do disorderlie report, that I haue atteined vnto this in obteining those names by some sinister means, from the priuat bookes of them who haue trauelled in the same matter. In which (as I said in the begining, so I saie againe) if anie imperfection for hast, by reason of the printers spèdie calling on me, haue now fallen out of my pen, it shall hereafter God willing be corrected in the large volume of their liues. Wherefore as I neither estéeme nor feare the secret reports of some others; so for their countries good it shall be well that they would deliuer something to the world to bring truth to perfection (if other men haue vnwillinglie set downe error) and not as they do, for a litle commoditie & gaine to themselues, neither benefit their countrie, nor speake well of such as would and do helpe posteritie. Thus this much by Francis Thin, touching the chancellors of England.]

Ab. Fl. ex publicis æditionibus B.G. & T.C.

¶ Here though somewhat out of place (for it should haue béene entered in 1578) it were better to record the receiuing of the quénes maiestie into Suffolke & Norffolke, than making no commemoration therof at all, to let it perish in threehalfepenie pamphlets, and so die in oblivion. It maie also serue for a rest of recreation, after so long an introduction of serious matters, as also (and that most worthilie) maie remaine in record, to signifie what well affected subiects the quéns maiestie hath within hir dominions, to whome goods, lands, friends, kindred, or life, none of these seuerallie, nor all iointlie, are so pretious and deere, but for hir sake they can find in their hearts to estéeme them as dong. And now to the matter. The truth is (saith one that wrote the whole intertainment) that albeit they had but small warning certeinlie to build vpon, of the comming of the quénes maiestie into both those shires, the gentlemen had made such readie prouision, that all the veluets and silks were taken vp that might be laid hand on, and bought for anie monie, and some conuerted to such garments and sutes of robes, that the shew therof might haue beautified the greatest triumph that was in England these manie yeares. For (as it was said) there were two hundred yong gentlemen clad all in white veluet, and three hundred of the grauer sort apparelled in blacke veluet cotes, and faire chaines, all readie at one instant and place, with fiftéene hundred seruing men more on horssebacke, well and brauelie mounted in good order, readie to receiue the quénes highnesse into Suffolke, which surelie was a comelie troupe, and a noble sight to behold: and all these waited on the shiriffe sir William Spring, during the quénes maiesties abode in those parties, and to the verie confines of Suffolke.

The receiuing of the quéene into Suffolke and Norffolke.

The number of gentlemen that receiued the quéene into Suffolke.

But before hir highnesse passed to Norffolke, there was in Suffolke such sumptuous feasting and bankets, as seldome in anie part of the world haue béene seene before. The maister of the rolles sir William Cordall was one of the first that began this great feasting, and did light such a candle to the rest of the shire, that manie were glad bountifullie and frankelie to follow the same example, with such charges and costs, as the whole traine were in some sort pleased therewith. And neere Burie sir William Drurie for his part at his house made the quénes highnesse a costlie and delicat dinner, and sir Robert Germine of Roesbrooke feasted the French ambassadors two seuerall times, with which charges and courtesie they stood maruellouslie contented. The shiriffe sir William Spring, sir Thomas Kidson, sir Arthur Higses, and sundrie either at the quénes comming, or returne, solemnelie feasted hir highnesse, yea and defraied the whole charges for a daie or twaine, presented gifts, made such triumphs and deuises, as indéed was most noble to behold, and verie thankfullie accepted.

Persons of worship in Suffolke that feasted hir highnesse during hir abode amongst them.

The Norffolke gentlemen hearing how dutifullie their neighbors had receiued the prince, prepared in like sort to shew themselues dutifull: and so in most gallant maner they assembled and set forward with fiue and twentie hundred horssemen, wherof (as some affirme) were six hundred gentlemen, so brauelie attired and mounted, as in déed was worthie the noting, which goodly companie waited on their shiriffe a long season. But in good sooth (as it was crediblie spoken) the bankets and feasts began here afresh, all kinds of triumphs that might be deuised were put in practise and prose. The earle of Surreie did shew most sumptuous cheare, in whose parke were speaches well set out, and a spectall deuise much commended: and the rest, as a number of follie gentlemen, were no whit behind to the vttermost of their abilities, in all that might be done and deuised.

Norffolke cited by the example of Suffolke giue & queue toiall intertainment.

But when the quénes highnesse came to Norwich, the substance of the whole triumph and feasting was in a maner there new to begin. For order was taken there, that euerie daie for six daies together, a shew of some strange deuise should be séene. And the maior and aldermen appointed among themselues and their brethren, that no one person reteining to the quéene should be vnfeasted, or vnbidden to dinner & supper, during the space of those six daies: which order was well & wiselie obserued, and gained their citie more fame and credit than they wot of: for that courtesie of theirs shall remaine in perpetuall memorie whiles the walles of their citie standeth. Besides the monie they bestowed vpon diuerse of the traine, and those that toke paines for them, will be a witnesse of their well doing and good will, whiles the report of these things maie be called to remembrance. Now, who can (considering their great charges and discréet gouernement in these causes) but giue them due laud and reputation, as farre as either pen or report maie do them good & stretch out their credit. For most assuredlie, they haue taught and learned all the townes and cities in England a lesson, how to behaue themselues in such like seruices and actions.

What order was taken in Norwich for the receiuing and recreating of the quéene.

On saturdaie being the sixtéenth of August 1578, and in the twentith yeare of the reigne of our most gratious souereigne ladie Elisabeth, by the grace of God quéene of England, France & Ireland, defender of the faith, &c: the same our most dread and souereigne ladie (continuing hir progresse in Norffolke) immediatlie after dinner set forward from Brakenash, where she had dined with the ladie Stile, being fiue miles distant from Norwich, towards the same hir most dutifull citie. Sir Robert Wod then eshuter, now knight, maior of the same citie, at one of the clocke in the same happie daie, set forward to mét with hir maiestie in this order. First there rode before him well and séemelie mounted, three score of the most comelie yong men of the citie, as batchellers apparelled all in blacke satten dublets, blacke hose, blacke taffata hats, and yellow bands, and their vniuersall liuerie was a mandilion of purple taffata, laid about with siluer lase: & so apparelled they marched forwards two and two in a ranke. Then one which which representeth king Gurgunt, sometime king of England, which builded the castell of Norwich, called Blanch Flowre, and laid the foundation of the citie. He was mounted vpon a braue courser, and was thus furnished: his bodie armed, his bases of græne and white silke: on his head a blacke veluet hat, with a plume of white feathers. There attended vpon him three henchmen in white and græne: one of them did beare his helmet, the second his target, the third his staffe: after him a noble companie of gentlemen and wealthie cittizens in veluet coats and other costlie furniture, brauelie mounted. When followed the officers of the citie euerie one in his place. Then the sword-bearer, with the sword & hat of maintenance. Then the maior and foure and twentie aldermen, and the recorder all in scarlet gownes, whereof so manie as had béene maiors of the citie, and were iustices, did weare their scarlet clokes: then followed so manie as had béene shiriffs, and were no aldermen, in violet gownes and sattin tippets. Then followed diuerse others, to kéepe the people from disturbing the araie aforesaid.

Norffolke cited by the example of Suffolke & quéenes roiall interteinment.

The founder of Blanch Flowre staieth in person to meet the quéene.

Thus euerie thing in due and comelie order, they all (except Gurgunt, which staied hir maiesties coming within a flight shot or two of the citie, where the castell of Blanch Flowre was in most beautifull prospect) marched forwards to a bridge, called Hartford bridge, the vttermost limit that waie, distant from the citie two miles or there abouts, to méet with hir maiestie; who within one houre or little more after their attendance, came in such gratious and princelie wise, as rauished the harts of all hir louing subiects, and might haue terrified the stoutest heart of anie enimie to behold. Whether the maiestie of the prince, which is incomparable; or ioie of hir subiects, which exceeded measure, were the greater, I thinke would haue appalled the iudgement of Apollo to define. The acclamations and cries of the people to the almightie God for the preseruation of hir maiestie rated so lowd, as hardly for a great time could anie thing be heard. But at last, as euerie thing hath an end, the noise appeased: and the maior saluted hir highnesse with the oration following, and yéelded to hir maiestie therewith the sword of the citie, and a faire standing cup of siluer and guilt, with a couer, and in the cup one hundred pounds in gold. The oration was in these words.

The maiors oration to the queene Englished.

IF our wish should be granted vnto vs by the almightie, what humane thing wee would chieflie desire: we would account nothing more pretious (most roial prince) than that the bright beame of your most chast eie which doth so cheare vs, might pearse the secret and strait corners of our hearts. Then surelie should you see how great ioies are dispersed there, and how the spirits and liuelie bloud tickle in our arteries & small veines, in beholding you the light of this realme (as Dauid was of Israel) now at length, after long hope and earnest petitions, to appeare in these coasts. Trulie on mine owne part, which by your highnesse authoritie and clemencie (with humble thanks bee it spoken) doo gouerne this famous citie, and on the part of these my brethren, and all these people which by your authoritie we rule (speaking as they meane, and as I my selfe doo thinke) this onelie with all our hearts and humble praiers we desire, that we maie so find your maiestie gratious and fauourable vnto vs, as you for your part neuer came to anie subiects better welcome than to vs your poore subiects here. For most manifest token whereof, we present vnto your maiestie here, these signes of honor and office, which we receiued of the most mightie prince Henrie the fourth, in the fift yere of his reigne, then to vs granted in the name of maior, aldermen and shiriffs; whereas before time out of mind or mention, we were gouerned by bailiffs (as they tearme them) which euer since haue beene both established and increased with continuall priuileges of kings: and which by your onelie clemencie (which with immortall thanks we shall neuer cease to declare) we haue now these twentie yeares inioied: and togither with those signes, this treasure is a pledge of our good willes and abilitie: which all how great or little so euer they be, wee powre downe at your pleasure, that if we haue neglected anie thing in all this course of your most happie reigne, which becommeth most louing, obedient and well willing subiects to performe, for the preseruation of your crowne, and aduancement of your highnesse,

The maior speaketh in his owne and his brethren the aldermens behalfe.

Henrie the fourth a most bountifull prince to the citie of Norwich.

A most dutifull submission.

highnesse, you maie then determine of vs and all ours at your most gratious pleasure. But if we haue (God being our guide) so ordered the gouernance of this citie, that we haue kept the same in safetie to your maiesties vse, and made the people therein (as much as in vs lieth) first most studious of Gods glorie and true religion, and next of your maiesties health, honour, and pleasure; then aske we nothing of you: for that the singular clemencie ingraffed in your highnesse, will easilie of it selfe grant that which is requisit for vs to obteine. We onelie therefore desire, that God would abundantlie blesse your highnesse with all good gifts of mind and bodie.

Wherein the dutie of subiects chiefelie consisteth.

Which oration ended, hir maiestie accepting in good part euerie thing deliuered by the maior, did thankefullie answer him in these words, or verie like in effect: We hartilie thanke you maister maior, and all the rest, for these tokens of goodwill; neuertheles, princes haue no need of monie: God hath indued vs abundantlie, we come not therefore, but for that which in right is our owne, the hearts and true allegiance of our subiects, which are the greatest riches of a kingdome; whereof as we assure our selues in you, so doo you assure your selues in vs of a louing and gratious souereigne. Herewith was deliuered to the maior, a mace or scepter, which he carried before hir to hir lodging, which was in the bishop of Norwich his palace, two miles distant from that place. The cup and monie was deliuered to a gentleman, one of hir maiesties footmen to carrie. The maior said to hir, Sunt hic centum libræ puri auri. The couer of the cup lifted vp, hir maiestie said to the footmen; Looke to it, there is 100 pounds. With that hir highnesse, with the whole companie, marched towards Norwich, till they came to a place called the Towne close, distant from the citie a good flightshot, where the partie which representeth Gurgunt came forth, as in due maner is expressed, and was readie to haue declared to hir maiestie this speech following; but by reason of a showre of raine which came, hir maiestie hasted awaie, the speech not vttered. But thus it was as here followeth.

The queens maiesties acceptable answer vttered by hir owne mouth in person.

Gurguntius his speech cut off by a showre of raine.

Leaue off to muse most gratious prince of English soile,
What sudden wight in martiall wise approcheth neere:
King Gurgunt I am hight, king Belins eldest sonne,
Whose sire Dunwallo first, the British crowne did weare.
Whom truthlesse Gutlacke forst to passe the surging seas,
His falshod to reuenge, and Denmarke land to spoile.
And finding in returne, this place a gallant vent,
This castle faire I built, a hoit from forren soile:
To win a conquest, get renowme and glorious name,
To keepe and vse it well, deserues eternall fame.
When brute through cities, townes, the woods & dales did sound:
Elizabeth this countrie peereles queene drew neere:
I was found out, my selfe in person noble queene
Did hast, before thy face in presence to appeare.
Two thousand yeares welnie in silence lurking still:
Heare, why to thee alone this seruice I doo yeeld.
Besides that, at my cities sute their founder first
Should gratulat most this toilfull sight in open field, Foure speciall points and rare concurring in vs both
This speciall seruice haue reserud to thee alone:
The glorie though of each in thee doth far surmount,
Yet great with small compard, will like appeare anon.
When doubtfull warres the British princes long had wroong,
My grandsire first uniting all did weare the crowne.
Of Yorke and Lancaster, who did conclude those broiles:
Thy grandsire Heinrie seuenth, a king of great renowne.
Mine vncle Brennus eke, my father ioining hands,
Did Rome did rase and sacke, and halfe consume with fire:
Thy puissant father so, new Rome that purple whore
Did sacke and spoile hir neere, of all hir glittering tire.
Lo Cambridge schooles by mine assignement founded first,
By thee my Cambridge schooles are famous through the world,
I thirtie wandring ships of banisht men relieued.
The throngs of banisht soules that in this citie dwell,
Do weepe for ioy: and praie for thee with teares vntold:
In all these things thou noble queene doost far excell.
But lo to thee I yeeld as dutie doth me bind
In open field my selfe, my citie, castle, keie,
Most happie fathers kings in such a daughter queene,
Most happie England were, if thou shouldst neuer die.
Go on most noble prince, for I must hast awaie
My citie gates doo long, their souereigne to receaue:
More true thou neuer couldst, nor loiall subiects find,
Whose harts full fast with perfect loue to thee doo cleaue.

Gurguntius the eldest son of Belinus.

The ancientnesse of Norwich citie by the founders age may be gathered.

King Henrie the seuenth, and king Henrie the eight.

Gurguntius yeeldeth his estate to the queene.

Then hir maiestie drew neere the gates of the citie called saint Stephans gates, which with the wals there were both gallantlie and stronglie repared. The gate it selfe was thus inriched and beautified. First the portcullice was new made both timber & iron. Then the outward side of the gate was thus beautified. The queenes armes were most richlie and beautifullie set forth in the chiefe front of the gate. On the one side thereof, but somewhat lower, was placed the scutchion of saint George his crosse: on the other side, the armes of the citie: and directlie vnder the queenes maiesties armes, was placed the falcon, hir highnesse badge, in due forme, and vnder the same were written these words, God and the queene we serue. The inner side of the gate was thus beautified. On the right side was gorgeouslie set forth the red rose, signifieng the house of Yorke; on the left side the white rose, representing the house of Lancaster; in the midst was the white and red rose vnited, expressing the vnion, vnder the which was placed by descent the armes of the queene, and vnder that were written these verses following.

S. Stephans gates in Norwich richlie beautified.

The vnion of the white rose and the red.

Diuision kindled strife,
Blist vnion quencht the flame:
Thense sprang our noble Phenix deare,
The peareles prince of fame.

And besides that, at this gate, the waits of the citie were placed with lowd musicke, who chearefullie & melodiouslie welcomed hir maiestie into the citie, this song being song by the best voices in the same.

The deaw of heauen drops this daie on drie and barren ground, Wherefore let fruit full hearts I saie at drum and trumpets sound
Yeeld that is due, shew that is meet, to make our ioy the more,
In our good hope, and hir great praise,
we neuer saw before.
The sun dooth shine where shade hath beene, long darkenesse brought vs date,
The star of comfort now coms in,
and here a while will state.
Ring out the bels, plucke vp your spreets, and dresse your houses gate,
Run in for floures to strew the streets, and make what ioy you mate.
The deaw of heauen, &c.
Full manie a winter haue we seene,
and manie stormes withall,
Since here we saw a king or queene in pompe and princelie pall.
Wherefore make feast and banket still,
and now to triumph fall,
With dutie let vs shew good will,
to glad both great and small.
The deaw of heauen, &c.
The realme throughout will ring of this,
and sundrie regions mo
Will say, full great our fortune is, when our good hap they kno.
O Norwich, heere the wellspring runs, whose vertue still dooth flo,
And lo this day dooth shine two suns within thy wals also.
The deaw of heauen, &c.

This song ended, hir highnesse passed towards hir lodging, & by the waie in a church-yard, ouer against maister Pecks dore (a worthie alderman) was a scaffold set vp & brauelie trimmed. On this scaffold was placed an excellent boy, well and gallantlie decked, in a long white robe of taffata, a crimsin scarffe wrought with gold, folded on the Turkish fashion about his browes, and a gaie garland of white flowers on his head, which boie was not seene, till the queene had a good season marked the musicke, which was marueilous sweet and good, albeit the rudenesse of some ringers of bels did somewhat hinder the noise and harmonie: and as sone as the musike ended, the boy steped reuerendlie before the queene, and spake these words that follow in comelie order.

The first pageant was in S. Stephans parish in this maner.

The boie speaketh at maister Pecks dore.

Great things were meant to welcome thee (O queene)
If want of time had not cut off the same:
Great was our wish, but small is that was seene,
For vs to shew before so great a dame.
Great hope we haue it pleaid our princes eie.
Great were the harmes that else our paines should reape:
Our grace or foile dooth in your iudgement lie,
If you mislike, our griefs doo grow on heape:
If for small things we doo great fauour find,

Great

The queene liked this deuise.

How the pageant was beautified with representation of the mysteries of the citie.

1. Pointing to the spinners.
2. Pointing to the loomes.
3. Pointing to the workes.

The second pageant with the situation of the same, and what representations it bare.

Great is the ioy that Norwich feeles this date:
If well we waid the greatnesse of your mind,
Few words would serue, we had but small to saie.
But knowing that your goodnesse takes things well
That well are meant, we boldlie did proceed:
And so good queene, both welcome and farewell,
Thine owne we are in heart, in word, and deed.

The boy there vpon flang vp his garland, and the queenes highnes said, This deuise is fine. Then the noise of musike began againe, to heare the which the queene staid a good while, and after departed to the cathedrall church, which was not far from thense. Then passed the forwards through saint Stephans street, where the first pageant was placed in forme following. It was builded somewhat in maner like a stage of 40 foot long, & in breadth eight foot. From the standing place vpward was a bank framed in maner of a free stone wall, & in the height therof were written sentences, that is to saie: The causes of this common wealth are, God truelie preached, Iustice dulie executed, The people obedient, Idlenesse expelled, Labour cherished, Vniuersall concord preserued.

From the standing place downewards it was beautified with painters worke, artificiallie expressing to sight the portraiture of these seuerall lomes, and the weauers in them (as it were working) and ouer euerie lome the name thereof, that is to saie. Ouer the first lome was written, the weauing of worsted: ouer the second, the weauing of russels: ouer the third, the weauing of darnix: ouer the fourth, the weauing of tuft mockado: the fift, the weauing of lace: the sixt, the weauing of caffa: the seuenth, the weauing of fringe. And then was there the portraiture of a matrone, and two or three children, and ouer hir head was written these words: God nurture changeth qualities. Upon the stage there stood at the one end eight small women children spining worsted yarne, and at the other end as manie knitting of worsted yarne hose: and in the middest of the said stage stood a prettie boy richlie apparelled, which represented the common wealth of the citie. And all the rest of the stage was furnished with men, which made the said seuerall works, and before euerie man the worke in deed. Euerie thing thus readie, and hir maiestie come, the child representing the common wealth, spake to hir highnesse these words following.

Most gratious prince, vndoubted souereigne queene,
Our onelie ioy next God, and chiefe defense:
In this small shew, our whole estate is seene,
The wealth we haue, we find proceed from thense,
The idle hand hath here no place to feed,
The painfull wight hath still to serue his need.
Againe, our seat denies our traffike heere,
The sea too neare deuides vs from the rest,
So weake we were within this dozen yeare,
As care did quench the courage of the best:
But good aduise hath taught these little hands,
To rend in twaine the force of pining bands.
From combed wooll we draw this slender threed,
From thense the loomes haue dealing with the same,
And then se againe in order doo proceed,
These seuerall works which skilfull art dooth frame:
And all to driue dame need into hir caue,
Our heads and hands together labourd haue.
We bought before the things that now we sell,
These slender impes, their works doo passe the waues,
Gods peace and thine, we hold and prosper well,
Of euerie mouth the hands the charges saues.
Thus through thy helpe and aid of power diuine,
Dooth Norwich liue, whose hearts and goods are thine.

This shew pleased hir maiestie so greatlie, as she particularlie viewed the knitting & spinning of the children, perused the lomes, and noted the seuerall works and commodities which were made by these meanes: and then after great thanks by hir giuen to the people, marched towards the market place, where was the second pageant thwarting the street at the enterance of the market, betweene master Skinner & master Quash, being in breadth two and fiftie foot of assise, and was diuided into three gates, in the midst a maine gate, & on either side a posterne: the maine gate in breadth fourteene foot, each posterne eight foot, their heights equall to their proportion: ouer each posterne was as it were a chamber, which chambers were replenished with muslike. Ouer all the gates passed a stage of eight foot brode, in maner of a pageant, curious, rich, & delitefull. The whole worke, from the pageant downewards, seemed to be iasper & marble. In the forefront towards hir maiestie was the armes of England on the one side the gate, & on the other side the *falcon with crowne and scepter. The other side was beautified with the armes of England on the one side of the gate, & the creast of England on the other. The pageant was furnisht with fiue personages apparelled like women. The first was the citie of Norwich; the second Deboza; the third Iudith; the fourth Hester; the fift Martia, sometime queene of England. At the first sight of the prince, & till hir maiesties comming to the pageant, the musicians vsed their lowd muslike, and then ceassed: wherewith hir highnesse stated, to whome the personage representing the citie of Norwich, did speake in these words.

Whom fame resounds with thundring trump, that rends the
And perseth to the hautie heauens, and thense descending flies
Through flickering aire: and so conioines the sea & shore together,
In admiration of thy grace, good queene thart welcome hither:
More welcome than Terpsicore was to the towne of Troie.
Sea-faring men by Gemini conceiue not halfe my ioie:
Strong Hercules to Theseus was neuer such delight,
Nor Nilus to Eurialus as I haue in this sight.
Penelope did neuer thirst Ulysses more to see,
Than I poore Norwich hungred haue to gaine the sight of thee.
And now that these my happie eies behold thy heauenlie face,
The Lord of lords I humblie praie, to bliss thy noble grace
With Nestors life, with Sibils helth, with Croesus stocke & store,
With all good gifts of Salomon, and twise as manie more.
What shuld I saie? Thou art my ioy next God, I haue none other,
My princelie & my peerlesse queene, my louing nurse and mother.
My goods & lands, my hands and hart, my limbs and life are thine,
What is mine owne in right or thought, to thee I doo resigne.
Grant then (oh gratious louereigne queene) this onlie my request,
That that which shall be doone in me, be construed to the best.
And take in part my slender shewes, wherein my whole pretense
Is for to please your maiestie, and end without offense.
So shall I clap my hands for ioy, and hold my selfe as rich
As if I had the gold of Inde, and double twise as mich.

Where princes sitting in their thrones set God before their sight
And liue according to his law, and guide their people right,
There doth his blessed gifts abound, there kingdoms firmlie stand
There force of foes cannot preuaile, nor furie fret the land.
My selfe (oh peerlesse prince) doo speake by proofe of matter past,
Which proofe by practise I performd, and foild his foes at last.
For Jabin king of Canaan, poore Israell did spite,
And meant by force of furious rage to ouerrun vs quite.
Nine hundred iron chariots, he brought into the field,
With cruell capteine Sisera by force to make vs yeeld.
His force was great, his fraud was more, he fought, we did defend,
And twentie winters long did last this warre without an end.
But he that neither sleepes nor slackes such furies to correct,
Appointed me Deboza for the iudge of his elect:
And did deliuer Sisera into a womans hand,
I slue them all, and so in rest his people held the land.
So mightie prince, that puissant Lord, hath plast thee here to be,
The rule of this triumphant realme alone belongs to thee.
Continue as thou hast begun, weed out the wicked rout,
Vphold the simple, meeke and good, pull downe the proud & stout.
Thus shalt thou liue and reigne in rest, & mightie God shalt please,
Thy state be sure, thy subiects safe, thy commonwealth at ease.
Thy God shall grant thee length of life, to glorifie his name,
Thy deeds shall be recorded in the booke of lasting fame.

Oh floure of grace, oh prime of Gods elect,
Oh mightie queene and singer of the Lord,
Did God sometime by me poore wight correct
The champion stout, that him and his abhord?
Then be thou sure thou art his mightie hand,
To conquer those which him and thee withstand.
The rage of foes Bethulia did oppresse,
The people faint were readie for to yeeld:
God aided me poore widow nertheless,
To enter into Holofernes field,
And with this sword by his directing hand,
To slate his foe, and quiet so the land.
If this his grace were giuen to me poore wight,
If widowes hand could vanquish such a foe:
Then to a prince of thy surpassing might,
What tyrant liues but thou maist ouerthro?
Perseuere then his seruant as thou art,
And hold for aie a noble victors part.

The fretting heads of furious foes haue skill,
As well by fraud as force to find their prete.
In smiling lookes dooth lurke a lot as ill,
As where both sterne and sturdie streams doo swaie,
Thy selfe oh queene, a proofe hast seene of this,
So well as I poore Hester haue I wis.
As Jabins force did Israell perplex,
And Holofernes fierce Bethulia beliege,
So Hamans slights sought me and mine to vex,
Yet shewd a face of subiect to his liege.
But force no fraud, nor tyrant strong can trap,
Those whom the Lord in his defense dooth wrap.

The proofes I speake by vs haue erst bin seene,
The proofes I speake, to thee are not vnknowne.
Thy God thou knowst most dread and soueregne queene,
A world of foes of thine hath ouerthrowne,
And hither now triumphantlie dooth call
Thy noble grace, the comfort of vs all.
Doost thou not see the ioie of all this flocke?
Touchsafe to view their passing gladsome cheare,
Be still (good queene) their refuge and their rocke,
As they are thine to serue in loue and feare:
So fraud, nor force, nor forreine so may stand Against the strength of thy most puissant hand.

Then spake Martia the first person.

With long discourse (oh puissant prince) some tract of time we spend,
Touchsafe yet now a little more, and then we make an end.
The thundring blast of fame, whereof dame Norwich first did speake,
Not onelie shooke the aire and skies, but all the earth did breake,
It rent vp graues, and bodies raisd, ech spirit tooke his place,
And this alonelie word was heard: Here comes the pearle of grace,
Here coms the iewell of the world, hir peoples whole delight,
The paragon of prelent time, and prince of earthlie might.
The voice was strange, the wonder more: for when we viewd the earth
Ech prince that erst had reigned here, receiud againe his breath,
And with his breath, a libertie to hold againe his place,
Manie one amongst vs all exceed your noble grace.
Some comfort euerie one conceiud to catch againe his owne,
His vtmost skill was trimlie vsde, to haue his vertues knowne.
The plaies surpasse my skill to tell. But when ech one had said,
Apollo did himselfe appeare and made vs all dismaid.
Will you contend with hir (quoth he) within whose sacred brest
Dame Pallas and my selfe haue framd our soueregne seat of rest?
Whose skill directs the muses nine, whose grace dooth Venus staine:
Hir eloquence like Mercurie: like Juno in hir traine?
Whose God is that eternall Ioue which holds vs all in awe?
Beleeue me, you exceed the bounds of equitie and lawe.
Therewith they shronke themselues aside, not one I could espie,
They coucht them in their caues againe and that full quietlie.
yet I that Martia hight, which sometime ruld this land,
As queene for thirtie three yeares space, gat licence at his hand,
And so Gurguntius did, my husbands father deere,
Which built this towne and castell both, to make our homage here,
Which homage mightie queene accept: the realme and right is thine,
The crowne, the scepter, and the sword to thee we doo resigne,
And wish to God, that thou maist reigne, twise Nestors yeares in peace, Triumphing ouer all thy foes, to all our ioies increase, Amen.

Herewith she passed vnder the gate, with such thanks as plainelie expressed hir noble nature: and the musicians within the gate vpon their soft instruments vsed broken musike, and one sang this dittie.

A dittie song to soft musicke at the queenes entrance vnder the gate.

From slumber soft as I fell fast asleepe,
From sleepe to dreame, from dreame to deepe delight,
Ech gem the gods had giuen the world to keepe
In princelie wise came present to my sight:
Such solace then did sinke into my mind,
As mortall man on mould could neuer find.
The gods did striue, and yet their strifes were sweet,
Ech one would haue a vertue of hir owne.
Dame Juno thought the highest place most meet
For hir, bicause of riches was hir throne.
Dame Venus thought by reason of hir loue
That she might claime the highest place aboue.
The virgins state Diana still did praise,
And Ceres praisd the fruit of fertile soile:
And Prudence did dame Pallas chieflie raise,
Minerua all for eloquence did striue,
They limild to see their quarelling estate,
And Ioue himselfe decided their debate.
My sweets (quoth he) leaue off your sugred strife,
In equall place I haue assignd you all:
A soueregne wight there is that beareth life,
In whose sweete hart I haue inclosd you all.
Of England while she is the soueregne queene,
Your vigors there doo flourish fresh and greene.
They skipt for ioy, and gaue their franke consent,
The noise resounded to the hautie skie:
With one lowd voice they cried all, content,
They clapt their hands, and therewith waked I.
The world and they concluded with a breath,
And wisht long reigne to queene Elisabeth.

The place of the queenes abode during the time of hir tariance in Norwich.

Herewith she passed through the market place, which was goodlie garnished, and thense through the other streets which were trimlie decked, directlie to the cathedrall church, where Te Deum was sung, and after seruice she went to the bishops palace, where hir maiestie kept the time she continued in Norwich. All this was on saturdaie the sixteenth of August 1578. On the next daie after, which was sundaie, when princes commonlie come not abroad (and time is occupied with sermons and laudable exercises) T. C. was to watch a conuenient season, wher and how might be vttered the things that were prepared for pastime. And so vpon mondaie before supper, he made a deuise, as though Mercurie had beene sent from the gods, to request the queene to come abroad, & behold what was deuised for hir welcome, the whole matter whereof doth follow.

The manner of Mercuries coch & message to the queene, requesting hir highnesse to come abroad, and in what pastime the gods had prouided for so noble a prince.

The coch that Mercurie came in vnto the queene, was closelie kept in secret a long season, and when the time came it must passe towards the court, it had a trumpetter with it, and the cochman was made to driue so fast, as the horses should seeme to flie, which was so well obserued, as the people wondered at the swiftnesse therof, and followed it in such flocks and multitudes, that scarse in a great greene (where the preaching place is) might be found rome for anie more people. And when the coch approched in the hearing of a trumpet, the trumpetter sounded, and so came in to the greene sounding, vntill the coch was full placed before a window at the which the queene stood, and might be plainelie seene and openlie viewed. When Mercurie had espied hir highnesse, he skipped out of the coch, and being on the ground, gaue a iumpe or two, and aduanced himselfe in such a sort, that the queene smiled at the boldnesse of the boie. Thus Mercurie beholding the queene with great courage and audacitie, at the length bowed downe his head, and immediatlie stood bolt vpright, and shaked his rod, and so began his speech with a most assured countenance, and brauelie pronounced it in deed, to his great liking and commendation.

Muse not good queene at me that message brings
From Ioue or iust Jehoua Lord of might,
No earthlie god, yet gouerns mortall things,
And spites diuine, and shunning angels sight.
This lord of late to shew his mightie power,
Hath wonders wrought when world lookt least therefore:
For at his becke, this daie and present hower,
The heauens shake, the thunderbolts did rore.
The earth did mone, the dead therein did rise,
And out of graue the ghosts of men are gone,
The wandring spites that houered in the skies
Dropt downe from aire, for world to wonder on.
The saints themselues that sat in glorie great,
Were sent in hast to worke Jehouas will,
And I that oft my restlesse wings doo beat,
Was cald to vse my wings and office still.
A common post is Mercurie you know,
When he commands that made the world of nought,
And flies as fast as arrow out of bow,
When message may expresse Jehouas thought.
Whose power diuine full long per this hath seene,
That in this place should lodge a sacred queene.
And weighing well, the prince whereof I speake,
Might wearie wax of common paltimes heere,
(For that he knowes his indgement is not weake)
Deuisd aboue, below there should appeere
(To welcome hir) some sights that rare should seeme,
And carelesse stood, what world thereof did deeme,
So that good queene, you take them well in worth.
No sooner had Jehoua meant these things,
But clouds clapt hands, and soules of men came forth
Of heauen gates, yea goodlie crowned kings
Were flowen abroad from blessed Abrams brest:
Some in the aire, and tops of trees did rest,
Some fell on towres and statelie houses high,
Some sunke in seas, whose names were drowned now,
And some did light on land where euerie eie
May them behold, and note their manners throw.
And therewithall the blacke infernall spreets
Ran out of hell, the earth so trembling than,
And like yoong lads they hopt about the streets,
The satyres wild, in forme and shape of man,
Crept through the woods, and thickets full of breers,
The water nymphs, and feiries streight appeers
In vncouth formes and fashion strange to view:
The hags of hell that hatefull are of kind,
To please the time had learnd a nature new,
And all those things that man can call to mind,
Were glad to come and doo their dutie throw.
I seeing this, cald for my coch in hast,
Abide sir boie, then said Jehoua now,
Thou goest not yet vntill a prince be plast,
Where I appoint, thou hast nothing to sale.
Then still I stood, to know what should be done.
With that a swarme of people euerie waie
Like little ants about the fields gan run,
Some to prouide for pompe and triumph great,
Some for good fare, yea houshold cates and meat,
And some they ran to seeke where poets dwell,
To pen forth shews, and paint out trifles well.
Some haild and pild to bring the carrege in,
Some ran to gaze on triumph neere at hand,
And some stood mute, as they amazd had bin
To see a court and princelie noble band
Come marching on, and make heere their abode.
But when I saw the carrege heere vnlode,
And well had weid the wonders I haue told,
O mightie God (quoth I) now giue me leaue
To go from thee some message to vnfold,
That by my speech the hearers may conceiue.
Thy godhead great hath brought this princesse here.
It shall be so (quoth he) dispatch and part,
And tell hir that she is to me so deere,
That I appoint by mans deuise and art,
That euerie daie she shall see sundrie shows,

An. Reg. 21.

If that the pleaſe to walke and take the aire,
And that to loone as out of doore ſhe goes
(If time doo ſerue and weather waxeth faire)
Some old deuiſe ſhall meet hir highneſſe ſtreight,
To make hir ſmile, and eaſe hir burthened breſt,
And take away the cares and things of weight
That princes keele, that findeth greateſt reſt.
When I had thus receiued my charge at full,
My golden rod in timelie hand I tooke,
And bad in haſt my fleeng hoſſes pull.
But yet I paſt, I gan about me looke,
To ſee that coch, and ech thing gallant were:
So downe I came all winged as you ſee.
And ſith I haue eſpide that princeſſe there,
That greateſt kings doo ſue to by degree,
And manie moo that liues no whit, doo feare
I kiſſe hir ſteps, and ſhew my maiſters will,
And leaue with hir ſuch graces from aboue,
As alwaies ſhall command hir peoples loue,
(Vphold hir reigne, maintaine hir regall ſtate,
Find out falſe harts, and make of ſubiects true,
Plant perfect peace, and root vp all debate)
So with this grace good queene now heere adue.
For I may now on earth no longer ſtaie,
Thus ſeruants muſt to maiſters will obaie.

The quéenes rare eſtate vttered.

Mercurie hauing thus ſpoken to the quéene, whoſe gratious inclination is ſuch, as will not haue anie thing dutifullie offered to paſſe vnregarded, was well heard, hir highnes ſtanding at a window, and the ſpéech verie well taken and vnderſtood. Mercurie as he came paſſed awaie, at whoſe coch the people that had ſeldome ſéene ſuch a deuiſe maruelled, and gazed verie much; for it had hoſſes to draw it finelie painted and winged, to as great ſhew and order of that it preſented, as wit might imagine: the cochman ſutable to the ſame, and a trumpetter in right good garments, as decent for that purpoſe as could be deuiſed. But the coch was made and framed on ſuch a faſhion as few men haue ſéene: the whole whereof was couered with birds and naked ſpirits, hanging by the hæles in the aire and clouds, cunninglie painted out, as though by ſome thunder cracke they had béene ſhaken and tormented: yet ſtaied by power diuine in their places, to make the more wonder and miraculous ſhew. And on the middle of that coch ſtood a high compaſſed tower bedecked with golden and gaie iewels, in the top whereof was placed a faire plume of white feathers, all to beſpanged and trimmed to the moſt brauerie: Mercurie himſelfe in blew ſatin lined with cloth of gold, his garments cut and ſlaſhed on the fineſt maner, a peaked hat of the ſame colour, as though it ſhould cut and ſeuer the wind aſunder; and on the ſame a paire of wings, and wings on his hæles likewiſe. And on his golden rod were little wings alſo, about the which rod were two wrigling or ſcralling ſerpents, which ſeemed to haue life when the rod was moued or ſhaken. So in this ſort and forme was Mercurie and his coch ſet forth, and indéed at ſuch a ſeaſon as a great ſort looked not for anie ſhew, nor things were readie, as ſome thought, to performe that was neceſſarie and expected: yet hap was ſo good, and the gratious fauour of the prince, that all was well taken, and conſtrued to the beſt meaning of the deuiſor. So ended that daies deuiſe, which offered occaſion to further matter.

On tueſdaie following (for before that daie by meanes of the weather the quéene went not abrode) a verie prettie and pleaſant ſhew was performed before hir highnes without ſaint Benets gates, as ſhe went towards Coſſie parke to hunt. At which ſeaſon, although the deuiſor was not well prouided of things neceſſarie for a ſhew (by meane of ſome croſſing cauſes in the citie) yet hearing the quéene rode abrode, determined as he might (and yet by helpe of frends and hap) verie well to venture the hazard of a ſhew, and to be full in the waie where hir highneſſe ſhuld paſſe towards hir dinner. In which determination manie doubts were to be caſt, and manie perſuaded him to tarrie a better time. But conſidering how time rolled on, and daies and houres did waſt (without doing anie thing promiſed and not performed) he haſtilie prepared his boies and men with all their furnitures, and ſo ſet forward with two coches handſomlie trimmed. The common people beholding the maner thereof, and greédie to gaze on that ſhould be done, followed as their fantaſies did lead them: ſo that when the deuiſor and his retinue came into the open field, there was as great a traine and preaſe about the ſhew, as came with the court at that inſtant, which graced much the matter, and gaue it ſome erected hope of good ſucceſſe.

The deuiſor aduenturech the hazard of a ſhew.

The whole manner of the deuiſe or ſhew.

Firſt, there was a fained deuiſe, that Venus and Cupid were thruſt out of heauen, and walking on the earth, met a philoſopher, who demanded from whenſe they came. They told the philoſopher what they were, and he replied, and began with truth & taunts to tickle them ſo nére, that Venus fell in a great anger, and Cupid ran awaie, and left his mother and the philoſopher diſputing togither. But Cupid becauſe he would be nouriſhed ſomewhere, ran to the court, and there ſought for ſuccor, & incountring the quéene began to complaine his ſtate and his mothers, and told how the philoſopher had handled them both. But finding neither anſwer nor aid, he returned againe, but not to his mother, for ſhe was fallen mad vpon a conceipt that ſhe was not made of. And Cupid wandering in the world, met with dame Chaſtitie & hir maids, called Modeſtie, Temperance, God exerciſe, and Shamefaſtnes: and ſhe with hir foure maids incountring Cupid in a goodlie coch, and without anie honeſt gard waiting on him, ſet vpon him, threw him out of his golden ſeat, trod on his pompe, ſpoiled him of his counterfeit godhead and cloke, & tooke awaie his bow and quiuer of arrowes, the one headed with lead, and the other with gold, and ſo ſent him like a fugitiue awaie, and mounted vp into the coch hir ſelfe and hir maids, and ſo came to the quéene, and reherſed what had hapned. Although this was done in hir view, & becauſe (ſaid Chaſtitie) that the quéene had choſen the beſt life, ſhe gaue the quéene Cupids bow, to learne to ſhoot at whom ſhe pleaſed, ſith none could wound hir highneſſe heart, it was méet (ſaid Chaſtitie) that ſhe ſhould doo with Cupids bow & arrows what ſhe pleaſed; and ſo did Chaſtitie depart as ſhe ſaid to the powers diuine. Cupid in the meane while wandering in the world had found out Wantonneſſe and Riot, who ſone fell into beggerie and ruine (a ſpectacle to be looked into) and felt ſuch dailie miſerie with Wantonneſſe and Riot, that Cupid was forced to fling awaie once againe, and hazard himſelfe to fall into the hands of naughtie people, or where fortune aſſigned: and comming abrode, happened vpon the philoſopher, who talked with him againe, told him his errors, and other points of pride and preſumption; declaring it was a great blaſphemie & abuſe, to report & beléeue that in heauen were anie other gods but one, who had the onelie rule of all, & that made all of naught. In which reaſoning & diſcourſe Cupid waxed warme, & yet in his greateſt heat knew not how nor where to cole himſelfe, at which time came Wantonneſſe & Riot, & perſuaded Cupid to plaie no longer the fole in ſtriuing with philoſophers, and go awaie with them. So Cupid departed, & went awaie with Wantonneſſe and Riot, & the philoſopher remained, & declared that all abuſes & follies ſhuld come to no better end than preſentlie was experſſed by the miſerie of Wantonneſſe, Riot, and Cupid. Then Modeſtie and hir fellows, leauing their miſtreſſe dame Chaſtitie with the powers diuine, came ſoft and faire in their miſtreſſe coch, ſinging a ſong of chaſte life, as heere vnder followeth.

Chaſt life liues long and looks
On world and wicked waies,
Chaſt life for loſſe of pleaſures ſhort,
Dooth win immortall praiſe.
Chaſt life hath merrie moods,
And ſoundlie taketh reſt,

Chaſt life is pure as babe new borne,
that hugs in mothers breſt.
Lewd life cuts off his dates, and ſoone runs out his date,
Confounds good wits, breeds naughtie bloud,
and weakens mans eſtate.
Lewd like the Lord doth loth,
the law and land miſlikes,
The wiſe will ſhun, fond fooles doo ſeeke, and God ſore plages and ſtrikes.
Chaſt life may dwell alone,
and find few fellowes now,
And ſit in regall throne,
and ſcarch lewd manners throw.
Chaſt life feares no miſhap,
the whole account is made,
When ſoule from worldlie cares is crept,
and ſits in ſacred ſhade.
Lewd life is laught to ſcorne,
and put to great diſgrace,
In hollow caues it hides the head, and walks with muffled face,
Found out and pointed at,
a monſter of the mind,
A cankred worme that conſcience eates,
and ſtrikes cleere ſenſes blind.
Chaſt life a pretious pearle,
doth ſhine as bright as ſun,
The faire houre glaſſe of daies and yeeres, that neuer out will run.
The beautie of the ſoule,
the bodies bliſſe and eaſe,
A thing that leaſt is looкt vnto, yet moſt the mind ſhall pleaſe.

And when the ſong was ended, modeſtie ſent (as ſhe ſaid ſhe was) from hir maiſtreſſe, ſpake to the queene a good ſeaſon, and ſo the matter ended. For this ſhew the deuiſer had gratious words of the queene openlie and often pronounced by hir highneſſe. On the ſame daie the miniſter of the Dutch church, pronouncing to hir maieſtie at hir being at bode the oration following, preſented the cup therein mentioned, which was eſteemed to be worth fiftie pounds, verie curiouſlie and artificiallie wrought.

Oratio ad ſereniſſimam Angliæ reginam habita 19. Auguſti 1578 à miniſtro eccleſiæ Belgogermanicæ Nordouici in loco publico.

In acknowledgement of benefits by her mate-thwith duetifulnes for the same.

serable and dispersed members of Christ obiect to euerie kind of iniurie, before beaten in peeces by a thousand deaths, with the safetie and preseruation as well of mind as bodie. For these thy singular benefits of godlinesse towards vs, and that we liue vnder so good a tutor, being magistrate in this thy citie of Norwich, which thy maiestie hath of clemencie granted vnto vs for a manſion place, which were banished for Christ his religion; and moreouer that we find the minds of the people fauourable towards vs, first wee giue immortall thanks, not such as wee ought, but such as we are able vnto God the father, and the Lord our onelie sauiour Iesus Christ; and then vnto thee most mercifull queene. Moreouer, it is our humble and yet our onelie petition, to shew vnto your maiestie the thankefulnesse of our mind. Behold therefore dedicated to your most excellent maiestie, not anie gift but our mind, no princelie iewell but a monument of godlinesse and posteritie. The which we hope will be so much the more acceptable to your maiestie; for bicause the goodnes of God towards your maiestie is liuelie drawne out of the historie of the innocent and most godlie Ioseph, whom neither policie, strength nor desire of bearing rule, but constant faith, godlinesse of a christian heat, and heauenlie vertue by Gods singular mercie deliuered from the bloudie conspiracie of his brethren and feare of death, and brought vnto high dignitie & roiall kingdome. To whose brethren that prouerbiall sentence of the Hebrewes is verie fitlie alluded: Enuie being the desire of euill things, and couetousnesse of transitorie renowme, is oftentimes the occasion of mans destruction. But touching the mind of Ioseph, the same was indued with such temperance and fortitude, that he might be thought no lesse vniust than wicked, that would accuse him so much as with the least affection of reuengement: so wholie did he commit himselfe and all the gouernement of his life, his life I say put in hazard in a strange kingdome vnto the prouidence of God, that he seemed to hang of no other thing than the onelie will of God. But to what end speake I this? Are not these selfe same things, and others their like (ô most excellent queene) by the eies of all men clearlie beheld in thee and the order of thy kingdome? What man (I saie) hauing his wits, can denie these things to be the most happie ioy, spirituall crowne, & chiefest ornament of Christes church, & trulie of this kingdome the princelie beautie and perpetuall renowne? Thou surelie dost folow most holilie the mind of Ioseph, by the singular goodnesse of God, as well in preseruing thy kingdome, as in amplifieng the kingdome of Christ (ô thou most faithfull nurse of the church of God.) For it is in God onelie to destroie this man by prosperitie (as the world seeth) and aduance another by al kinds of aduersities, tentations, & dangers. Whom as he acknowlegeth the vessels of his mercie, so by his goodnesse togither with the consolation and strength of his spirit, he doth bring them to the happinesse of eternall life. Which our petition that good and mercifull God grant may be ratified, in establishing your maiestie and gouernance of your kingdome with spirituall wisedome and vnderstanding, in preseruing the same full manie years, and indueing your maiesties subiects more and more with true knowledge of him, for his sonnes sake our Lord Iesus Christ, Amen.

Iosephus insigniter laudatus, neque immeritò.

Regia maiestas in omnibus Iosepho equiparata.

A monument of antiquitie presented to hir maiestie.

Ioseph singularlie commended not without cause.

The queenes maiestie compared to Ioseph, &c.

What orators were best commended in former times of best renowme.

The oration ended, there was a certeine monument presented to hir maiestie, in the vpper part whereof was artificiallie grauen the historie of Ioseph out of Genesis. In the inner part of the same there was the figure of a serpent, interfolding it selfe: in the middest whereof did sit a doue with this sentence of Christ, Matth. 10, 16. Wise as the serpent, and meeke as the doue. In the circumference or compasse thereof was these verses to be read.

To roiall scepter, godlinesse,
Ioseph the innocent,
Dooth take from brothers bloudie hands,
and murtherers intent.
So ther, O queene, the Lord hath led from prison and deceit
Of thine, vnto these highest tops of your princelie estate.

The queenes maiestie is banketted at the earle of Surreis.

On wednesdaie hir highnesse dined at my lord of Surreis, where were the French ambassadors also, at a most rare and delicate dinner and banket. At which season the deuiser did watch with his shew (called Manhod & Desert) at my lord of Surreis backe doore, going to the quenes barge: but the roome was so little, that neither the shot, the armed men, nor the players could haue place conuenient. Wherevpon he and his assistants toke boats, and conueied their people downe the water, towards a landing place that they hoped the quene would come vnto. And there hauing althings in redinesse, they houered on the water three long houres, by which meanes the night came on, and so they were faine to withdraw themselues and go homeward, trusting for a better time and occasion, which in deed was offered the next daie after by the quenes maiesties owne good motion, who told the deuiser she would see what pastimes were prepared, as hereafter you shall perceiue by the discourse of these matters, and by this shew of Manhod, and the shew of the Nymphes. Neuertheless, as hir maiestie returned homeward; within Bishops gate at the hospitall doore, maister Stephan Limbert, maister of the grammar schole in Norwich stood readie to render hir an oration. Hir maiestie drew neare vnto him, & thinking him fearefull, said gratiouslie vnto him: Be not afraid. He answered hir againe in English: I thanke your maiestie for your good incouragement: & then with good courage entered into this oration following.

O singular affabilitie of a prince to put awaie a subiects bashfulnesse.

The oration of Stephan Limbert, publike schoolemaister, to the most magnificent prince, Elisabeth of England, France, and Ireland queene, &c: before the gates of the hospitall of Norwich.

IT is reported (most gratious queene) that Aegypt is watered with the yerelie ouerflowing of Nilus, and Lidia with the golden streame of Pactolus, which thing is thought to be the cause of the great frutefulnes of these countries: but vpon vs, and further, ouer all England, euen into the vttermost borders, manie and maine riuers of godlinesse, iustice, humilitie, and other innumerable good things, in comparison of the which, gold is vile and naught worth, doo most plentifullie gush out, and those not from Tmolus, or other hilles I know not which, but from that continuall and most aboundant wellspring of your goodnesse. And that of those infinit goodnesses I maie lightlie touch one, for that neither place, time, nor my abilitie dooth permit to speake of manie: with what praises shall we extoll; with what magnificent words shall we expresse that notable mercie of your highnesse (most renowmed queene) and vncredible readinesse to relieue the need of poore men, than the which of manie vertues none can be more acceptable vnto God, as Homer writeth, neither anie vertue in a mightie prince more woondered at amongst men. This hospitall of poore men is most famous, which will be a monument of princelie vertue and beneficence amongst all posteritie, instituted by the most mightie king Henrie your highnesse father, confirmed with the great seale by the most noble king Edward your brother, but by your maiestie, which deserueth no lesse praise, of late notablie increased and amplified by the lands and possessions of Cringleford, that you maie not now worthilie reioise so much in others ornaments, as your owne vertues. For you are said for your singular wisdome and learning, to haue studied that diuine law of the most wise Plato, which he left written in the eleuenth booke of lawes. Such your great bountie therefore, so exceeding and incredible mercie (ô most vertuous prince) in what bookes shall we comprehend? With what duties, or with what voice shall we testifie the good will of a thankefull mind? For when we diligentlie seeke all the most exquisit and curious means of thankesgiuing: we cannot so much as atteine vnto the greatnesse of this one benefit, by the which we acknowledge our selues bound and streictlie holden to your most roiall maiestie. We shall be ouercome, euen with this one and singular benefit, so much the lesse hope haue we then in anie point to counteruaile the huge sea of the rest of your benefits, which ouerfloweth on euerie side as well publikelie & generallie ouer all your subiects, as properlie and particularlie vpon this citie. We certeinlie now inhabit, and lead our liues in those most happie Ilands, of the which Hesiodus maketh mention, which not onelie abound with all maner of graine, wooll, cattell, and other aids of mans life; but much more with the most pretious treasure of true religion and the word of God, in the which onlie the minds of men haue rest and peace. There be that call England another world, which I thinke maie be most true in this our age. For whereas all lands on euerie side of vs are afflicted with most grieuous warres, and tossed with the flouds of dissention, we onelie (your highnesse gouerning our sterne) doo saile in a most peaceable hauen, and seuered from a world of mischiefs, doo seeme after a sort to be taken vp into a heauen of happinesse. We therefore (according to our bounden dutie) first giue thanks vnto God almightie, vnto whose goodnesse onelie with thanks we referre all this our happinesse, how great soeuer it be, & praie that he would vouchsafe to make the same proper and perpetuall vnto vs. And afterwards vnto your highnesse (ô most gratious queene) by whose studie, care and diligence we confesse this blessednesse to be gotten, and so manie years preserued vnto vs. We are glad in this beholding you, and we reioise with desire more than maie be beleeued, which as I speake of mine owne thought, so also all the subiects of Norwich desire me to saie the same in their behalfe. And I would England sometime called another world.

Their bounden reuerence to her maiestie.

I would to God you could pearse these our breasts with your eies, and throughlie view the hidden and couered creeks of our minds! Then vndoubtedlie should you behold an infinit heape of goodwill closelie shut vp within, which cannot breake out of so narrow straits. All the faith, studie, and obedience, which are due to so great a prince, as hitherto we haue most willinglie imploied, so will we alwaies most diligentlie performe the same: and if at anie time anie chance shall happen (which fortune God turne from vs) that the state of thy blessed maiestie, or of this flourishing realme should come in danger, or the worthinesse therof be in hazard, we do not onlie protest the effusion of all our goods and substance, but also the putting foorth and brunt of our strengths and bodies therein. Finallie, we desire and beseech thy excellencie (most renowmed queene) well to accept of this our dutie, howsoeuer it be, proceeding from a singular good will, and a most thankefull mind, and so to thinke of vs citizens of Norwich, that perhaps you haue manie times come to people more wealthie, but to more ioifull neuer.

The excellent and incomparable blessings of England.

Immediatlie after the beginning of the oration hir maiestie called to hir the French ambassadors, whereof there were three, and diuerse English lords, and willed them to harken, and she hirselfe was verie attentiue, euen vntill the end thereof. And the oration ended, after she had giuen great thanks therefore to maister Limbert, she said to him; It is the best that euer I heard; you shall haue my hand: and pulled off hir gloue, and gaue him hir hand to kisse, which before kneeling on his knees, he arose and kissed; and then she departed to the court without anie other shew that night, but that she sent backe to know his name. The nert night being thursdaie there was an excellent princelie maske brought before hir after supper by maister Goldingham in the priuie chamber, it was of gods and goddesses both strangelie and richlie apparelled. The first that entred was Mercurie, then entred two torchbearers in purple taffata mandillions laid with siluer lace, as all other the torchbearers were; then entred a consort of muslke, to wit, six musicians, all in long vestures of white sarsenet girded about them, and garlands on their heads, plaieng verie cunninglie; then two torchbearers more; then Iupiter and Iuno, then two torchbearers more; then Mars and Venus, then two torchbearers more; then Apollo and Pallas, then two torchbearers more; then Neptune and Diana; and lastly Cupid concluding the matter.

The queenes high commendation of maister Limberts oration.

King Henrie king Edward and queene Elisabeth acknowledged speciall benefactors.

The description of an excellent and princelie maske.

Thus when they had once marched about the chamber, Mercurie dischargeth his message in these words to the queene: The god meaning maior and all his brethren, with the rest, haue not rested from praieng vnto the gods to prosper thy comming hither; and the gods themselues moued by their vnfained praiers, are readie in person to bid thee worthilie welcome; and I Mercurie the god of merchants and merchandize, and therefore a fauourer of the citizens, being thought meetest am chosen fittest to signifie the same. Gods there be also which cannot come, being tied by the time of the yeare, as Ceres in haruest, Bacchus in wines, Pomona in orchards. Onelie Hymineus denieth his good will, either in presence or in person: notwithstanding Diana hath so counterchecked him therfore, as he shall hereafter be at your commandement. For my part, as I am a reioiser at your comming, so am I a furtherer of your welcome hither; and for this time I bid you farewell.

Mercuries message to the queene.

England deserueth called another world.

Feare not oh queene, thou art beloued so,
As subiects true will truelie thee defend:
Feare not my power to ouerthrow thy foe,
I am the God that can each mischiefe amend.
Thou doest know great Iupiter am I,
That gaue thee first thy happie soueraintie.
I giue thee still as euer thou hast had,
A peerelesse power vnto thy dieng daie:
I giue thee rule to ouercome the bad,
And loue to loue thy louing subiects aie.

Then marched they about againe, and that done Iupiter spake to the queene in this sort, and then gaue hir a riding wand of whales fin curiouslie wrought.

Their vnfeigned reioising to see hir maiestie.

I giue thee heere this small and slender wand,
To shew thou shalt in quiet rule the land.

Then Iuno spake, whose gift was a purse curiouslie wrought.

Is Iuno rich? No sure she is not so,
She wants that wealth that is not wanting heere,
Thy goods get friends, my wealth wins mante a foe,
My riches rust, but thine shine palling cleere.
Thou art beloued of subiects farre and nie,
Which is such wealth as monie cannot buie.
Farewell faire queene, I cannot giue thee ought,
Nor take awaie thy good that is so bound:
Thou canst not giue that I so long haue sought,
Ne can I hold the riches thou hast found.
Yet take this gift, though poore I seeme to be,
That thou thy selfe shalt neuer poorer be.

Then after they had marched againe about, Mars gaue his gift, which was a faire paire of kniues, and said:

Where force dooth fiercelie seeke to foster wrong,
There Mars dooth make him make a quicke recoile,
Nor can indure that he should harbor long,
Where naughtie wights manure in goodlie soile.
This is the vse that aids the force of warre,
That Mars dooth mend, that force dooth seeke to marre.
And though oh queene thou beest a prince of peace,
Yet shalt thou haue me tatlie sure at need:
The stormes of strife and bluttering byroles to cease,
Which forren foes or faithlesse friends may breed.
To conquer, kill, to vanquish and subdue,
Such fained folke, as loues to liue vntrue.

These words were ingrauen vpon the knives:

To hurt your foe and helpe your frend,
These knives are made vnto that end:
Both blunt and sharpe you shall vs find,
As pleaseth best your princelie mind.

Then spake Venus whose gift was a white doue.

In vaine (faire queene) from heauen my comming was,
To seeke to mend that is no waie amis:
For now I see thy fauour so dooth passe,
That none but thou, thou onelie she it is,
Whose beautie bids each wight to looke on thee,
By view they may another Venus see.
Where beautie boasts, and fauour dooth not faile,
What may I giue to thee O worthie wight?
This is my gift, there shall no two preuaile,
That seekes thy will against thy wilkes delight,
Not where they will, but where it likes thy mind,
Accept that friend if loiall thou him find.

The doue being cast off, ran directlie to the queene, and being taken vp and set vpon the table before hir maiestie, sate so quietlie as if it had beene tied. Then after they had marched againe about, Apollo presented his gift, which was an instrument called a bandonet, and did sing to the said instrument this short and pithie dittie, as he was plaieng therevpon:

The song of Apollo to the queene.

It seemeth strange to see such strangers heere,
Yet not so strange but strangers knowes you well:
Your vertuous thoughts to gods doo plaine appeere,
Your acts on earth bewraies how you excell:
You cannot die, loue here hath made your leale,
Which gods haue sent, and God saith shall not reale.
Vertuous desire desired me to sing,
No subiects sute, though suters they were all,
Apollos gifts are subiect to no king,
Rare are thy gifts that did Apollo call,
Then still reioise, sith God and man saie so,
This is my gift, thou neuer shalt haue wo.

Pallas then speaketh and presenteth his gift, which was a booke of wisdome.

Most worthie wight, what wouldst thou haue of me?
Thou hast so much, thou canst inioie no more:
I cannot giue that once I gaue to thee,
Nor take awaie the good I gaue before.
I robbed was by natures good consent,
Against my will, and yet I was content.
A Pallas thou, a princelie I will be:
I queene of losse, thou goddesse which hast got;
I sometime was, thou onelie now art she:
I take, thou gainest that lucke that was my lot.
I giue not thee this booke to learne thee aught,
For that I know alreadie thou art taught.

Then Neptune spake: his gift was a great artificiall fish, and in the belie of it a pike, which he threw out before hir maiestie.

What art thou (queene) that gods do loue thee so?
Who woon their wils to bend at thy will?
How can the world become thy cruell foe?
How can Disdaine or Malice seeke to kill?
Can sea or earth deuise to hurt thy hap?
Sith thou by gods doost sit in fortunes lap.
As heauen and earth haue vowed to be thine,
So Neptunes seas haue swore to drench thy foes;
As I am god, and all the waters mine,
Still shalt thou get, but neuer shalt thou lose:
And sith on earth my wealth is nought at all,
Accept good will, the gift is verie small.

Diana presented a bow and arrowes nocked and headed with siluer; hir speach was this.

Who euer found on earth a constant friend,
That may compare with this my virgin queene?
Who euer found a bodie and a mind
So free from staine, so perfect to be seene?
Oh heauenlie hew, that aptest is to soile,
And yet doost liue from blot of anie soile.
Rare is thy gift, and giuen to few or none,
Mallst therefore of some that dare not say,
More shines thy light, for that I know but one,
That anie such shew, to follow on their waie.
Thou thou art thee, take thou the onelie praise,
For chastest dame in these our happie daies.

Accept

Accept my bowe, ſith beſt thou dooſt deſerue,
Though well I know thy mind can thee preſerue.

Cupido his ſpeach, his gift an arrow of gold.

Ah ha, I ſee my mother out of ſight,
Then let the boy now plaie the wag a while,
I ſeeme but weake, yet weake is not my might,
My boiſtſh wit can oldeſt folke beguile.
Who ſo dooth thinke, I ſpeake this but in teſt,
Let me but ſhoot, and I ſhall quench his reſt,
Marke here my ſhafts: this all is made of wood,
Which is but ſoft, and breeds but ſoft good will,
Now this is gilt, yet ſeemes it gold full good,
And dooth deceiue blind louing people ſtill.
But here is one is ſeldome felt or ſeene:
This is of gold, meet for the nobleſt queene.
Wherefore dame faire, take thou this gift of me,
Though ſome deſerue, yet none deſerue like you,
Shoot but this ſhaft at king or Ceſar: he,
And he is thine, and if thou wilt allow,
It is a gift that manie here doo craue,
Yet none but thou this golden ſhaft maie haue.

There was written vpon the ſhaft:

My colour, ioy, my ſubſtance pure,
My vertue ſuch as ſhall indure.

The quéenes behauiour after all this welcomming.

Hir maieſtie receiued theſe gifts verie thankefullie, the gods and goddeſſes with the reſt of the maſke marched about the chamber againe, and then departed in like maner as they came in. Then the quéene called vnto hir maſter Robert Wood, the maior of Norwich, whom firſt ſhe heartilie thanked, and toke by the hand, and vſed ſecret conference: but what I know not. And thus this delightfull night paſſed, to the ioy of all that ſaw hir grace in ſo pleaſant plight.

The deuiſor is commanded to be readie with his ſhewes to delight the quéene.

On thurſdaie in the morning, my lord chamberlains gaue the deuiſor warning the quéene would ride abroade in the after none, and he commanded him to be readie, dutifullie to preſent hir with ſome ſhew. Then knowing which waie the quéene would ride (by coniecture and inſtructions giuen) the deuiſor cauſed a place to be made and digged for the nymphes of the water, the maner and proportion whereof was in this ſorme and faſhion. Firſt there was meaſure taken for three ſcore foot of ground euerie waie, the hole to be made déepe and foure ſquare, which ground was all couered with canuas painted græne like the graſſe, and at euerie ſide on the canuas ran a ſtring through curteine rings, which ſtring might eaſilie be drawne anie kind of waie, by reaſon of two great poales that laie along in the ground, and anſwered the curteine or canuas on each ſide, ſo that drawing a ſmall cord in the middle of the canuas, the earth would ſéeme to open, & ſo that againe as the other end of the cord was drawne backward.

A proper deuiſe and verie delectable of a caue & twelue water nymphes, &c.

And in the ſame caue was a noble noiſe of muſike of all kind of inſtruments, ſeuerallie to be ſounded and plaied vpon, and at one time they ſhould be ſounded all together, that might ſerue for a conſort of broken muſike. And in the ſame caue alſo was placed twelue water nymphes, diſguiſed or dreſſed moſt ſtrangelie, ech of them had either vpon white ſilke, or fine linnen, græne ſedges ſtitched cunninglie on a long garment, ſo well wrought and alſo ſet on, as ſcarſe anie whit might be perceiued. And euerie nymph had in hir hand a great bundle of bulruſhes, and had on hir head a garland of iuie, vnder the which iuie was a coiſe of moſſe, and vnder the moſſe was there long goodlie heare like golden treſſes that couered hir ſhoulders, and in a maner raught downe vnto hir middle.

Now touching the beautie of the nymphes, they ſéemed to be the choſen children of the world, and became their attire ſo well, that their beautie might haue abuſed a right good iudgement. For diuerſe of thoſe that knew them before (albeit they were bare faced) could ſcarſe know them in their garments, and ſundrie toke them to be yong girles and wenches, prepared for the nonce, to procure a laughter.

What was deuiſed to be done by the nymphes at the Theſe nymphs thus apparelled, and all things in good plight and readineſſe, there was deuiſed, that at the quéenes comming néere the water ſide (as this caue ſtood at the brim of the riuer) one nymph ſhould pop vp out of the caue firſt, and ſalute the quéene with a ſpeach, and then another: and ſo till foure of them had finiſhed their ſpeaches, there they ſhould remaine; and when they retired into their caue, the muſike ſhould begin: which ſure had béene a noble hearing, and the more melodious for the varietie thereof, and becauſe it ſhould come ſecretlie and ſtrangelie out of the earth. And when the muſike was done, then ſhould all the twelue nymphs haue iſſued together, & danſed a danſe with timbrels that were trimmed with belles, and other iangling things, which timbrels were as brode as a ſiue, hauing bottoms of fine parchment, and being ſounded, made ſuch a confuſed noiſe and paſtime, that it was to be wondered at: beſides the ſtrangeneſſe of the timbrels (yet knowne to our forefathers) was a matter of admiration vnto ſuch as were ignorant of that new found toy, gathered and borrowed from our elders. So in order and readineſſe ſtood that ſhew for the time.

The quéens comming neere the water ſide.

And to kéepe that ſhew companie (but yet farre off) ſtood the ſhew of Manhood and Deſert, as firſt to be preſented, and that ſhew was as well furniſhed as the other; men all, ſaue one boy called Beautie; for the which, Manhood, Fauour, and Deſert, did ſtriue (or ſhould haue contended) but good Fortune (as victor of all conqueſts) was to come in, and ouerthrow Manhood, Fauour, Deſert, & all their powers, and onelie by fine force (vpon a watchword ſpoken) ſhould laie hand on Beautie, and carrie or lead hir away. The other ſutors troubled with this kind of dealing, ſhould talke togither, and ſweare to be in one mind for an open reuenge: and vpon that Fortune ſhould crie Arme, arme. The other ſide called for their friends, at the which ſtirre ſhould appeare both their ſtrengthes: but good Fortune ſhould farre in power exceed his enimies. And yet to ſhew that Deſtinie (and who beſt can conquer) ſhall gouerne all, Fortune ſhould make an offer, that ſix to ſix with ſword and target ſhould end the brall and buſineſſe. Then ſix gentlemen on either ſide with rebated ſwords and targets (onelie in dublet and hoſe, and murrion on head) approched and would claime the combat, and deale togither twelue blowes apéece, and in the end Fortune ſhould be victor: and then the ſhot and armed men ſhould fall at variance ſo ſharpelie (vpon miſtaking of the matter) that Fortunes ſide ſhould triumph and march ouer the bellies of their enimies: in which time were legs and armes of men (well and liuelie wrought) to be let fall in numbers on the ground, as bloudie as might be. Fortune, regarding nothing but victorie, marcheth ſo awaie in great triumph: and then ſhould haue come into the place a ſong for the death of Manhood, Fauor, and Deſert, and ſo the ſhew ſhould haue ended.

The ſhew of Manhood and Deſert with the furniture declared.

A bloudie fight and yet harmleſſe done by art.

But now note what befell after this great buſineſſe and preparation. For as the quœnes highneſſe was appointed to come vnto hir coch, and the lords and courtiers were readie to mount on horſſebacke, there fell ſuch a ſhowre of raine (& in the necke thereof came ſuch a terrible thunder) that euerie one of vs were driuen to ſéeke for couert and moſt comfort, inſomuch that ſome of vs in hote ſtood vnder a bridge and were all ſo daſhed & waſhed, that it was a greater paſtime to ſée vs loke like drowned rats, than to haue beheld the vttermoſt of the ſhewes rehearſed. Thus you ſée, a ſhew in the open field is alwaies ſubiect to the ſudden change of weather, and a number of more inconueniences. But what ſhould be ſaid of that which the citie loſt by this cauſe; veluets, ſilkes, tinſels, and ſome cloth of gold being cut out for theſe purpoſes, that could not ſerue to anie great effect after: Well, there was no more to ſaie, but an old adage, that Man dooth purpoſe, but God dooth diſpoſe, to whose disposition and pleasure the guide of greater maters is committed. So this thursdaie toke his leaue from the actors, and left them loking one vpon another, & he that thought he had receiued most iniurie, kept greatest silence, and lapping vp (among a bundle of other misfortunes) this euill chance, euerie person quietlie passed to his lodging.

All the preparation diſappointed by thunder and raine.

The nert daie being fridaie, in which daie the court remoued, the streets towards saint Benets gates were hanged, from the one side to the other, with cords made of hearbs and floures, with garlands, coronets, pictures, rich cloths, and a thousand deuises. At the gates themselues there was a stage made verie richlie apparelled with cloth of gold and crimsin veluet, wherupon in a close place made theron for the purpose, was placed verie swéet muslike: & one readie to render hir this speach following. The dolefull houre of hir departure came, she passed from the court, to those gates, with such countenances, both of hir maiesties part, and hir subiects now dolorous, now chéerefull, as plainlie shewed the louing hearts of both sides. When she came there the speach was thus vttered vnto hir in verie plausible sort:

Terrestriall ioies are tide with slender file,
Each happie hap full hastilie dooth slide,
As summer season lasteth but a while,
So winter stormes doo longer time abide:
Alas what blisse can anie time endure?
Our sunshine daie is dasht with sudden shoure.
Could toong expresse our secret ioies of hart,
(Oh mightie prince) when thou didst come in place?
No no God wot, nor can expresse the smart
Thy subiects feele in this departing case.
But gratious queene, let here thy grace remaine
In gratious wise, till thy returne againe.
In lieu whereof, receiue thy subiects harts,
In fixed faith continuallie thine owne:
Who readie rest to loose their vitall parts
In thy defense, when anie blast is blowne.
Thou art our queene, our rocke and onelie staie,
We are thine owne to serue by night and daie.
Farewell oh queene, farewell oh mother deare,
Let Jacobs God thy sacred bodie gard:
All is thine owne that is possessed here,
And all in all is but a small reward
For thy great grace, God length thy life like Noy,
To gouerne vs, and eke thy realme in ioy. Amen.

These words were deuised by B. Goldingham, and spoken by himselfe, to whome hir maiestie said: We thanke you hartilie. Then with the musicke in the same place was song this short ditte following, in a verie swéet voice, to the great delite of the hearers;

What vaileth life, where sorow sokes the hart?
Who feareth death that is in deepe distresse?
Release of life dooth best abate the smart
Of him, whose woes are quite without redresse.
Lend me your teares, resigne your sighes to me,
Helpe all to waile the dolor which you see.
What haue we doone, the will no longer staie?
What may we doo to hold hir with vs still?
Shee is our queene, we subiects must obaie,
Grant, though with greefe, to hir departing will.
Conclude we then, and sing with sobbing breath,
God length thy life (oh queene Elisabeth.)

On fridaie, the court vpon remoue, the citie troubled with manie causes, and some séeking to doo seruice like the deuiser, moued him to doo somewhat of himselfe, bicause his aids (as manie times they were before) were drawne from him, each one about his owne businesse, and he left to his owne inuentions and policie, at which exigent or casuall things of fortune, he drew his boies vnto him, that were the Nymphs on the water, and so departed the citie, with such garments and stuffe necessarie as fitted his purpose and the matter he went about. Then he chose a ground, by the which the quéene must passe, inclosing his companie in the corner of a field, being defensed with high and thicke bushes, and there some parts he made, which the boies might misse, bicause the time was short for the learning of those parts. But he being resolued to doo somewhat might make the quéene laugh, appointed that seauen boies of twelue should passe through a hedge from the place of abode (which was gallantlie trimmed) and deliuer seauen spéeches. And these boies (you must vnderstand) were dressed like Nymphes of the water, and were to plaie by a deuise and degrees the feiries, and to danse (as nére as could be imagined) like the feiries. Their attire and comming so strangelie out, made the quénes highnesse smile and laugh withall. And the deuiser hearing this good hope, being apparelled like a water spirite, began to sound a timbrell, & the rest with him, all the twelue Nymphs togither (when the seauen had repaired in) sounded timbrels likewise. And although the deuiser had no great hearting, yet as he durst, he led the yong foolish feiries a danse, which boldnesse of his bred no disgrace, but as he heard, was well taken. The quéene vpon their retire in, hasted to hir highnes lodging, which was seuen miles off, and at that present, when the shew ended, it was past fiue of the clocke.

All these shewes finished, hir maiestie in princelie maner marched toward the confines of the liberties of the citie of Norwich, which was supposed almost two miles. Before she came there, maister maior brake to my lord chamberlaine, that he was to vtter to hir maiestie an other oration, whereof my lord séemed to haue good liking: but before they came to the said confines, maister maior was willed to forbeare the vtterance of the same his oration, bicause it was about seauen of the clocke, and hir maiestie had then fiue miles to ride. Neuertheless he gaue to hir maiestie both his orations in writing, which she thanked him for. She also thanked the maior, euerie alderman, and the commoners, not onelie for the great chére they had made hir, but also for the open houholds they kept to hir highnesse seruants, and all others. Then she called maister maior and made him knight: and so departing, said: I haue laid vp in my breast such good will, as I shall neuer forget Norwich; and proceéding onward did shake hir riding rod and said: Farewell Norwich, with the water standing in hir eies. In which great good will towards vs all, I beséech God to continue hir maiestie with long and triumphant reigne ouer vs, Amen.

Now to come to the returne of the quénes maiestie from Norfolke and Suffolke, in which two counties hir highnesse knighted certeine gentlemen, as namelie in Suffolke George Colt, Philip Parkar, Robert Iermine, William Spring. Thomas Barnardiston, Thomas Kidson, Arthur Yedingham: In Norfolke, Thomas Kneuet, Nicholas Bacon, William Paston, Edward Cléere, Rafe Shelton, Henrie Woodhouse, Thomas Gaudie, Robert Wood maior, Roger Woodhouse. These gentlmen hir maiestie knighted, for that they should all their life time after haue the greater regard to God and their prince. Now the quénes maiestie passing from Norwich, she came to sir Roger Woodhouses that night, where she was well receiued, and noblie interteined. From thense to Wood rising at sir Edward Cléeres. From thense to sir Thomas Kidsons, where in verie déed the fare and bankets did so excéed a number of other places, that it is worthie the mention. A shew representing the feiries (as well as might be) was there séene, in the which shew a rich iewell was presented to the quénes highnes. From thense to master Reuets, where all things were well and in verie good order, and meat liberallie spent.

But now to speake a little by the waie of Gods mightie hand and power, that framed mens hearts so well in manie parts, before the quénes highnesse came to Cambridgshire, and to tell how blessedlie our great and good God did deale with our dere soueréigne ladie, in causing euerie person to shew their dutie, is a matter of great discourse, and of no little weight and comfort to all good minds that shall consider of the same. Such a Lord is our great God, that that can frame all things to the beſt, and ſuch a ſouereigne ladie we haue, that can make the crooked paths ſtreight where ſhe commeth, & draw the harts of the people after hir whereſoeuer ſhe trauelleth. So from maſter Reuets hir highneſſe came to my lord Noths, who was no whit behind anie of the reſt for a franke houſe, a noble heart, and well ordered interteinement. And there was an oration made by a gentleman of Cambridge, with a ſtatelie and a faire cup preſented from the vniuerſitie, all the ambaſſadors of France beholding the ſame. And the gentlemen of the ſhire (as in manie other places) did beare the quéenes meat to the table, which was a great liking & gladneſſe to the gentlemen, & a ſolemne ſight for ſtrangers & ſubiects to looke vpon. From my lord Noths to ſir Giles Allingtons, where things were well, and well liked. From thenſe to ſir John Cuts. From thenſe to M. Kapels, where was excellent good chéere & interteinement. From thenſe to Hide hall, where I heard of no great chéere nor banketting. From thenſe to Rockwood hall, but how the traine was there interteined, I am ignorant of. From thenſe to maſter Stonars, and from thenſe to my lord of Leiceſters houſe, where the progreſſe ended, & (to knit vp all) the good chéere was reuiued, not onelie with making a great feaſt to the quéene and the French ambaſſador, but alſo in feaſting ſolemnelie (at ſeuerall times) the whole gard, on ſundaie and mondaie before the quéene came, at his owne table, vſing ſuch courteſie vnto them for the ſpace of two daies, as was and is worthie of perpetuall memorie. Thus much of the quéenes highneſſe returne, whom God hath ſo well preſerued, that ſhe like a worthie prince to our great comfort proſpereth in peace, to the great diſgrace of the enimies of God, and aduerſaries of our common weale and countrie, wherin God continue hir maieſtie, Amen.

The vniuerſitie of Cambridge preſent a faire and ſtatelie cup to the quéene.

The quéenes maieſtie, now gone from Norwich, carried awaie with hir all the gladneſſe of the citie, which ſprang from hir preſence; in place whereof ſucceéded melancholie ſadnes: in ſomuch that the verie aier altered with the change of the countrie chére proceéding from the departure of hir highnes roiall perſon: which he meant that made theſe verſes, wherwith the deſcription of this progreſſe ſhall end.

Matthew Hamont, by his trade a ploughwright of Hetharſet three miles from Norwich, was conuented before the biſhop of Norwich, for that he denied Chriſt our ſauiour. At the time of his appearance it was obiected that he had publiſhed theſe hereſies following. That the new teſtament and goſpell of Chriſt are but méere folichneſſe, a ſtorie of man, or rather a méere fable. Item, that man is reſtored to grace by Gods méere mercie, without the meane of Chriſts bloud, death and paſſion. Item, that Chriſt is not God nor the ſauiour of the world, but a méere man, a ſinfull man, and an abhominable idoll. Item, that all they that worſhip him are abhominable idolaters, & that Chriſt did not riſe againe from death to life by the power of his godhead, neither that he aſcended into heauen. Item, that the Holie ghoſt is not God, neither that there is anie ſuch Holie ghoſt. Item, that baptiſme is not neceſſarie in the church of God, neither the vſe of the ſacrament of the bodie and bloud of Chriſt. For the which hereſies he was condemned in the conſiſtorie, and ſentence was pronounced againſt him by the biſhop of Norwich on the thirteenth daie of Aprill, and thervpon deliuered to the ſhiriffes of Norwich. And becauſe he ſpake words of blaſphemie (not to be recited) againſt the quéenes maieſtie and others of hir councell, he was by the recorder, maſter ſergeant Windham, and the maior ſir Robert Wood of Norwich condemned to loſe both his eares, which were cut off on the thirteenth of Maie in the market place of Norwich, and afterwards, to wit on the twentith of Maie, he was burned in the caſtell dich of Norwich.

Matthew Hamont burned at Norwich.

The hereſie that he held.

This yeare in the moneth of Maie, Marke Scaliot blacke ſmith citizen of London, borne in the parith of ſaint Clements Dane without Temple bar, and now dwelling in Cornehill néere vnto Leaden hall, for triall of workemanſhip, made one hanging locke of iron, ſteele and braſſe, of eleuen ſeuerall peéces, a pipe keie filed three ſquare with a pot vpon the ſhaft, & the bow with two eſſes, all cleane wrought, which weied but one graine of gold or wheat corne. He alſo at the ſame time made a chaine of gold of three and fortie linkes, to the which chaine the locke and keie being faſtened, and put about a fleas necke, ſhe drew the ſame with eaſe. All which, locke, keie, chaine, and flea, weied but one graine and a halfe. A thing almoſt incredible, but that my ſelfe (amongſt manie others) haue ſéene it, & therfore muſt affirme it to be true.

In Engliſh man made a locke and a keie, weieng but one graine corne.

was buried at Winchester. ¶ This man was learned and eloquent, of a round and readie vtterance, sound in religion and zelous in the truth; in testimonie whereof he chose rather to forsake his natiue soile, and to liue a stranger in a forren land, than with offense of conscience to tarrie at home within the sight and hearing of the manifold abhominations which supported poperie: so that although death haue deuoured his mortall bodie, yet in respect of his vertue and godlinesse, his name shall be immortall; according to the truth of this sentence:

Corpore deposito viuit virtute superstes,
De virtute nihil mors violenta rapit.

John Wolton now liuing, was called to be bishop of Excester, ¶ consecrated at Lambith by Edmund Grindall archbishop of Canturburie, in August 1579. He is a professor of diuinitie, and a preacher of the gospell, and vniuersallie seene in all good letters. This William Wolton, being in successiue order the eight and fortith that occupied the said see, from the first that inioied the same episcopall aduancement, minister sith occasion to insert a catalog of all the bishops of Excester as they followed one after another in that see, being an apt collection, and verie answerable to the description of Excester, and the ancient foundation of saint Peters church there; mentioned in the third yeare of the reigne of king Edward the first, page 1007, and continued to page 1028.

Werstanus. 1 WErstanus, at a prouinciall synod holden in Wessex, in the yeare 905, was consecrated bishop of Deuon, and had his see at bishops Tauton: and in the yeare following 906 he died, and was buried in his owne church.

Putta. 2 Putta, after the death of Werstanus, was elected and consecrated bishop, and had his see at Tauton: and taking his iourneie towards Crediton, to see and visit the king (or as some saie, Alfa the kings lieutenant) was by the said Alfas men slaine, and then vpon his death the see was remoued to Crediton.

Eadulphus. 3 Eadulphus, brother to Alfius duke of Deuon and Cornewall, and founder of Lancestor, was consecrated bishop of Deuon, but installed at Crediton, where he had his see, and continued bishop two and twentie yeares, and then dieng about the yeare 932, he was buried in his owne church.

Ethelgarus. 4 Ethelgarus, in the yeare 932, succeeded Eadulphus, and in his time king Athelstane subdued the Cornish people, reedified this citie, and compassed the same with a stone wall: he founded the monasterie of saint Peters for monks of saint Benets order. This Ethelgarus, after he had beene bishop ten yeares, died, and was buried in his owne church.

Algarus. 5 Algarus, in the yeare 942 after Ethelgarus, was constituted & installed bishop at Crediton, and hauing beene bishop about ten yeares, died and was buried in his owne church.

Alfwoldus. 6 Alfwoldus, as Matthew Westminster writeth, was nert bishop after Algarus, and consecrated by the aduise of Dunstane, in the yeare 952. In this time Odogarus earle of Deuon, and father in law to king Edgar, builded the abbeie of Tauestoke: and king Edgar called home all the monkes of saint Peters which were dispersed, and without anie abbat, and made Sidemannus abbat, who was afterwards bishop. This Alfwoldus after fiftéene yeares that he was consecrated, died and was buried in his owne church.

7 Alfwolfus, as Dicetus affirmeth, was consecrated bishop in the yeare of our Lord 969, and after nine yeares died, and was buried in his owne church. Alfwolfus.

8 Sidemannus of an abbat was made a bishop, in the yeare 978. In this mans time the Danes ouerran and spoiled the whole countries of Deuon and Cornewall, burned the towne of Bodmen, and the cathedrall church of saint Petrokes, with the bishops house. Wherevpon the bishops sée was remoued from thense to saint Germans, where the same continued, vntill the remouing and vniting thereof vnto Crediton. Sidemannus in the twelfe yeare after his consecration died, and was buried at Crediton in his owne church 990. Sidemannus.

9 Alphzedus, whome Dicetus calleth Alfricus, abbat of Malmesburie, was consecrated bishop, and installed at Crediton: he was taken for a learned man, because he wrote two bookes, the one intituled De rebus cœnobij sui, and the other De rerum naturis. In this bishops time, king Ethelred endowed the bishoprike of saint Germans with lands, liberties, and priuileges. The Danes made a fresh inuasion in and vpon all Deuon and Cornewall, burned and spoiled the abbie of Mydolphus at Tauestoke: they besieged Excester, and being remoued from thense, were fought withall at Pinneho, about three miles from the citie, and ouerthrowne. Alphzedus, after he had béene bishop about nine yeares, died in the yeare 999, and was buried in his owne church. Alphzedus.

10 Alwolfus (as Dicetus writeth) was the nert bishop. In his time Sweno king of Denmarke, by intisement of one Hugh then earle of Deuon, came with a great host and besieged the citie of Excester, tooke it and burned it, and with great cruelties vsed the people, vntill in the end Almarus then earle of Deuon, and the gentlemen did yéeld and submit themselues, and so obteined peace. This Alwolfus about the fiftéenth yeare of his bishoprike, in the yeare 1014 died, and was buried in his owne church. Alwolfus.

11 Arnoldus, by the report of the archdeacon of London, succéeded Alwolfus, and was installed at Crediton. In this mans time, king Canutus gaue to Athelwold abbat of S. Peters of this citie great gifts, and sundrie priuileges, in recompense of his fathers great iniuries. Arnoldus in the fiftéenth yeare of his bishoprike 1030 died, and was buried in his owne church. Arnoldus.

12 Leuigus or Leuingus abbat of Tauestoke, and nephue to Brithwaldus bishop of Cornewall, was chosen the nert bishop, and according to the orders then vsed, consecrated and installed. He was in great fauour and credit with king Canutus, vpon whome he attended in pilgrimage to Rome; and after his vncle the bishop of saint Germans being dead, obteined of the king that the bishops sée was remoued from saint Germans vnto Crediton, and both were thereby reduced and vnited into one bishoprike, and so hath euer since continued. Hée was after the death of Brithegus bishop of Worcester, remoued to that church, and there died, and was buried as some suppose: but some affirme, that in the time of Hardicanutus the king, at the accusation of Alfredus then archbishop of Yorke, for that he should be consenting to the death of Alfredus the sonne of Ethelred, that he should be deposed of his bishoprike there, and so did returne vnto Tauestoke, where he died. But Dicetus affirmeth, that he purged himselfe of this crime, and by that meanes was restored, both to the fauour of the king, and to his bi- Leuigus, or Leuingus.

shopzike againe, and died bishop of Wozcester. It is recozded that he was bishop of Crediton fifténe yeares.

Leofricus. 13 Leofricus, a man descended of the bloud and line of Brutus, but brought vp in the land of Lothoringia oz Lozeine, was so well commended foz his nobilitie, wisedome, and learning, that king Edward the Confessoz had him in great fauour, and made him first one of his priuie councell; then lozd chancellos of all England: and lastlie the bishopzike of this pzouince being void, he was made, consecrated, and installed bishop of the same. By him and by his meanes, the bishops sée was remoued from Crediton vnto this citie of Excester: foz at his request, king Edward togither with quéene Edith his wife came to Excester, & remouing the monkes from hense to Westminster, did also remoue the bishops sée from Crediton vnto his citie, and did put the bishop in possession. Foz he conducting the bishop on the right hand, and the quéene on the left hand, brought him to the high altar of his new church, and there placed him in a seat appointed foz him. He suppzessed sundzie houses oz cels of religion within his sanctuarie, and appzopziated and united them to his owne church; as also by the good liberalitie of the king obteined great reuenues, possessions, pziuileges, and liberties to be giuen vnto the church. In this mans time, William duke of Nozmandie made a conquest of this whole realme, as also in the yeare 1068 besieged this citie of Excester, which after by composition he restozed to his fozmer estate againe. Also in his time, Richard de Bzion, a noble man of Nozmandie, the sonne of Baldwin of Bzion, & of Albzed the néece to the Conquezoz, was made baron of Okehampton, warden of the castell of Excester, and vicount of Deuon. This Leofricus, after that he had well and wozthilie ruled his church and diocesse by the space of thzée and twentie yeares, he ended his daies in peace, and died in the yeare 1073, and was buried in the cemiterie oz churchyard of his owne church, vnder a simple and a bzoken marble stone, which place by the since inlarging of his church is now within the tower of the same, where of late, in the yeare 1568, a new monument was erected in the memozie of so good, wozthie, and noble a personage, by the industrie of the writer hereof, but at the charges of the deane and chapter.

Osbertus oz Osbernus. 14 Osbertus oz Osbernus, a Nozman bozne, and bzother to an earle named William, was pzeferred to this bishopzike, and in the yeare 1074 was consecrated and installed to the same. Polydorus writeth, that one Galfrid who ioined with Odo, earle of Kent and bishop of Baion, against William Rufus, should be bishop of Eron: but it was not, noz could not so be. In this mans time, William the Conquezoz, and William Rufus his sonne died. This Osbertus oz Osbernus, after he had béene bishop thirtie yeares, was blind, and died, and lieth buried in his owne church.

William Warlewast. 15 William Warlewast a Nozman bozne, and chapleine both to the Conquezoz and his two sons, William and Henrie: he was a graue and a wise man, and foz the same was pzeferred by Henrie the king to this bishopzike, in the yere one thousand one hundzed and seuen, and was consecrated by Anselmus archbishop of Canturburie, in the moneth of August the same yeare. He first began to inlarge his church, which at that time was no bigger than that which is now called the ladie chappell. He founded and builded the monasterie of Plimpton, and placed therein regular canons: in his latter daies he wared and became blind. And yet notwithstanding foz his wisdome the king sent him in ambassage vnto pope Paschalis the second, wherein he so wiselie dealed, and so discrétlie behaued himselfe in his message, that he made a reconciliation betwéene the pope and the king, and returned with great praise and commendation. Not long after his returne, and hauing small ioie of the world, he gaue ouer his bishopzike, and became one of the religious canons in his owne house of Plimpton, where he died and was buried, he was bishop about twentie yeares.

Robert Chicheller. 16 Robert Chicheller, deane of Sarisburie, was consecrated bishop vnder Anselmus archbishop of Canturburie, Anno 1128, and the eight and twentith yeare of king Henrie the first. He was a gentleman bozne, and therefoze esteemed foz his zeale in religion, wherein he was deuout accozding to those daies; and thinking his labours to be best imploied that waie, did eftsoons go in pilgrimage, sometime to Rome, sometime to one place, sometime to another; and euer he would bzing with him some one relikie oz other. He was a liberall contributoz to the buildings of his church. In his time was founded and builded the monasterie of S. Stephans in Lancestor, and furthered by Reinold erle of Cozne wall; but vnto it this bishop was an aduersarie, not foz misliking the wozke, but foz feare of an intrusion vpon his liberties. Likewise at this time was builded the pziozie of saint Nicholas in Excester, by the abbat of Battell, vnto which abbeie this pziozie was a cell. In this mans time also king Henrie made William Rideuers a Nozman (and his kinsman) earle of Deuon; and therewith the lozdship of Twifozdton, and the honoz of Plimpton, togither with the third pennie of his reuenues in Deuon, which in the whole was then thirtie marks, whereof this earle had ten. Also in this mans time king Henrie died, and king Stephan entred, and toke vpon him the crowne, whereof insued great warres. This bishop, after that he had occupied the place two and twentie yeares, died, and was buried in his owne church. But the monke of Westminster writeth that he should be bishop seuen and twentie yeares, and died in the yeere one thousand one hundzed fiftie and fiue, but he neuer saw the recozds of this church which are to the contrarie.

John the chanter.

Robert Warlewast. 17 Robert Warlewast, nephue to William the bishop of this church, deane of Sarisburie, was consecrated bishop by Theobaldus archbishop of Canturburie, in the yeare one thousand one hundzed and fiftie, he nothing degenerated from the steps of his predecessors, but was altogither of the same bent and disposition. In his time king Stephan died, and Henrie the second was crowned king. This Robert after that he had occupied this sée nine yeers oz thereabout, died, & was buried at Plimpton by his vncle.

Henrie Marshall.

Bartholomeus Iscanus. 18 Bartholomeus Iscanus, otherwise Bartholomew of Excester, was consecrated bishop of Excester vnder Theobald archbishop of Canturburie, in the yeare a thousand one hundzed fiftie nine, he was called Iscanus of Isca, which is one of the ancientest names of this citie. He was a meane citizens son, but being verie apt vnto learning, his parents and friends kept him to schole; and he so well pzofited therein, that he came and pzoued to be a verie well learned man: and being bishop he wzote sundzie bookes, as of pzedestination, fréewill, penance, and others. Of all men he could not bzooke noz fauoz Thomas Becket archbishop of Canturburie foz his contempt and disobedience against the king, foz the which he sharplie impzoued, rebuked, and inueighed against him openlie in the parlement house holden at Nozthampton; and with such effectuall reasons, and pithie arguments, he did so temper the same, that the whole parlement relied vnto his iudgement and opinion herein against Thomas Becket. And after

after his death, such was the grauitie, modestie, and wisedome of the man, that he was spetiallie chosen to be ambassador for the king vnto pope Alexander the third; and so wiselie, and with such discretion vsed the same, that notwithstanding his cause and message had manie aduersaries, yet he reconciled the pope and the king, obteined the good will and fauour of the pope, and brought his message to good effect. This bishop was in great familiaritie and acquaintance with Baldwin of Exceter his countriman, now archbishop of Canturburie, who was a poore mans sonne in this citie; but for his learning aduanced to this estate. In this bishops time, about the yeare of our Lord one thousand one hundred three score and eight, William Fitzralfe a citizen of this citie founded a cell for monks within this citie, and dedicated the same to saint Alexius, which not long after was united to saint Johns within the east gate of the same citie. In his time also Reinold of Courteneie a nobleman of Normandie, the son of Elorus the son of Lewes, named Lewes le Grosse king of France came into this land, and married Hawise daughter and heire to Hawd the daughter and heire to Adelis, sister and heire to Richard de Brione the first vicount of Deuon, and in hir right was vicount of Deuon. This Bartholomew, after he had béene bishop about fourteene yeares, in the yere one thousand one hundred eightie and foure, died: but where he died, and where he was buried it doth not appeere.

In this bishops time about the yeare one thousand one hundred and seuentie, one Johannes Cornubiensis a Cornish man borne, was a famous learned diuine, he was a student at Rome and other places in Italie, and by that meanes grew into great acquaintance with pope Alexander the third: he wrote diuerse bookes, and namelie one De incarnatione Christi, against Peter Lombard, who affirmed, Quòd Christus secundum quod homo est, aliquid non est; and this he dedicated to pope Alexander.

John the chanter.

19 John the chanter of the cathedrall church of this citie was consecrated and installed bishop of this church, in the yeare one thousand one hundred eightie and foure, he was well reported of for his liberalitie in continuing the buildings of this church, wherein he was nothing inferior to his predecessors. In his time king Henrie Fitzempréelle died, and he himselfe, hauing beene bishop about six yeares, died in the yeare of our Lord one thousand one hundred ninetie and one.

Henrie Marshall.

20 Henrie Marshall archdeacon of Stafford, the brother to Walter earle marshall of England, was consecrated bishop by Hubert archbishop of Canturburie, in the yeare one thousand one hundred ninetie and one; he finished the building of his church, according to the plot and foundation which his predecessors had laid; and that done, he purchased the patronage and lordship of Woodburie of one Albemarlie, which he gaue and impropriated vnto the vicars chorall of his church. In this mans time, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred and one, one Simon Thurnaius a Cornish man borne, brought vp in learning, did by diligence and studie so prosper therein, that he became excellent in all the liberall sciences, and in his daies none thought to be like him. He left Oxenford, where he had béene a student, and went to Paris, and there became a priest, and studied diuinitie, and therein became so excellent, and of so deepe a iudgement, that he was made chéefe of the Sorbonists; at length he became so proud of his learning, and did glorie so much therein, that he would be singular, & thought himselfe to be another Aristotle: and so much he was therein blinded, and waxed so farre in loue with Aristotle, that he preferred him before Moses and Christ. But behold Gods iust iudgement. For suddenlie his memorie failed him, and he waxed so forgetfull, that he could neither call to remembrance anie thing that he had done, neither could he discerne, read, or know a letter of the booke. This Henrie, after that he had spent and liued twelue yeares in his bishoprike, he died, and lieth buried in the north side of the chancell of his church, in a verie faire tome of marble, in the yeare one thousand two hundred and six.

Simon de Apulia.

21 Simon de Apulia, in the yeare one thousand two hundred and six was installed bishop of this see, of him there remaineth no memoriall at all. In his time were famous Joseph Iscanius, and Alexander Neckam; the one was verie well learned in the Latine and Greeke tong, and in the liberall sciences; the other was prior of saint Nicholas, and was an vniuersall man, being a profound philosopher, an eloquent orator, a pleasant poet, and a déepe diuine. In this bishops time the doctrine of elevation, adoration, reseruation, and praieng for the dead, being established by pope Honorius the third, the parish churches within this citie were limited, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred twentie & two. In this mans time, in the yeare one thousand two hundred and twelue, one Johannes Deuonius, so surnamed, because he was borne in Deuon, being well bent to good studies, was much commended for his learning and modestie. He was familiar and of great acquaintance with Baldwin archbishop of Canturburie, and being made abbat of Ford, was in such fauor with king John, that he chose him to be his confessor and chapleine: he was a writer, and compiled diuerse bookes which were then accounted of. Being dead, he was buried in his abbeie, the people much lamenting the want of so good a man. This bishop hauing spent eightéene yeares, died, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred twentie and foure, & was buried in his owne church.

William Brewer.

22 William Brewer, verie shortlie after the death of the foresaid Simon, was elected bishop, and consecrated by Stephan Langton archbishop of Canturburie, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred twentie and foure. He was borne and descended of a noble house and parentage, being brother to sir William Brewer knight, the husband of the eldest daughter, & one of the heirs to William de Werona, erle of Deuon; and who also was founder of the abbeies of Tor, of Hartland, and other monasteries. This bishop so wiselie and discréetlie behaued himselfe, that he was had in great reputation among all men, and in spetiall fauour with the king. For king Henrie, hauing giuen his sister ladie Isabell to wife vnto Frederike the emperor, did commend and betake hir to this bishop, to be conueied and conducted to the emperor. And such was the fame and good report spred of him, that as he passed through the countries, they were from place to place receiued with great honor; and being come to the citie of Coleine, the archbishop there did not onelie verie honorablie receiue them, but also accompanied them vnto the citie of Wormes, where the mariage was solemnized. When this bishop had séene the marriage, and all things performed, he toke his leaue, and was dismissed with great présents, and honorablie accompanied homewards by the archbishop and others. At his returne he was ioifullie receiued of all the noble men about the king, and most thankfullie by the king himselfe, and whome the king vsed as his spetiall and most trustie councellor in all his weightie causes. This bishop being come home to his owne house, and minding (as his predecessors had done) to leaue some good memoriall behind him, he made a deane, and constituted twentie foure prebendaries within his church. To the one he impro-priated Brampton and Colliton Rawleie: for the others he purchased so much land, as out whereof he assigned to euerie prebendarie foure pounds by the yeare, and of these he ordeined his chapter. Also in this mans time, in the yeare one thousand two hundred and fortie, Gilbert Long and Robert his brother citizens of this citie builded and founded the hospitall of saint Johns, within the east gate of this citie, for the sustenance of certeine poore folks, called afterwards the poore children of saint Johns, & gaue all their lands and tenements to the same, which was sufficient. The yeare following, the cell of Alexius was removed and adjoined to saint Johns; and then the founders being dead, the charge and gouernement of that house was by those founders commended to the maior of this citie, & they thenceforth were founders and patrons thereof. In the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred fortie and foure, there grew a contention concerning the poore lazer sicke people of the Magdalen without the south gate of this citie, whose maner and vsage was then, with a clapdish vpon euerie market daie to resort and come to the markets, and there to beg euerie mans deuotion: but by reason of their sickenesse, which was lothsome and abhorred, the peoples deuotion waxed short and scant against them: as also euerie man murmured against their going & begging at large. Where vpon the matter being brought into question betweene the bishop and this citie, it was concluded that a permutation should be made: and that therefore the bishops should be patrones, and haue the gouernement of saint Johns, and the maior and his successors to be gardians and founders of the hospitall of the Magdalen; with a prouiso, that the proctor of the hospitall of the Magdalen should on one daie in euerie moneth come with his box to saint Peters church at the time of seruice, and there receiue and gather the deuotion of the canons, which is vsed at these presents. This poore house remaineth still, but the other for want of good friends was suppressed and dissolued. This bishop, after he had continued in his church about nine teene yeares, he died, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred fortie and foure, and lieth buried in the middle of his owne church vnder a plaine marble stone.

Richard Blondie.

23 Richard Blondie, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred fortie and fiue, was consecrated and installed bishop, Bonifacius then being archbishop of Canturburie. This Richard was a man of a mild spirit, but verie stout against such as in his time did offer anie iniurie to the church. And in his old yeares being but a weake man, he was much carried and ruled by such as were his officers and about him, who taking the opportunitie of the time, vsed all the meanes they might to inrich themselues. His chiefest officers were one Lodeswell his chancellor, Sutton his register, Fitzherbert his officiall, and Ermelstow the keeper of his seale. These with others of the chiefe seruants of his household compacted among themselues, that whilest the bishop was yet liuing, who then laie sicke and verie weake in his bed, to make and conueie vnto themselues conueiances of such liuelihods as then laie in the bishops disposition; and accordinglie made out aduousons and other such conueiances as to them seemed best, all which were forthwith sealed and deliuered according to the orders among them concluded. But these their subtill dealings were not so closelie conueied, but that the nert bishop following boulted and found the same out; and did not onelie reuerse all their doings, but also did excommunicat them, and who were not absolued vntill they had done their penance for the same: which was done at saint Peters church openlie, vpon Palmesundate, being the nineteenth date of March, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred threescore and seuen. This bishop Richard, in the twelfe yeare of his bishoprike, died, and was buried in his owne church.

Walter Bronescome.

24 Walter Bronescome, archdeacon of Surrie, was consecrated bishop of Exceter vpon Passion sundaie, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred foure score and six vnder Bonifacius then archbishop. He was borne in this citie of Exon, and was the sonne of poore parents; but he being of a verie towardnesse and good disposition, and verie apt to learning, they partlie of themselues, and partlie by helpe of their friends, did put him to schole and kept him to his booke, wherein he proued and prospered so well that he was verie well learned. At the time of his election he was no priest, and therefore not capeable of anie such dignitie: but immediatlie he tooke that order vpon him, and forthwith was consecrated bishop. All which being done within fifteene daies, it was counted as for a miracle; namelie, that he should be elected bishop, then made priest, and at last to be consecrated within that space. For so manie dignities (as they termed it) to be cast vpon one man in so short a time, had not beene lightlie seene. He founded the college of Glasenberie in Perrin in Cornswall, and indowed the same with faire possessions and reuenues. He purchased the Barton of Rokesdon and Clist, and gaue it to the hospitall of S. Johns within the east gate of the citie of Exceter. He instituted in his owne church the feast called Gabriels feast; and gaue a peece of land for the maintenance thereof. He also did by a policie purchase the lordship and house of Clist Sachtisfield, and by a deuise did inlarge the Barton thereof, by gaining of Cornish wood from his deane and chapter: and builded then a verie faire & sumptuous house, and called it bishops Clist, which he left to his successors. Likewise he got the patronage of Clist Fomeson, now called Sowton, and annexed the same to his new lordship, which (as it was said) was in this order. He had a frier to be his chapleine and confessor, which died in his said house of Clist, and should haue bin buried at the parish church of Faringdon, bicause the said house was and is in that parish: but bicause the parish church was somewhat far off, the waies foule, and the weather rainie, or for some other causes; the bishop willed and commanded the corps to be carried to the parish church of Sowton, then called Clist Fomeson, which is verie neere and bordereth vpon the bishops lordship: the two parishes there being diuided by a little lake called Clist. At this time one Fomeson a gentleman was lord and patrone of Clist Fomeson, and he being aduertised of such a burtall towards in his parish, and a leech waie to be made ouer his land, without his leaue or consent required therein, calleth his tenants together, and goeth to the bridge ouer the lake, betweene the bishops land and his, and there meeteth the bishops men bringing the said corps, and forbiddeth them to come ouer the water. But the bishops men nothing regarding the same, doo preasse forwards to come ouer the water; and the others doo withstand and fall at strife about the matter, so long, that in the end my lords frier is fallen into the water. The bishop taketh this matter in such griefe, that a holie frier, a religious man, and his owne chapleine and confessor should so vnreuerentlie be cast into the water, that he falleth out with the gentleman, and (vpon what occasion I know not) he sueth him in the law, and so vexeth and tormenteth him, that in the end he was faine to yeeld himselfe to the bishops deuotion, and seeketh all waies he could to currie the bishops good will, which he could not obteine, vntill for his redemption

demption he had giuen and surrendred vp his patronage of Sowton with a peece of land, all which the said bishop annexeth to his new lordship. Thus by policie he purchased the manor of bishops Clift, by a deuise gaineth Cornish wood, and by power wresteth the patronage of Sowton. This bishop after he had occupied this see about three and twentie years, died and was buried in his owne church, in a sumptuous tome of alabaster.

Walter Stapledon.

Peter Quiuill.

25 Peter Quiuill, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred foure score and one, was consecrated bishop of this church, vnder John archbishop of Canturburie. He first instituted a chanter and a subdeane in his church. To the one he impropriated Painton and Chidleigh, and to the other the rectorie of Eglosehaile in Cornewall, he was a liberall and a speciall benefactor to the hospitall of saint Johns in Excester as well in goods as in liuelihoods, he first began to inlarge & increase his church from the chancell downewards, and laid the foundation thereof. In his time in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred foure score and fiue, Walter Lichlade the first chanter was slaine in a morning as he came from the morning seruice, then called the Mattins, which was then wont to be said shortlie after midnight. Vpon which occasion the king came vnto this citie, and kept his Christmasse in the same, and thereupon a composition was made betweene the bishop and the citie for inclosing of the churchyard, and building of certeine gates there, as appeareth by the said composition bearing date in Festo annunciationis beatæ Mariæ 1286. The king at the sute of the earle of Hereford, who at his being here was lodged in the house of the Greie friers, which then was neere the house of S. Nicholas, obteined of the bishop, that they should be remoued from thense to a more wholesome place, which was to the place without the south gate: wherof after the kings departure grew some controuersie, because the bishop refused to performe his promise made to the king. This man also impropriated the parish of S. Newleine, and the parish of Stoke Gabrell, and vnited the same to the office of the chancellor of the cathedrall church; & vnder condition, that the said chancellor should continuallie read a lecture within the said citie, of diuinitie or of the decretals: and if he should faile to do this, that then it might and should be lawfull to the bishop to resigne the said parsonages impropriated, and to bestow it at his pleasure, as appeareth by the said grant vnder the seales of the said bishop, deane and chapter, dated the twelfe of the calends of Maie 1283. This bishop not long after, and in the eleuenth yeare of his bishoprike, died; being choked in drinking of a sirrup, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred ninetie and two, & was buried in his owne church. The Franciscans or Greie friers of this citie imputed his death to his hard dealing with them. For whereas he had promised the king to prouide a conuenient place for them to build their house in, and had willed their warden named Deodatus, to seeke out and make inquirie for the same: yet notwithstanding when he had so done, because the same was in his see, he did swarue from his said promise, and did vtterlie denie to performe the same, by the persuasion of one Peter Kenckeld, a Dominican or Blacke friar, and Confessor vnto the said bishop. For he enuieng the good successe of the Franciscans, persuadeth with the bishop, that in no wise he should permit them to inioy the place which they had gotten, nor to build therein; because it was within his see: for saith he, as vnder colour of simplicitie they creepe into the hearts of the people, and hinder vs more preachers from our gaines and liuings; so be ye sure, that if the canons put not within your liberties, they will in time so incroch vpon the same, as that they will be cleane exempted from out of your libertie, and iurisdiction. The bishop being soone persuaded and contented contrarie to his promise to yeeld thervnto, denieth the Franciscans; and vtterlie forbiddeth them to build or to do anie thing within his see or libertie. About two yeares after, the bishop kept a great feast vpon the sundaie next before saint Francis daie, and among others was present with him one Walter Winborne one of the kings chiefe iustices of the bench; and who was present when the bishop at the request of the king made promise to further and to helpe the Franciscans, and who in their behalfe did now put the bishop in mind thereof, and requested him to haue consideration both of his owne promise and of their distresse. The bishop misliking these speeches, waxed somewhat warme and offended, and in open termes did not onelie denie to yeeld herevnto, but wished himselfe to be choked what daie soeuer he did consent or yeeld vnto it. It fortuned that the same weeke, and vpon the daie of saint Francis eue, the bishop tooke a certeine sirrup to drinke, and in to hastie swallowing thereof his breath was stopped, and he forthwith died. The Franciscans hearing thereof, made no little a do about this matter, but blazed it abrode that saint Francis wrought this miracle vpon the bishop, because he was so hard against them.

Thomas Bitton.

26 Thomas Bitton the yeare following was elected bishop, & the see of Canturburie being void, he was consecrated by John Roman archbishop of Rome. He left no memoriall of anie great things done by him, sauing that he continued in the building of his church; as also was a fauourer of such learned men as were in his diocesse in his time: namelie Robert Plimpton a regular canon of Plimpton, and professor of diuinitie, and who wrote two bookes, Walter of Eron a Franciscane frier of Carocus in Cornewall, who at the request of one Baldwin of Excester wrote the historie of Guie of Warwike; William of Excester doctor of diuinitie and warden of the Franciscane friers of this citie; Godfrie surnamed Cornewall, a subtill scholeman, and a reader of diuinitie sometimes in Paris. This bishop, after foureteene yeares that he had occupied this see, died, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred and six, and was buried in his owne church.

Walter Stapledon.

27 Walter Stapledon, in the yere of our Lord one thousand three hundred and seauen, being elected bishop of this citie, was consecrated by Robert Winchelseie archbishop of Canturburie. He descended of a most noble parentage, which ioined with his learning, wisedome, & politike head, did him great credit and fauour with the king, who had him not onelie one of his priuie councell, but also made him lord treasuror of England. At his inthronization or installing he kept a solemne obseruation. For being come first to the citie, immediatlie after his consecration, as soone as he came to the east gate, he alighted from his horsse, and went in on foot, all the street being couered and laied with blacke cloth; he was led on both sides with two men of worship: and sir Hugh Courtneie knight, who clamed to be steward of his feast, went next before him. The feast it selfe was verie sumptuous and liberall. A controuersie was betweene him & the said sir Hugh Courtneie, concerning his chalenge to be his steward, but it was compounded and ended. This bishop as he grew and increased in wealth, so he was carefull in the well disposing of part therof. For the increase of learning he builded and erected two houses in Oxenford, the one named Stapledons inne, but since Excester college, the other Hart hall. He was also a speciall ciall benefactor vnto the hospitall of saint Johns in Excester; vnto the which, for the releeuing of certeine poore children therein, he impropriated the rectorie or personage of Ernescome. In the controuersie betweene his maister king Edward the second, and Charles the French king, he was sent ambassadour to the French king, and ioined in commission with the queene, for the treatie of a peace and reconciliation: which though it were obteined, yet he ioining with the Spensers, who fauoured not the queene, he returned into England; leauing the queene behind him. And whereas they practised what they could, to put enimitie betweene the king and hir; and to set hir besides the cushion, they themselues fell into the same snares, which they had laid for others. For not long after, the queene, by the helpe of the earle of Henauld, and of sir John his brother, came into England with a great armie. Whereof the king and the Spensers, being affraied, departed from London to Bristow, leauing the bishop at London, and made him custos of the same; who requiring the keies of the gates of the citie of the maior, the commoners tooke him and beheaded him, as also his brother sir Richard Stapledon, in Cheapside, and carried his bodie to his house without Templebar, & there buried it in a sandhill; namelie the fiftéenth of October in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred twentie and nine. But the queene forgetting all discurtesies, and reuerencing his calling, commanded his corps to some more honourable buriall: whereupon the same was taken vp, and brought to this citie, and with great solemnitie was buried in his owne church, vpon the eight and twentith of March, where his epitaph by the writer thereof is set. Thus after that he had béene bishop about twentie yeares, he ended his daies.

James Barkeleie.

28 James Barkeleie, vpon the six and twentith of March, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred twentie and seauen, before the buriall of his predecessor in his owne church, was consecrated bishop of this citie. He descended of the noble house of the lord Barkeleie, and albeit he were reputed to be a verie godlie and a wise man, yet he had no time to yéeld the triall thereof. For he died in the fourth moneth after his consecration, vpon the foure & twentith daie of Julie, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred twentie and seauen, and was buried in his owne church as some say, but some thinke he neuer came hither at all.

John Grandesson.

29 John Grandesson, being in Italie with pope John the two & twentith. After the death of James Barkeleie, the king presented him vnto the pope, who accepted the presentation, & consecrated him bishop of this diocesse on the eight of October, Anno 1327. He was borne and descended of the ancient house of the Grandessons, dukes of Burgognie, his father was named Gilbert, the brother of Otho the great lord Grandesson. Which Gilbert comming into this land, was well interteined by the king and nobilitie, and had a good liking of the countrie, that by meanes of Henrie earle of Lancaster, with whome he came into England, he married ladie Sibill, daughter and one of the heires to John Tregos, lord of the castell of Ewas, néere Hereford east, and by hir had issue fiue sonnes, and foure daughters; of which this bishop was one, and was borne in the parish of Ashperton, in the diocesse of Hereford. He was from his childhood verie well affected to learning, and became a good scholar and professor of diuinitie, of which method he wrote two books, the one intituled Pontificales maiores, and the other Pontificales minores. He was also verie graue, wise, and politike, and therby grew into such credit with pope John the two and twentith, that he was not onelie of his priuie councell, but also Nuntius apostolicæ sedis; and in all matters of weight and importance an ambassadour for him to the emperour, to the kings of Spaine, of France, of England, and of all others the mightiest princes of christendome. And being on a time sent in an ambassage to king Edward the third, he did with such wisedome and grauitie behaue himselfe, that the king was rauished in loue with him; and did so tenderlie loue and fauour him, that he neuer ceassed, vntill he had procured him from the pope, and then he gaue him the archdeaconrie of Notingham, and bestowed great liuings on him. He made him one of his priuie councell, and in the end preferred him to this bishoprike. After this, there being some dislking betweene pope Clement the sixt, and the king; he for his approued wisedome was sent in an ambassage to the pope, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred fortie and three, for an intreatie of a peace and an amitie betweene them to be had; and with such wisedome he did his message, that he obteined his purpose, and made a reconciliation. After his returne home to his bishoprike, he was altogither giuen in doing some good things. He builded & founded the college of saint Marie Otreie, and indowed the same with great and goodlie liuelihods, he was a liberall benefactor to the vicars choiall of his owne church, as also to the college of Glasneie in Perrin; he builded the two last arches in the west end of his church, vaulted the roofe of all the church, and fullie perfourmed and ended the buildings of the same, and then inriched his said church with plate, ornaments, and great riches. Also he builded a verie faire house in his sanctuarie at bishops Teington, which he gaue and left full furnished vnto his successors, and did impropriate vnto the same the parsonage of Radwaie, to the end as he setteth downe in his testament, vt haberent locum vndè caput suum reclinarent, si fortè in manum regis eorum temporalia caperentur: and which his hastening in the end came partlie to effect. For not onelie the most part of the temporalties of this bishoprike, but this new builded house and impropriation are come to be the possessions and inheritances of temporall men. This bishop waxed old, and féeling in himselfe a decaie of nature, made his last will and testament, wherein he made such large and bountious legacies to the pope, emperour, king, queene, archbishop, bishops, colleges, churches, and to sundrie persons of high estates and callings; that a man would maruell, considering his great and chargeable buildings & works otherwise, how and by what meanes he could haue attained to such a masse of welth and riches; but his wisedome and policie considered, it was easie. For first, he sequestrateth from himselfe and out of his house the troope of manie men and horsses, reteining and keeping no more than to serue his reasonable estate; his diet was frugall, his receipts great, his expenses no more than necessarie. Moreouer, he had taken and set an order with all the ecclesiasticall persons of his diocesse, that at the time of their deaths, they should leaue and bequeth all their goods to him or to some other in trust, In pios vsus, & towards his chargeable buildings; and so well he was beloued, and his doings liked, that they all accepted this his order: by meanes whereof he grew within the course of fortie yeares to infinite wealth and riches. He was in all his life time a plaine man, and void of all vaine glorie and pompe; and preuenting that none should be vsed at his buriall, commanded the same to be done plainelie & simplie; and that none of his executors, chapleins, seruants, nor none of his houshold should weare anie mourning blacke cloths at the same, but onelie their accustomable & common apparell, which then was commonlie greie coloured cloths. This bishop

bishop was no lesse graue and wise, than stout and of courage, if occasion did so require. And amongest other things this is reported of him; that about the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred thirtie and one, Simon Pepham, then archbishop of Canturburie, sent his mandatum to this bishop, that he would visit his church & dioceese vpon mondaie nert after Ascension daie then following. This bishop (vpon what occasion it is not written) did refuse this mandatum, and appealed from the same, aduertising the archbishop that he should not visit his church nor dioceese. Notwithstanding, the archbishop at the time appointed came to this citie, and went to S. Peters church, nothing thinking that anie durst to withstand him. But the bishop knowing of his coming, goeth to the church doore, meeteth the archbishop, and forbiddeth him to enter into his church; but the archbishop pressing forward, as with force to enter, the bishop being then well garded, denied and resisted him: wherupon the archbishop departed, and after at a prouinciall counsell holden at London, the archbishop complained hereof, but by meanes of the like discord betweene him & his suffragans, he preuailed not. In this bishops time one William of Excester, a verie well learned man, was a canon of this church; and he ioining with Nicholas de Cesena, Okeham, Walsingham, and others, did openlie preach, that Christ and his apostles were but poore men, and had no temporall possessions: neither was anie emperor or laie man subiect to the pope, but onlie in matters of religion. But when he heard that pope John the three and twentith had excommunicated, and would condemne them all for heretikes; this William, to saue his liuings, secretlie shonke awaie from his old companions, and changed his copie, and writeth certeine conclusions against them and his owne preachings. Also in this bishops time, about the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred and fortie, one John of Bampton, so named, bicause he was borne at Bampton, in this dioceese, and a monke of the order of the Carmelites, was a verie good scholar, and first did openlie read Aristotle in the vniuersitie of Cambridge, where he was a scholar; and afterwards he studied diuinitie, and was made doctor: he wrote certeine bookes, which are not extant. This bishop, after that he had occupied this church about two and fortie yeares, he died vpon S. Swithins daie, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred sixtie and nine, and was buried in a chappell which he builded in the west wall of his owne church.

Thomas Brentingham.

30 Thomas Brentingham, after the death of this John Grandeson, was at one instant chosen bishop of Excester and bishop of Hereford, who refusing the one tooke the other, and was consecrated bishop of Excester vpon the tenth daie of March, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred and seauentie, being the feast daie of Nereus and Achilles, William of Worcester then archbishop of Canturburie. This Thomas was a man verie well learned, and experted both in ecclesiasticall matters, and in politike gouernement, and in both these respects greatlie reuerenced and esteemed; and for that cause, at the parlement holden at Westminster, in the tenth yeare of the reigne of king Richard the second, was chosen one of the twelue peeres of the realme vnder the king. He was a benefactor to the Calenderhaie of the vicars chorall of his owne church, and perfourmed and supplied in buildings and otherwise, what his predecessors had left vndone. And hauing beene bishop foure and twentie yeares, he died the third of December, in the yeare of our Lord 1394, and was buried in the north side of the bodie of his owne church.

Edmund Stafford.

31 Edmund Stafford vpon the twentith daie of June, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three hundred ninetie and fiue, was consecrated at Lambeth by William Courtnaie archbishop of Canturburie. He was borne and descended of noble parentage, being brother to Ralfe lord Stafford created earle of Stafford by king Edward the third; he was both wise and learned, and for his wisedome grew into great credit with the king, and was both of his priuie councell, as also lord chancellor of England. At the parlement holden at Westminster, the one and twentith yeare of the reigne of king Richard the second, he being then speaker of the higher house, made a verie learned and pithie oration, to proue the absolute authoritie of a king: his theme was, Rex vnus erit omnibus. And hauing discoursed at large of the authoritie of a king, he did conclude; Quòd potestas regis esset sibi sola, vnita, annexa, solida; and whosoeuer did by anie meanes impeach the same, Pœna legis meritò esset plectendus. And for the furtherance of good letters, he did increase two fellowships in the college of Stapledons inne in Oxford, reformed the statutes of the house, and altered the name of it, and called it Excester college. After that he had continued bishop in much honor about three and twentie yeares, he died the fourth of September, being the seuenth yeare of king Henrie the fift, and lieth buried in his owne church in a verie faire tome of alabaster.

James Carie.

32 James Carie bishop of Chester, then being at Florence when news was brought to pope Martin the fift of the said late bishop Stafford's death, was there made bishop of this church, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand foure hundred and nineteene, and also consecrated; but long he inioied not his office, for there he died, and was buried.

Edmund Lacie.

33 Edmund Lacie bishop of Hereford was translated from thense vnto this church in the feast of Easter, and in the eight yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the fift, in the yeare of our Lord God one thousand foure hundred and twentie. He was a man verie deuout and religious, but subiect to flatterers, who carried him to their pleasure; he was a liberall benefactor vnto the vicar of Calenderhaie. Great contentions were betweene him and the citie for liberties, which by arbitrement were compounded. He founded the chapter house in his owne church. He was a professor of diuinitie, and verie well learned. For in the second yeare of his bishoprike, being the ninth yeare of the kings reigne, there was a parlement holden at Westminster, in which great complaints were made against the lose and dissolute life of the religious men, and especiallie the blacke monks. And this matter being brought to the conuocation house, this bishop as chefe proloquutor of that assemblie, did make a verie learned and a pithie oration before the king, then of purpose present, and the whole cleargie, much lamenting that the religious men were so far straied from the rules of their professions, and the holinesse of their predecessors. And when he had at large discoursed the same, he deliuered vp certeine articles in writing, praieng for reformation. Which his speeches were so effectuallie vttered, and his articles so pithilie penned, that both the king and the clergie did not onelie with great liking and allowance praise and commend the same; but also tooke order that there should be a prouinciall councell called out of hand for a reformation. Which was then promised, but not performed, by reason of the kings death, which not long after followed. But yet in the waie of good speed, it was then concluded and agreed, that euerie third benefice, being of the gift of anie of the prelats, or of anie monasterie, should from thensefoorth for seauen yeares be giuen to some scholar of Oxford or Cambridge. This bishop, after he had liued fiue and thirtie yeares in this bishoprike, died and was buried in the north wall of the quere in his owne church. After whose death manie miracles were said and deuised to be done at his tome, whereupon great pilgrimages were made by the common people to the same.

George Neuill. 34 George Neuill succeeded Edmund Lacie, and was consecrated in the feast of saint Katharine, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fiftie and fiue, he was of a noble parentage, being the second son of Richard Neuill earle of Sarisburie, he finished and ended the chapter house which his predecessor had begun. And after that he had beene bishop about ten yeares, he was remoued to Yorke, and made archbishop there, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred three score and fiue.

John Booth. 35 John Booth, after the translation of George Neuill to Yorke, was consecrated bishop vnder Thomas Burscher archbishop of Canturburie, vpon the two and twentith daie of Februarie, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand foure hundred three score and six. He was by profession a ciuillian, and a batchelor of the same, he gouerned his church verie well, and builded (as some suppose) the bishops see in the quere. But being wearie of the great troubles which were in this countrie betweene king Edward the fourth and the earle of Warwike, he remoued from hense to his house of Horsleigh in Hamshire, where in the twelfe yere of his bishoprike he died, vpon the first of Aprill, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand foure hundred seuentie and eight, and lieth buried at saint Clements in London.

Peter Courtneie. 36 Peter Courtneie, immediatlie after the death of John Booth, was presented to this bishoprike, and consecrated by Thomas archbishop of Canturburie in November, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand foure hundred seuentie and seuen at saint Stephans in Westminster; he was the son of sir Philip Courtnie of Powderham, his mother was named Elisabeth, daughter to Walter lord Hungerford. He for his wisedome and good behauiour was in great fauor & credit with king Henrie the seauenth, by whose means he was translated from this church to Winchester, in the ninth yeare of his being bishop here, and in the fift yeare of his being there he died, vpon the twentith daie of December, in the yere one thousand foure hundred ninetie and one, and lieth buried in his owne church. He finished the north tower of saint Peters, and gaue the clocke bell which is in the same, and which beareth the name Peter.

Richard For. 37 Richard For, vpon the remouing of Peter Courtneie, was consecrated bishop of this church, vnder Thomas archbishop of Canturburie, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand foure hundred three score and six. He was a verie wise man, and in great credit and estimation with king Henrie the seuenth, vnto whome he was a faithfull councellor, and of his councell; with whom he acquainted himselfe at Paris, when he was there a student. For king Henrie then erle of Richmond, being at Uenice, and aduertised how the nobilitie of England was bent to haue him for their king, came from thense to Paris, and sought vnto Charles then king of France for aid and helpe: in which the earle his suites this For was a speciall traueller and councellor; and in the end, God giuing the succes, the erle obteined the crowne, and hauing had due triall of the fidelitie, wisedome, & truth of this bishop, he made him lord priuie seale; and kept and vsed him & his aduise in all his weightie matters as well at home as abrode. He being ambassador sundrie times to the kings of France and Scotland, and of a verie hartie good will and loue, the king made him godfather to his second son king Henrie the eight. There was a kind of emulation, betweene this bishop and the earle of Surreie, both of them being verie wise and of great seruice to the king and commonwealth: howbeit, in some diuersitie of respects, the one hauing no issue to care for, did deale without anie priuat affection or singular gaine; and the other hauing issue, was desirous to aduance his house and honor. These affections did breed some dislike betweene them two, yet the king finding a faith vnto himselfe, and a commoditie to the commonwealth, misliked it not, if the same exceeded his measure: and they more warme than commendable for their callings and estates. The king then or the councell would deale betweene them for the appeasing and pacifieng of them, and to them he was both friendlie, louing, and liberall. The one he deliuered out of the tower, pardoned him of his offenses, restored him to his lands, receiued him into speciall fauor, made him of his priuie councell, as also lord treasuror of England, and his generall into Scotland, & augmented his liuelihods. The other he first made bishop to this church, then remoued him to Bath, and from thense vnto Durham, and lastlie vnto Winchester. Erasmus, in his booke intituled The preacher or Ecclesiastes, declareth how that the king vpon a time, wanting some peece of monie, was to borow the same of the commons, and of the clergie. And for the dealings with the clergie, the matter was by commission committed to this bishop. Who when they came before him, vsed all the excuses that they could, to shift themselues from lending of anie monie. Some came verie seemelie and well apparelled, and awaited vpon by their men, according to their liuelihods; and these alledged, that they were greatlie charged in hospitalitie and house keeping, with other charges incident to the same, so that they had no monie, & therefore could paie none. Some came poorelie and barelie apparelled, and they alledged that their liuelihods were but small, and yet their charges were great, and by that meanes the world was so hard with them that they had it not to spare. This bishop, hauing heard all these excuses, vsed this dilemme. To the richer sort he said; Forsomuch as you are so well and seemelie apparelled, and do keepe so great houses, and haue all things necessarie about you; it is a manifest argument, that you haue some store about you, or else you would not do as ye do: and therefore yee must needs lend. To the other, who pretended excuse of their pouertie, he thus replied vnto them; that forsomuch as they were so bare in their apparell, and so sparing of their expenses, it must needs be that they saued their purses and had monie, and therefore they must needs paie, and so adiudged them to lend vnto the prince. Now as he arose by learning, so he was a great fauorer and furtherer of learning: and for the good increase of the same he builded and founded Corpus Christi college in Oxenford. In his latter daies he waxed and was blind, and dieng in Winchester, he was there buried in his owne church, after that he had beene bishop of Excester six yeers, he was remoued to Bath, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand foure hundred ninetie and two.

Oliuer King. 38 Oliuer King, immediatlie vpon the transferring of bishop For, was consecrated bishop of this church, in Februarie, one thousand foure hundred ninetie and two, John Morton then archbishop of Canturburie. This Oliuer was chapleine to king Henrie the seuenth, and deane of Windesor, and register of the order of the garter. In his time were the rebellions of Joseph the blacke smith in Cornewall, and of Perken Warbecke. This bishop after that he had occupied this see about fiue yeares, he died in the yeare of our Lord one thousand foure hundred died ninetie and seuen, and (as some suppose) he was buried at Windesor.

Richard Redman. 39 Richard Redman, immediatlie vpon the death of bishop Oliuer King, was translated from his bishoprike in Wales to this citie; but after fiue yeares he was remoued vnto the bishoprike of Elie, and installed there in September in the yeare of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred and one. He was a gentleman borne, and descended of a verie worshipfull house, which ioined with his wisedome and learning, did much increase his credit and good report.

John Arundell. 40 John Arundell, next after the translation of bishop Redman, was remoued from Couentrie and Lichfield vnto this citie, and was installed the fifteenth of March, one thousand fiue hundred and one. Wherein he sought not the preferment for anie liuelihods, but rather desirous to be a dweller and resiant in his countrie where he was borne: for he was descended of the Arundels of Lanherne in Cornewall, a house of great antiquitie and worship. He long inioied not his new bishoprike, for after two yeares after his installing, he had occasion to ride vnto London, and there died, and was buried in S. Clements church without Templebar, in the yeare one thousand fiue hundred and three.

Hugh Oldam. 41 Hugh Oldham, vpon the death of Arundell, by the preferment of the countesse of Richmond and Derbie, vnto whom he was chapleine, was preferred vnto this bishoprike, and installed in the same. He was a man hauing more zeale than knowledge, and more deuotion than learning; somewhat rough in speeches, but friendlie in doings. He was carefull in the sauing and defending of his liberties, for which continuall sutes was betweene him and the abbat of Tauestoke; he was liberall to the vicars choall of his church, and reduced them to the keeping of commons, and towards the maintenance thereof he gaue them certeine reuenues, and impropriated vnto them the rectorie of Cornewood. He albeit (of himselfe) he were not learned, yet a great fauourer and a furtherer of learning and of learned men. Notwithstanding, he was sometime crossed in his honest attempt therein. He first was minded to haue inlarged Excester college in Oxford, as well in buildings as in fellowships: but after being a requester to the fellowes for one Atkins to be a fellow, in whose fauour he had written his letters and was denied, he changed his mind, and his good will was alienated. About the same time doctor Smith bishop of Lincolne was building of the college named Brasen nose, and was verie willing and desirous to ioine with him: but being denied to haue the nomination of a founder, his mind was changed. Not long after, being aduertised that bishop Fox of Winchester was minded to erect & found a new college, he ioined with him, and contributed vnto him a great masse of monie, and so a college was builded for scholars, and great liuelihods prouided for them; & then the house was named Corpus Christi college. Whereof the one of them bare the name of a founder, and the other of a benefactor. Howbeit, some diuersitie was betweene these two bishops at the first, to what vse this college should be imploied. For the founder was of the mind that he would haue made it for a house of monks; but the benefactor was of the contrarie mind, and would haue it for scholars, alleging that monks were but a sort of buzzing flies, & whose state could not long indure; whereas scholars brought vp in learning would be profitable members to the commonwealth, and good ornaments to the church of God, and continue for euer. The founder being a wise man, and of a deepe iudgement, when he had paused and considered hereof, yeeldeth herevnto: and so it was concluded betweene them to make and build a college for scholars. And forthwith for the good direction, guiding, and gouernement of the said college and scholars; such wise, good, & politike statutes and ordinances were by good aduise and counsell deuised, established, and ordeined; as whereby the said college hath beene, and yet continueth one of the best nurseries for training and instructing of good scholars in learning within that vniuersitie. This bishop and the abbat of Tauestoke did still contend and continue in law during their liues: and during which sute this bishop died, being excommunicated at Rome, and who could not be suffered to be buried, vntill an absolution from Rome was procured for him. After that he had beene bishop about fiftene yeares, he died the fiue and twentith of June, one thousand fiue hundred and nineteene, and was buried in his owne church.

John Voisey. 42 John Voisey, otherwise Harman, succeeded Oldham, by the preferment of king Henrie the eight, whose chapleine he then was, and deane of his chapell as also of this church; he was doctor of the lawes, verie well learned and wise, and in great fauour with the king, who sent him sundrie times in ambassages to forreine princes; he was lord president of Wales, & had the gouernement of the kings onlie daughter ladie Marie princesse of Wales. Of all the bishops in the land he was accounted the courtlikest and the best courtier. And although he were well reported for his learning, yet better liked for his courtlike behauiour, which in the end turned not so much to his credit, as to the vtter ruine and spoile of the church: for of two and twentie lordships and manors, which his predecessors had and left vnto him, of a good yearelie reuenue he left but three, & them also leased out. And where he found fourteene houses well furnished, he left onelie one house bare and without furniture, and yet charged with sundrie fees and annuities; and by these means this bishoprike, which sometimes was counted one of the best, is now become in temporall lands one of the meanest, and according to the forepurposeing of bishop Grandison, a place scarse left for the bishop to laie and rest his head in; and yet neuertheless he was a great fauourer of learned men, and especiallie of diuines, whome he preferred in his church aboue others. He was verie bountious and liberall vnto all men, but especiallie vnto courtiers, vnto his owne kindred and countriemen. Vpon manie he bestowed much, to the confusion of some of them; and vpon the others he spent much by building of a towne called Sutton Colshull where he was borne, which he procured to be incorporated, and made a market towne, and set vp therein making of hearses, but all which in the end came to small effect. In his time, after the death of king Henrie the eight, there was an alteration of religion by king Edward the first, whereof insued a rebellion & commotion in this diocesse: which in some part was imputed to this bishop, bicause he laie farre from it, and dwelled in his owne countrie. Whereupon he resigned the bishoprike into the kings hands, after that he had beene bishop about thirtie yeares, and liued by the rents of the temporaltie of the bishoprike, which when he alienated and discontinued, he did receiue vnto him for terme of his owne life.

Miles Couerdale. 43 Miles Couerdale, after the resignation of Voisey, was by king Edward made bishop of this citie, & consecrated at Lambeth by Thomas Cranmer archbishop of Canturburie, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred and fiftie. He was borne in the north countrie, and from his childhood giuen to learning, wherein he profited verie much: he was one of the first which professed the gospell in this land in the time of king Henrie the eight, he translated

translated the bible out of the Hebrue into English, and wrote sundrie bookes vpon the scriptures. Which doctrine being verie new and strange in those daies, and he verie streightlie pursued by the bishops, made his escape, & passed ouer into low Germanie, where he printed the bibles of his translation and sent them ouer into England, and therof made his gaine wherby he liued. But the bishops, namelie D. Stokesleie bishop of London, when he heard hereof, and minding to preuent that no such bibles should be dispersed within this realme, made inquirie where they were to be sold, and bought them all vp; supposing that by this meanes no more bibles would be had: but contrarie to his expectation it fell out otherwise. For the same monie which the bishop gaue for these bookes, was sent ouer by the merchant vnto this Couerdale, and by that meanes he was of that wealth and abilitie, that he imprinted as manie more and sent them ouer into England; but he was then so narrowlie sought for, that he was driuen to remoue himselfe out of Flanders into Germanie, and dwelled vnder the Palsegraue of Rhene, where he found much fauor. First he taught yong children, and hauing learned the Dutch tong, the prince Palatine gaue him a benefice, named Burghsaber, where he continued and liued verie well, partlie by that benefice, and partlie by the liberalitie of the lord Cromewell, who was his good lord and releeued him verie much. At length, when the religion was altered in England, and the gospell had a free passage, he returned & did verie much good in preaching of the same. And when the commotion in Deuon was for religion, he was appointed to attend the lord Russell, when he came to suppresse the same, and verie shortlie for his learning and godlie life was made bishop of this see; who most worthilie did performe the office committed vnto him. He preached continuallie vpon euerie holie daie, and did read most commonlie twise in the weeke in some one church or other within this citie. He was after the rate of his liuings a great keeper of hospitalitie, verie sober in diet, godlie in life, friendlie to the godlie, liberall to the poore, and courteous to all men, void of pride, full of humilitie, abhorring couetousnesse, and an enimie to all wickednesse and wicked men: whose companies he shunned, and whom he would in no wise shrowd or haue in his house and companie. His wife a most sober, chast, and godlie matrone; his house and houshold another church, in which was exercised all godlinesse and vertue. No one person being in his house, which did not from time to time giue an account of his faith and religion, and also did liue accordinglie. And as he had a care for the successe in religion, so had he also for the direction of the gouernement in ecclesiasticall causes. And bicause he was not skilfull therin, neither would be hindered from his godlie studies, and be incombered with such worldlie matters, which neuertheles he would haue be done in all vprightnesse, iustice, and equitie; he sent to Oxford for a learned man to be his chancellor, and by the ministerie of the writer hereof he procured and obteined one maister Robert Weston doctor of the ciuill law, & afterwards lord chancellor of Ireland, vnto whome he committed his consistorie, and the whole charge of his ecclesiasticall iurisdiction; allowing vnto him, not onelie all the fees thereunto apperteining, but also lodged and found him, his wife, familie, horsse, and man, within his owne house, and gaue him a yearelie pension of fortie pounds. And surelie the bishop was no more godlie and carefull of his part, concerning preaching; but this man also was as diligent and seuere in doing of his office, without reproch of being affectionated or corrupted. And notwithstanding this good man, new a blamelesse bishop, liued most godlie and vertuous: yet the common people, whose old bottels would receiue no new wine, could not brooke nor digest him; for no other cause, but bicause he was a preacher of the gospell, an enimie to papistrie, & a married man. Manie deuises were attempted against him for his confusion, sometimes by false suggestions, sometimes by open railings, and false libels; sometimes by secret backbitings, and in the end practised his death by impoisoning: but by Gods prouidence the snares were broken and he deliuered. After that he had béene bishop about three yeares king Edward died, and then queene Marie hauing the crowne, the religion was altered, and he deprriued. And notwithstanding the malice of prelats and archpapists was most bitter against him, and who had sworne his death: yet by the goodnesse of God he was most miraculouslie preserued, and deliuered from out of their hands, at the suite and by the meanes of the king of Denmarke: who so earnestlie sued, & so often wrote to the quéene for him, that he was deliuered and sent vnto him; with whome after that he had staied a while, he went againe into Germanie to the Palsgraue, who most louinglie receiued him, placed him againe in his former benefice of Burghsaber, where he continued vntill the death of quéene Marie. And then the preaching of the gospell being againe receiued, & hauing a free passage, he returned into England; but would neuer returne to his bishoprike, notwithstanding it was reserued for him, & sundrie times offered him; but liued a priuat life, continuing in London, preaching & teaching the gospell, so long as the strength of his bodie would permit; and at length being verie old and striken in yeares, he died, and was honorablie buried at saint Magnus church in London.

44 John Molsleie, after the deprriuation of Miles Couerdale, was restored to this church, and for the better setling of the Romish religion did here staie for a while: but his mind was addicted to his owne countrie, that he returned thither, and made his onlie abode there, practising there what he could, to haue the making of kersies to come to some effect; but the same being more chargeable than profitable, came to small prowse. This man being verie old died in his owne house, with a pang, and was buried in his parish church there, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and fiue. John Molseie.

45 James Troblefield succéeded bishop Molseie, and was consecrated in the yeare of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred fiftie & six, he was a gentleman borne, and of a good house, verie gentle and courteous; he professed diuinitie, but most zelous in the Romish religion, & yet nothing cruell nor bloudie. And yet that he might not séeme to do nothing, he was contented to prosecute and condemne a giltlesse poore séelie woman, named Agnes Pirell for religion and heresie, & who was burned in Southingham for the same. It was laied to his charge (as doth appeare by an indictment taken at Lancester, Die lunæ in quarta septimana quadragesimæ, anno Philippi & Mariæ secundo & tertio, before William Stanford then iustice of the assise) that she should denie the reall presence in the sacrament of the altar, and that the same was but a signe and a figure of Christs bodie, and that none doth eat reallie the bodie of Christ but spirituallie. He was verie carefull to recouer some part of the lands of his bishoprike, which his predecessor walked, and did obteine of quéene Marie, to him and to his successors, the fee farme of the manor of Crediton. After that he had béene bishop about two yeares, quéene Marie died; and he was deprriued, and liued after a priuat life. James Troblefield.

46 William Alleie, in the second yeare of quéene Elisabeth, was chosen bishop, and installed the first of August, William Alleie.

William Bradbridge.

Auguſt, in the yeare of our Lord one thouſand fiue hundred ſirtie and one. In all quéene Maries time, which were called the Marian daies, he trauelled from place to place in the north countrie, where he was not knowne; and ſometimes by practiſing of phyſike, and ſometimes by teaching of ſcholars, he picked out a poore liuing for himſelfe and his wife, and ſo continued, being not knowne to haue béene a prieſt, during all quéene Maries time: after whoſe death he went to London, and there did read diuinitie lecture in Paules verie learnedlie, and to his great commendation; and from whenſe he was taken and made biſhop of this citie. He was verie well learned vniuerſallie, but his chiefe ſtudie and profeſſion was in diuinitie, and in the tongs. And being biſhop, he debated no part of his former trauels, but ſpent his time verie godlie and vertuouſlie. Vpon euerie holie daie (for the moſt part) he preached, and vpon the wéeke daies he would and did read a lecture of diuinitie; the reſidue of his time, and free from his neceſſarie buſineſſe, he ſpent in his priuat ſtudies, and wrote ſundrie boks, whereof his prelections or lectures which he did read in Paules, and his poore mans libzarie he cauſed to be imprinted: the like he would haue done with his Hebrue grammar, and other his works, if he had liued. He was well ſtored, and his libzarie well repleniſhed with all the beſt ſort of writers, which moſt gladlie he would impart and make open to euerie good ſcholar and ſtudent, whoſe companie and conference he did moſt deſire & imbrace. He ſéemed at the firſt appéerance to be a rough and an auſtere man, but in verie truth, a verie courteous, gentle, and an affable man; at his table full of honeſt ſpæches, ioined with learning and pleaſantneſſe, according to the time, place, and companie. All his exerciſes, which for the moſt part was at bowles, verie merrie and pleſant, void of all ſadneſſe, which might abate the benefit of recreation; loth to offend, readie to forgiue, void of malice, full of loue, bountifull in hoſpitalitie, liberall to the poore, and a ſuccourer of the néedie, faithfull to his friend, and courteous to all men; a hater of couetouſneſſe, and an enimie to all euill and wicked men, and liued an honeſt, a godlie, and vertuous life. Finallie, he was indued with manie notable good gifts and vertues, onelie he was ſomewhat credulous, of a haſtie beléefe, and light of credit, which he did oftentimes miſlike & blame in himſelfe. In his latter time he waxed ſomewhat groſſe, and his bodie full of humors, which did abate much of his wonted exerciſes: and hauing béene biſhop about eight yeares, he died the firſt of Aprill one thouſand fiue hundred and ſeauentie; and was buried in his owne church.

William Bradbridge.

47 William Bradbridge, deane of Sariſburie, was the next biſhop, and conſecrated at Lambeth by Matthew Parker archbiſhop of Canturburie, the eighténth of March one thouſand fiue hundred and ſeauentie: he was a profeſſor of diuinitie, but not taken to be ſo well grounded as he perſuaded himſelfe, he was zelous in religion, but not ſo forwards as he was wiſhed to be. In his latter daies he delighted to dwell in the countrie, which was not ſo much to his liking, as troubleſome to his clergie, & to ſuch as had anie ſutes vnto him. It was thought he died verie rich, but after his death it proued otherwiſe: he died ſuddenlie, no bodie being about him, at Newton Ferris, the ninth yeare of his biſhoprike, vpon the nine and twentith of Julie, in the yeare of our Lord 1578, and was buried in his owne church. Thus farre the collection of Iohn Hooker, agréeing with the records.]

I. Stow.

The ſeuenténth daie of Julie the quéenes maieſtie being on the riuer of Thames, about nine of the clocke at night (betwixt hir highneſſe manour of Gréenewich & Dartford) in hir priuie barge, accompanied with the French ambaſſador, the earle of Lincolne, and maiſter vicechamberlaine; it chanced that one Thomas Apletrée, a yong man, and ſeruant to maiſter Henrie Carie, with two or three others, being in a bote on the Thames, rowing vp and downe betwixt the places aforenamed: the foreſaid Thomas had a caliuer or harquebus charged with bullet, and ſhooting at random, by miſfortune ſhot one of the watermen, being the ſecond man next vnto the bales of the ſaid barge (which ſat within ſix foot of hir highneſſe) cleane through both armes, and mooued him out of his place. For the which fact the ſaid Thomas being apprehended and condemned to death, was on the one and twentith of Julie brought to the water ſide, where was a gibbet ſet vp, directlie placed betwixt Dartford and Gréenewich. But when the hangman had put the halter about his necke, the right honorable ſir Chriſtopher Hatton capteine of the gard, and one of hir maieſties priuie councell, ſhewed the quéenes maieſties moſt gratious pardon, and deliuered him from execution. This yeare Iohn For of Woodbridge, William Wicknete of Portſmouth, and Robert Pore of Harwich Engliſhmen, hauing béene priſoners in Turkie about the ſpace of thirtéene or fourtéene yeares, with more than two hundred and ſirtie other chriſtians of diuerſe nations, by killing their kéeper, marueilouſlie eſcaped, and returned into their natiue countries.

Traitorous fact of Thomas Appletrée.

John Fox an Engliſhman deliuered two hundred and three ſcore chriſtians frō captiuitie of the Turke.

This yeare in the moneths of September and October fell great winds and raging flouds in ſundrie places of this realme, as in the towne of Newport: the cotages were borne downe, the corne loſt, paſture ground ouerwhelmed, and cattell drowned. In the towne of Bedford the water came vp to the market place, where cupbords, cheſts, ſtoles, and ſcurms ſwam about the houſes; their fewell, corne and haie was wracke & borne awaie. Alſo the towne of ſaint Edes in Huntingtonſhire was ouerflowed ſuddenlie in the night, when all men were at reſt; & the waters brake in with ſuch force, that the towne was almoſt all defaced; the ſwans ſwam downe the market place, and all the towne about the botes did flote. The towne of Gormanchester was ſuddenlie ſuppreſt, their houſes flowed full of water, when men were at reſt, and their cattell with other things were deſtroied.

The one and twentith of Nouember, ſir Thomas Gréſham knight agent to the quéenes highneſſe, who had in his life built the roiall Exchange in London, betwéene ſix and ſeuen of the clocke in the euening, comming from the ſame Exchange to his houſe (which he had ſumptuouſlie builded) in Biſhopſgate ſtréet of London, ſuddenlie fell downe in his kitchin, and being taken vp was found ſpéechleſſe, and preſentlie dead, who afterwards was ſolemnlie buried in his owne pariſh church of ſaint Helen there, where he had prepared for himſelfe a ſumptuous towme or monument, without anie epitaph or inſcription thereupon. This ſir Thomas Gréſham in his teſtament (which long before his death he had ordeined) bequeathed diuerſe large legacies not yet performed.

The eight and twentith daie of March, one Francis alias Marmaduke Glouer was hanged on a gibet ſet vp for that purpoſe by the ſtandard in Cheape, for wilfullie murthering ſergeant Grace after he was by him arreſted. Alſo on the next morrow, being the nine and twentith daie of March, the ſame gibet was ſet vp at Hog lane end vpon eaſt Smithfield, néere vnto the tower of London, thereon to haue haue hanged one Richard Dod for murthering of mistresse Skinner a widow, in hir house there by. But sir Owen Hopton lieutenant of the tower, cõmanding the officers perteining to the shiriffes of London backe againe to the west side of the crosse, toke the shiriffe of the out shire with the prisoner into an house, and after long talke brought the prisoner forth againe, & deliuered him to the officers, to be by them brought backe to London. Then he caused the gibet to be taken downe and carried awaie at his pleasure, and without further contention (to my knowledge) the said Richard Dod was in the after none of the same date hanged at Tiborne.

A great earthquake.

On the first of Aprill, being wednesdaie in Easter weeke about six of the clocke toward euening, a sudden earthquake happening in London, and almost generallie throughout all England, caused such an amazednesse among the people as was wonderfull for the time, and caused them to make their earnest praiers to almightie God. The great clocke bell in the palace at Westminster strake of it selfe against the hammer with the shaking of the earth, as diuerse other clocks & bels in the steeples of the citie of London and elsewhere did the like. The gentlemen of the Temple being then at supper, ran from the tables, and out of their hall with their knives in their hands. The people assembled at the plaie houses in the fields, as at the Whore ater (the Theater I would saie) were so amazed, that doubting the ruine of the galleries, they made haste to be gone. A peece of the temple church fell downe, some stones fell from saint Paules church in London: and at Christs church neere to Newgate market, in the sermon while, a stone fell from the top of the same church, which stone killed out of hand one Thomas Greie an apprentise, and an other stone fell on his fellow seruant named Mabell Everet, and so bruised hir that she lived but foure daies after. Diuerse other at that time in that place were sore hurt, with running out of the church one ouer another for feare. The tops of diuerse chimneies in the citie fell downe, the houses were so shaken: a part of the castell at Bishops Stratford in Essex fell downe. This earthquake indured in or about London not passing one minute of an houre, and was no more felt. But afterward in Kent, and on the sea coast it was felt three times; as at Sandwich at six of the clocke the land not onelie quaked, but the sea also somed, so that the ships tottered. At Douer also the same houre was the like, so that a peece of the cliffe fell into the sea, with also a peece of the castell wall there: a peece of Saltwood castell in Kent fell downe; and in the church of Hide the bels were heard to sound. A peece of Sutton church in Kent fell downe, the earthquake being there not onlie felt, but also heard. And in all these places and others in east Kent, the same earthquake was felt three times to moue, to wit, at six, at nine, and at eleuen of the clocke. The nineteenth date of Aprill the ferrie at Lambeth was drowned with fiue men and foure horsses; other two men and fiue horsses swam to land and were saued.

William Lambe esquier deceased, his almesdeeds.

On the one and twentith of Aprill, in the yeare 1580 departed this life master William Lambe esquier, sometime gentleman of the chappell in the reigne of king Henrie the eight, citizen of London, and free of the clothworkers. Of this mans almesdeeds and manifold charities, some before, some since his death put in effectuall practise, thus reporteth a memorall recorded in print, agreeing in truth with his last will and testament: an extract whereof for others imitation is necessarilie here to be inserted. This gentleman remembring that learning bringeth preferment, yea euen to them which are put baselie borne, as it pleased God to moue him by his good and gratious spirit, he proued himselfe by testimonials of his doings a louer of learning, and a fauourer of euerie honest profession. For in the towne of Sutton Valens in Kent, this worshipfull gentleman at his owne costs and proper expenses erected a grammar schole for the education of youth in the feare of God, in good maners, in knowledge and vnderstanding.

The erection of a grammar schole & necessarie allowance to the master and vsher.

He also weieng with himselfe, that the labourer ought of right to haue his hire; and that, no man goeth to warre of his owne proper charge, besides other commodities which he thought meet and necessarie, hath allowed the maister twentie pounds, and the vsher ten pounds, from time to time, as either place shall be supplied by succession, for their yearelie stipends and perpetuall pensions. To continue the rehersall of his good deeds in Sutton aforesaid, note his tender & pitifull heart toward the poore, for whose sustentation, maintenance, and releefe, he hath builded six almes houses for the impotent, and hath giuen six pounds to be yearelie paied vnto them for their necessarie prouision. Moreouer, besides this charitable deed, to keepe still within the compasse of Kent, marke the singular loue which this gentleman did beare vnto learning; for the furtherance wherof, and the more incouragement of poore scholers, he hath giuen to the schole of Maidstone ten pounds a yeare for euer, with this caueat or prouiso, that needie mens children should be preferred to the enioieng of this singular benefit.

A warre for poore mens children to be kept at schole.

What this gentleman had not onelie a regard for the seed-plots of learning, to haue them watered with the springs of his bountie: but also a prouident eie, and a carefull hart for the profit of the commonwealth, the particulars following substantiallie do proue. For, seeing in his life time the decaie of sundrie trades, the ruine of diuerse occupations, and other inconuenences, which are like to grow to the vndoing of a multitude, except by policie they be preuented: of a meere affection (if I said fatherlie I were not controllable) he hath freelie giuen to the poore clothiers in Suffolke, to the poore clothiers of Bridgenorth in Shropshire, and to the poore clothiers at Ludlow in the said countie, three hundred pounds, to be paid by euen portions, to each seuerall towne of the said counties one hundred pounds a peece, for their supportation and maintenance at their worke and occupation. So little esteemed he the mucke of this world, in respect of doing good, specially when he saw old age drawing him to his graue: of which mind it were to be wished all richmen would be (whom God hath made his stewards) when they war crooked & bow backt, and (as the poet saith)

Obrepit canis rugosa senecta capillis.

The common wealth remembred.

A relefe to poore clothiers in diuerse places.

Furthermore, the well of his weldoing not yet waring drie, but yelding liquor of releefe verie largelie, & watered other places. For, as the countrie, so likewise the citie (the citie I meane of London) hath cause, yea iust cause with open mouth to magnifie the goodnesse of God, so mightilie working in this praiseworthie esquier. The memorable monuments, which shall liue when he is dead, and shall flourish when he is rotten, are witnesses of the loue, which he being a citizen bare vnto this citie. For, let vs begin with the conduit which he of his owne costs, not requiring either collection or contribution, founded of late in Holborne, not sparing expenses so it might be substantiall, not pinching for charges so it might be durable and plentifull, as they can testifie which saw the seeking of the springs, the maner of making the trenches, the ordering of the pipes, lieng in length from the head to the said conduit, more than two thousand yards: and finallie, the framing of euerie necessarie appurtenance tenance thereunto belonging. Besides this, means is made, by a standard with one cocke at Holborne bridge to conuey the wall, which doth such seruice, the water thereof being both sweet, pleasant, and wholsome, as neither rich nor poore can well mislike. Which great worke as he aduisedlie attempted, so he commendablie finished, hauing disbursed therabouts, of his owne costs & charges, to the sum of 1500 pounds.

The erection of a grammar schoole & necessarie allowance to the maister and vsher.

And yet further note the wisedome and prouidence of this gentleman, who considering that the right vse of a good thing might cut off manie occasions of vnthriftines and idlenesse, and knowing that we are placed in this world to follow the vocation whereunto we are called: besides that, seeing the hardnesse of this age wherein we liue, that manie would worke if they had meanes, manie neglect and care not for worke though they haue meanes, some would willinglie withstand pouertie if they might, some had rather beg and do worse than giue themselues to labour, hath béene thus beneficiall to poore women that are glad to take paines, as to bestow vpon them a hundred and twentie pales, therewith to carrie and serue water: an honest thrift of liuing, though somewhat toilesome. To descend and come downe to other his almesdeeds, you shall vnderstand that he being a member of the right worshipfull corporation and societie of Clothworkers, was not forgetfull of that companie, vnto whome he hath giuen his dwelling house in London, with other lands, and tenements, to the value of thirtie pounds or thereabouts, by them to be thus bestowed: to wit, for the hiring of a minister to read diuine seruice thrise a weeke, that is, euerie sundaie, wednesdaie, and fridaie throughout the yeare, in the chapell or church belonging to his house, called by the name of saint James in the wall by Cripplegate: and for foure sermons there yéerelie to be made and preached, a competent allowance.

Manes houses built for the poore.

The right worshipfull Clothworkers remembred.

Allowance for foure yearelie sermons.

Out of which sum also of thirtie pounds, it is prouided that a deduction be made by the said Clothworkers, for apparelling twelue men, and as manie women, in forme as followeth: that is to saie, to euerie one of the twelue men one freeze gowne, one locrum shirt, & a good strong paire of winter shoes: to twelue women likewise one freeze gowne, one locrum smocke, & a good strong paire of winter shoes, all readie made for their wearing: remembred alwaies that they must be persons both poore and honest, vnto whome this charitable déed ought to be extended. Prouided also, that the execution hereof be done the first date of October, orderlie from yeare to yeare for euer whiles the world doth last. Moreouer, he hath giuen to those of his companie foure pounds frélie, not for a time, but perpetuallie: and thus doth his bountifulnesse manie waies appeare. To the parish of S. Giles without Cripplegate, he hath giuen fiftéene pounds to the bels and chime, hauing meant (as it seemeth if they had taken time) to be more liberall in that behalfe. The said bels & chime were in his life, & also after his deth kept in good order according to his will: but afterwards vpon occasion some of them newlie cast became ill of sound & out of tune: a fault in some which would be amended. The poore of the parish aforesaid, by their releife in his life time secretlie ministred, haue iust cause to lament the losse of this right bountifull almoner. For by his means their succour was the more: now it is to be feared it will be so much the lesse, by how much it may be supposed he increased their releefe. Thus regarded he not so much his priuat thrift, as the cómon good, giuing therein to the world a testimonie of christian prudence, whose nature is to prefer the benefit of manie before the profit of one, according to that of the poet:

Guerie poore man and poore woman a shirt, a smock, a gowne, and a paire of shoes, &c.

This gentlemans distributions are so diuerse, and so manie, that the rehersall of them requireth a large discourse. It is well knowen, and that can the worshipfull companie of the Stationers witnesse, that this gentleman, for the space of these foureteene or fiftéene yeares, whiles he liued, was pitifull to the poore of the parish of S. Faiths, and other parishes: in which said parish church, euerie fridaie ordinarilie throughout the yeare, distribution was made of their allowance by the hands of the said worshipfull Stationers, to whome that charge was and is committed: namelie, to twelue poore people twelue pence in monie, and twelue pence in bread. Neither is this charitable déed laid aslæpe, but continued euen to the worlds end, for the perpetuall succor of the poore and impotent, a legacie of six pounds, thirtéene shillings and foure pence, allowed to that end; the bestowing whereof is in the hands of the said worshipfull societie of Stationers, the distributors of this almesse to the poore: who are put in mind to praise God for that prouision, in this request of the benefactor grauen in mettall, and fixed fast in the wall hard by his tome:

Releefe for the poore people. M. Lambes loue to the worshipfull Stationers.

Perpetuall prouision for the poore.

I praie you all that receiue bread and pence,
To saie the Lords praier before ye go hence.

As for Christes hospitall, vnto the which he hath proued himselfe a fatherlie benefactor, towards the bringing vp of the poore children, he hath giuen six pounds, which they shall inioie for the terme of fiue hundred yeares. Moreouer (marke the rare liberalitie of this vertuous gentleman) he hath giuen to the said hospitall one hundred pounds in readie monie, therewith to purchase lands, that their releefe, by the reuenues of the same, might be perpetuall: a notable déed, and an vndoubted worke of perfect christianitie. As for S. Thomas spitle in Southwarke, toward the succour of the sicke and diseased, he hath giuen foure poundes yearelie, and for euer: so that we may sée in all his procéedings with what mercie he was moued, with what pitie pricked: and finallie, in all respects how godlie giuen. And here by the waie it is to be noted, that whereas it was reported, that he gaue to the hospitall, commonlie called the Sauoie, founded by king Henrie the seuenth, to purchase lands for the behoofe of the said hospitall, one hundred pounds in monie: it is nothing so. For his beneficence towards that hospitall was staid, not thorough anie default in him; but bicause such agréements could not be concluded vpon, as he reasonablie required. Wherefore his contribution that waie ceased, sore (I dare saie) against his godlie will. Thus much I was desired to speake touching that matter, to the intent that nothing but plaine truth might be reported, with the contrarie whereof he was not a little offended.

And although offendors deserue rather to be punished than fauoured, whereupon by politike gouernement it is prouided, that their bodies apprehended, be committed to appointed places of imprisonment: yet this good gentleman remembring that the holie Ghost willeth vs not to withdraw our hand from anie of our brethren in distresse, considering that charitie should not be partiall but indifferent, hath for the releefe of the poore prisoners of the two Counters, of Newgate, of Ludgate, of the Marshalsie, of the Kings Bench, and of the white Lion, dealt verie bountifullie, and discrétlie: giuing vnto the two Counters, six pounds to be paied vnto them both by twentie shillings a moneth: and to the other prisons aboue mentioned, six mattresses a péece, the whole number being two dozen and a halfe. In consideration of which charitable déed, how deepelie they are bound, if they haue anie sparkle of grace, to thanke God for his goodnesse shewed vnto them by the ministerie of this gentleman, all the world maie perceiue.

ceiue. It were iniurie offered, to let slip vnremembred his mindfulnesse of poore maides marriages: and how willing he was to helpe them, it appeareth by his good gift of twentie pounds to be equallie diuided among fortie such in number by equall portions of ten shillings a peece: with this caueat, that these poore maides so to be married, should be of good name and fame: wherein marke how in all his bequests, wisedome is ioined as a yokefellow with his bountie.

Marriage monie for poore maids.

Lastlie, and for conclusion, this discréet gentleman, carried awaie with the zeale of a good conscience, tendering the state of his seruants, left them also at a reasonable good state. For besides their halfe yeares board frelie giuen and granted, he hath béene beneficiall to them in diuerse other respects, which I passe ouer vnremembred. But alas! these sorowfull seruants do not a little lament the losse of so louing a maister. I omit the hundred eight frése gownes readie made, which he bequeathed at his funerall to poore people, both men and women: with the dispersing of the remnant of all his goods after his buriall, where need and reason required. And thus you sée what monuments this gentleman hath left behind him, to beare witnesse to the world of the fruitfulnesse of his faith: which if (as saint James saith) it maie be iudged by works, and that it is a dead and a barren faith which declareth not it selfe by déeds: then the sequele maie be this, that the faith wherewith he (of whome this is written) was indued, sheweth it selfe to be the same faith which is wished, and I would to God were in the heart of euerie christian. As for his religion, it was sound; his profession sincere; his hearing of Gods word, attentiue & diligent; his vse of praier, deuout: in his sickenesse patient, willing to forsake the world, and to be with Christ, in whose faith he died; and lieth intombed in a faire large valt in saint Faiths vnder Paules, this epitaph grauen in braile or copper, fixed vpon his graue stone, comprising a note of our mortalitie:

His loue towards his seruants.

His faith was fruitfull.

As I was, so are ye:
As I am, you shall be:
That I had, that I gaue:
That I gaue, that I haue:
Thus I end all my cost:
That I left, that I lost.

Hitherto concerning maister Lambes almes déeds, wherein thus much hath at large bene spoken for others example, whome as God hath indued with riches: so it were to be wished they would vse them no worse.] The first daie of Maie, after twelue of the clocke in the night, was an earthquake felt in diuerse places of Kent, namelie at Ashford, great Chart, &c: which made the people there to rise out of their beds, and run to the churches, where they called vpon God by earnest praiers to be mercifull vnto them. Of this earthquake one writeth thus. Manie thousands haue heard and commonlie it is reported, that latelie in Kent an other earthquake was séene and felt, and so terriblie and sore the earth did tremble and quake, that it wakened people that soundlie slept, and had like to haue rocked them all asléepe that were awake. So fearefull was the matter, and so dreadfull is the wrath of God in time of visitation, and wicked season of iniquitie. This was a prétie naturall cause: in déed so I thinke. For the naturall diseases of man, and the naughtie filthinesse of the flesh (full of lust and infirmities) caused God for the correction of natures inclination, to make Douer, Sandwich, Canturburie, Gravesend, and sundrie other places trembls and shake.

Castels and ships séene in the aier.

The eighteenth daie of Maie, about one houre before sun setting, diuerse gentlemen of worship, and good credit, riding from Bodman in Cornewall towards Foie, there appeared to their séeming in the northeast, a verie great mist or fog, much like vnto the sea: and the forme of a cloud in the fashion of some great castell, with flags, & streamers thereon as it were standing in the sea, which presentlie vanished awaie. In whose stéed, and nere to the same place, appeared an other cloud which altered into the likenesse of a great argosie, furnished with masts, and other necessaries; and hir sailes séeming full of wind, made hir waie on the southwest of the castell, hauing streamers and flags verie warlike, with two boats at either sterne. There incontinent appeared againe the forme of a castell, and behind the same came following on the southwest side, an other great argosie, furnished as the first. This being past, there appéared three or foure gallies with their masts and flags in warlike sort, hauing boats at their sternes; and thereby appeared other small clouds to the number of twelue, which altered into the proportion of the said castels, and one following an other, as some as ante of them vanished other came in their roms; and this continued the space of an houre. Shortlie after the sights in the aier aforesaid, a worthie Gentleman in the countrie writ to a right good gentleman in the court, that there was séene vpon a downe called Brodwels downe, in Summersetshire, three score personages all clothed in blacke, a furlong in distance from those that beheld them; and after their appearing, and a little while tarieng, they vanished awaie; but immediatlie, an other strange companie in like maner, colour and number appeared in the same place, and they incountered one an other, and so vanished awaie. And the third time appeared that number againe all in bright armour and incountered one an other, and so vanished awaie. Foure honest men which saw it, reporting the same abroad, were examined thereof, before sir George Norton, to whome they sware, that those things they had séene were true, as here before is rehearsed.

Monstrous birth.

Moreouer, it is credible reported of manie honest men, that fiue miles from Blonsdon in Wiltshire, a crie of hounds was heard in the aier, the selfe same daie that the first earthquake was, and the noise was so great that was made, that they séemed three or foure score couples: whereat diuerse tooke their greihounds, thinking some gentlemen had béene a hunting in the chase, and thought to course: yet some of those that went out of their houses, séeing nothing below abroad, looked vpwards to the skies, and there espied in the aier fiue or six hounds perfectlie to be discerned. Now (to saie my fansie) I doubt not but thousands hold these newes for fables inuented for pleasure. But I protest before God and man, I can beléeue a great deale more stranger matter than this, in this strange world: for the people so estrange themselues from God by vsing manie strange fashions, and clapping on new conditions & natures, that except he shew some miracles, his godhead would quickelie be forgotten on earth, and men would beléeue there were no other world but this.

Blasing star.

Sergeants leak.

The thirteenth of June, about six of the clocke in the morning, at Shipwash within the baronie of Bothell in Northumberland, there happened a tempest of lightning and thunder, after the which, on a sudden came a great showre of haile, amongest the which were found stones of diuerse shapes maruelous to behold, as in the likenes of frogs, mattocks, swords, horse shoes, nailes, crosses of diuerse sorts, skuls of dead men, &c. The seuenteenth day of June, in the parish of Blasedon in Yorkshire, after a great tempest of lightning & thunder, a woman of fours score yeares old, named Alice Perrin, was deliuered of an hideous monster, whose head was like vnto a sallet or headpeece, the face like vnto a mans, except the mouth, which was round and small, like vnto the mouth of a moale, the fore part of the bodie like to a man, hauing eight legs not vnlike an other, and a taile halfe a yard long. Which monster brought into the world, besides an admiration of the diuine works of God, an astonishment at his iudgements: But of these we may saie as a stranger said sometime vpon the like occasion of prodigies and wonders successiuelie insuing, not without weightie signification; to wit, that such things be as tales told to the deafe, verie few weieng in their minds the meaning & effect of strange accidents, and therfore thinke vpon nothing lesse than a reformation of their wicked life: for the which things sake God sendeth these and manie such significant warnings, before he taketh the rod in hand, and whippeth vs till we smart: we then not looking to the meanes that prouoke this vengeance, as willing to auoid them: but murmuring at the iust iudge, vnder whose heauie hand we grone, & charging him to be the author of all misfortunes falling vpon vs: which Homer trulie seemeth right well to haue noted in this sense:

Souldiors transported into Ireland.

About the eightéenth daie of Julie, the lord Grete tooke his voiage towards Ireland as lord deputie thereof, after whom was sent diuerse bands of lustie souldiors, both horsemen and footmen, vnder the leading of expert captens, of whose prosperous and happie successe against their enimies, the Irish and others, diuerse pamflets haue beene published, & matter more at large is set downe in the historie of Ireland. The three and twentith of September, at fennie Stanton in Huntingtonshire, one Agnis wife to William Linsete was deliuered of an vglie and strange monster, with a face blacke, the necke red, mouth and eies like a lion, on the fore head a roll of flesh that might be turned vp with ones finger, on the hinder part of the head a lumpe of flesh proportioned like a feather, being hollow, with one eare growing on the lower part of the cheeke, his bellie big and hard, the armes big, hauing fiue fingers and a thumbe on either hand, and in place of toes on the left foot fiue fingers and a thumbe, on the right foot a thumbe and seuen fingers, & in the place of priuitie the shape both of male & female: a strange sight to be seene, and I feare, signifieth our monstrous life, which God for his mercie giue vs grace to amend, without procrastination or putting off from daie to daie, as the poet significantlie saith:

Monstrous birth.

Blasing star.

The eight daie of October, immediatlie after the new mone, there appeared a blasing star in the south, bushing toward the east, which was nightlie seene (the aier being cleere) more than two moneths.

Sergeants feast.

The eightéenth of October were made eight sergeents at law, to wit, William Fletwood recorder of London, Edward Flowerdue, Thomas Snag, William Periam, Robert Halton, John Clench, John Pickering, Thomas Warmsleie; maister Snag before named was sicke, and therefore was sworne in his chamber at Greies inne, the other seuen were sworne at Westminster, and held their feast at the new Temple at London.

Proclamation against the familie of loue.

The queenes maiestie being informed, that in sundrie places of this realme, certeine persons secretlie taught damnable heresies, contrarie to diuers principall articles of our beleefe and christian faith, who to colour their sect named themselues the familie of loue, and then as manie as were allowed by them to be of that familie to be elect and saued, and all others of what church soeuer they be; take reiected and damned. And for that vpon conuenting of some of them before the bishops ordinaries, it was found that the ground of their sect is maintained by certeine olde, heretical, and seditious books, first made in the Dutch tong, and lastlie translated into English, and printed beyond the seas, & secretlie brought ouer into the realme, the author whereof they name Hull. &c. And confirming also it is found, that their seruaries hold opinion, that they may forsweare anie iudiciall or ecclesiasticall or temporall, or anie other person, not being professed to be of their sect, by oth or otherwise vse anie thing for their aduantage: & as though many of them are well knowne to be teachers and spreaders abroad of these dangerous and damnable sects; yet by their alone confession they can not be condemned. Therefore her maiestie being verie sorie to see so great an euill, by maisters of the diuell to be brought into this hir realme, and by hir bishops and ordinaries the vnderstandeth it verie requisit, not onelie to haue those dangerous heresies and sects to be seuerelie punished; but that also all other meanes be vsed by hir maiesties rot all authorities, which is giuen hir of God to defend Christs church, to root them out from further infecting of hir realme: she hath thought meet and conuenient, and so by hir proclamation commandeth, that all hir officers and ministers temporall shall in all their seuerall vocations assist the bishops of hir realme, and all other person to search out all persons vnlie suspected, to be either teachers or professors of the foresaid damnable sects, and by all good meanes to proceed seuerelie against them, being found culpable by order of the lawes ecclesiasticall or temporall: and that all search be made in all places suspected, for the books and writings maintaining the said heresies and sects, and them to destroie and burne, &c: as more at large may appeare by the said proclamation, giuen at Richmond the third of October, and proclamed at London on the nineteenth daie of the same moneth.

The queenes maiesties purpose to root out this pestilent sect.

Victorie against the Irish and other in Ireland.

About this time there arriued vpon the west coast of Ireland, a certeine companie of Italians and Spaniards, sent by the pope to the aid of the earle of Desmond in his rebellion, which fortified themselues stronglie nere vnto Smerwike, in a fort which they called castell del Oro, there erecting the popes banner against hir maiestie. Which when the lord Grete of Wilton deputie of Ireland vnderstood, he marched thitherward, and on the first of Nouember, hearing of the arriuall of the Swift, the Tigre, the Aid, the Merlion, & other of the queenes maiesties ships, and also of three barks fraughted from Corke and Limerike with victels, on the morrow after marched towards the fort, vnto the which he gaue so hot an assault, that on the ninth of Nouember the same was yeelded, all the Irishmen and women hanged, and more than foure hundred Spaniards, Italians, and Biscaies put to the sword; the colonell, captens, secretarie, and others, to the number of twentie saued for ransome. In which fortresse was found good store of monie, bisket, bacon, oile, wine, and diuerse other prouisions of victels sufficient for their companie for halfe a yeare, besides armour, powder, shot, and other furniture for two thousand men and vpwards.

Anno reg. 23. Randoll hanged for coniuring.

The eight and twentith daie of Nouember were arreigned in the kings bench, William Randoll for coniuring to know where treasure was hid in the earth, and goods feloniouslie taken were become; Thomas Elks, Thomas Lupton, Rafe Spacie, and Christopher Waddington, for being present, aiding, and procuring the said Randoll to the coniuration aforesaid Randoll, Elks, Spacie, and Mandington were found guiltie, & had iudgement to be hanged: Randoll was executed, the other were reprieued. About the 24 of December in the towne of Walkham in the countie of Suller, a child of eleuen yeers old, named William Withers, late in a trance for the space of tendaies without anie sustenance, and at the last comming to himselfe he vttered to the standers by manie strange speaches, inueieng against pride, couetousnesse, coldnesse of charitie, and other outragious sins. To behold this child there resorted diuerse godlie & zelous preachers, as also knights, esquiers, & gentlemen, all of them hearing and seeing that which was wonderfull. And among others that came thither, there was a gentleman of great credit and worship, with certeine of his men to heare and behold the child: who hauing espied a seruingman that had béene there with his maister two times, whom he had sharplie tawnted for his great and monstrous ruffes, spake vnto him verie vehementlie, and told him that it were better for him to put on sackecloth and mourne for his sinnes, than in such abhominable pride to prancke vp himselfe like the diuels darling, the verie father of pride and lieng: who sought by the exercise of that damnable sinne to make himselfe a preie to euerlasting torments in hellfire. Wherevpon the seruingman, as one pricked in conscience, sore sorowed and wept for his offense, rent the band from his necke, tooke a knife and cut it in peeces, and vowed neuer to weare the like againe. This for the strangenesse thereof will be condemned as a lie, specially of vnbeléeuers and peruers worldlings, whose hearts are so hardened, that they will not beléeue though one rise from the dead, or though God should speake vnto them from heauen (as the poet noteth truelie) which he hath done in times past:

Ab. Harc. in R. L.

About the twelfe daie of Januarie proclamation was published at London, for reuocation of sundrie the quéenes maiesties subiects remaining beyond the seas vnder colour of studie, and yet liuing contrarie to the lawes of God, and of the realme: and also against the reteining of Iesuits and massing priests, sowers of sedition, and other treasonable attempts, &c. The thirteenth of Januarie a man was drawne to saint Thomas of Waterings, and there hanged, headed, and quartered, for begging by a licence wherevnto the quéenes hand was counterfeited.

Against Iesuits and massing priests.

One executed for counterfeiting the quéenes hand.

On the sixteenth daie of Januarie, the lords and barons of this realme began to sit in the parlement house at Westminster: and on the twentith daie of Januarie the quéenes maiestie went from White hall to the parlement house by water. Whereas a great chalenge of iusts was signified by waie of deuise before hir maiestie on Twelfe night last past, to haue bene performed the fifteenth daie of Januarie, hir maiesties pleasure was for diuerse considerations the same should be deferred vntill the two and twentith daie of the same moneth; on which daie the same was most courageouslie accomplished in the accustomed place at Westminster, where manie staues were valiantlie broken; but through the great concourse of people thither repairing, manie of the beholders, as well men as women, were sore hurt, some maimed, and some killed, by falling of the scaffolds ouercharged.

Parlement at Westminster.

Iusting at Westminster.

This yeare about Hallowntide last past, in the marishes of Danesete hundred, in a place called Southminster, in the countie of Esser, a strange thing happened. There suddenlie appeered an infinite multitude of mice, which ouerwhelming the whole earth in the said marishes, did sheare and gnaw the grasse by the roots, spoiling & tainting the same with their venemous teeth: in such sort that the cattell which grazed thereon were smitten with a murreine and died thereof. Which vermins by policie of man could not be destroied, till now at the last it came to passe, that there flocked together all about the same marishes such a number of owles, as all the shire was not able to yeeld, whereby the marsh holders were shortlie deliuered from the vexation of the said mice.

Mice deuoure the grasse in Danesete hundred.

This yeare (against the comming of certeine commissioners out of Fraunce into England) by hir maiesties appointment, on the six and twentith date of March in the morning (being Easter date) a banketting house was begun at Westminster, on the south west side of hir maiesties palace of White hall, made in maner and forme of a long square, three hundred thirtie and two foot in measure about; thirtie principals made of great masts, being fortie foot in length a peece, standing vpright; betweene euerie one of these masts ten foot asunder and more. The walles of this house were closed with canuas, and painted all the outsides of the same most artificiallie with a worke called rusticke, much like to stone. This house had two hundred ninetie and two lights of glasse. The sides within the same house was made with ten heights of degrées for people to stand vpon: and in the top of this house was wrought most cunninglie vpon canuas, works of iuie and hollie, with pendents made of wicker rods, and garnished with baie, rue, and all maner of strange flowers garnished with spangles of gold, as also beautified with hanging toseans made of hollie and iuie, with all maner of strange fruits, as pomegranats, orenges, pompions, cucumbers, grapes, carrets, with such other like, spangled with gold, and most richlie hanged. Betwixt these works of baies and iuie, were great spaces of canuas, which was most cunninglie painted, the clouds with starres, the sunne and sunne beames, with diuerse other cotes of sundrie sorts belonging to the quéenes maiestie, most richlie garnished with gold. There were of all maner of persons working on this house, to the number of three hundred seuentie and fiue: two men had mischances, the one brake his leg, and so did the other. This house was made in three weeks and three daies, and was ended the eighteenth daie of Aprill; and cost one thousand seuen hundred fortie and foure pounds, nine téene shillings and od monie; as I was credible informed by the worshipfull maister Thomas Graue surueior vnto hir maiesties workes, who serued and gaue order for the same, as appeareth by record.

On the sixteenth daie of Aprill arriued at Douer these noblemen of France (commissioners from the French king to hir maiestie) Francis of Burbon prince dolphin of Auergne, Arthur Costaie marshall of France, Lodouic Lusignian lord of Laneoc, Tauergius Caercongin countie of Tillir, Bertrand Salignacus lord Pot Fenelon, monsieur Panassour, Barnabie Brissen president of the parlement of Paris, Claud Pinart, monsieur Marchmont, monsieur Verais; these came from Graues end by water to London, where they were honorably receiued and interteined; and shortlie after being accompanied of the nobilitie of England, they repaired to the court and banketting house prepared for them at Westminster, as is afore said, where hir maiestie with amiable countenance & great courtesie receiued them: and afterward in that place most royallie feasted & banketted them. Also the nobles & gentlemen of the court, desirous to shew them all courtesie possible poſſible fitteſt for ſuch eſtates, and to ſport them with all courtlie pleaſure, agréed among them to prepare a triumph, which was verie quicklie concluded: and being deuiſed in moſt ſumptuous order, was by them performed in as valiant a manner to their endleſſe fame and honor. The chiefe or chalengers in theſe attempts were theſe: the earle of Arundell, the lord Windſore, maiſter Philip Sidneie, and maiſter Fulke Greuill, who calling themſelues the foure foſter children of deſire, made their inuention of the foreſaid triumph in order and forme following.

The excellent inuention of the triumph.

The gallerie or place at the end of the tiltyard adioining to hir maieſties houſe at Whitehall, wher as hir perſon ſhould be placed, was called and not without cauſe, The caſtell or fortreſſe of perfect beautie, for as much as hir highneſſe ſhould be there included; whereto the ſaid foſter children laid title and claime as their due by deſcent to belong vnto them. And vpon deniall or anie repulſe from that their deſired patrimonie, they vowed to vanquiſh and conquer by force who ſo ſhould ſéeme to withſtand it. For the accompliſhing whereof they ſent their challenge or firſt defiance to the quéenes maieſtie: which was vttered by a boie on ſundaie the ſixteenth of Aprill laſt, as hir maieſtie came from the chappell, who being apparelled in red and white, as a martiall meſſenger of Deſires foſtered children, without making anie preciſe reuerence at all, vttered theſe ſpéches of defiance from his maiſters to hir maieſtie, the effect whereof inſueth.

The firſt dait of challenge.

O ladie, that doeſt intitle the titles you poſſeſſe with the honor of your worthineſſe, rather crowning the great crowne you hold, with the fame to haue ſo excelling an owner, than you receiuing to your ſelfe anie increaſe, keeping that outward ornament: vouchſafe with patient attention to heare the words which I by commandement am here to deliuer you, wherein if your ears (vſed to the thankeſgiuing of your people & the due praiſes of the earth) ſhall féele a ſtatelie diſdaine to heare once the ſound of a defie, yet dare I warrant my ſelfe ſo far vpon the replie & deceiuing ſhew of rare Beautie, as that malice can not fall from ſo faire a mind vpon the ſealie meſſenger, whoſe mouth is a ſeruant to others direction. Know yée therefore alonelie princeſſe, that herby (for far off they are neuer) there lies incamped the foure long hapleſſe, now hopefull foſtered children of Deſire: who hauing béene a great while nouriſhed vp with that infectiue milke, and too too much care of their fierie foſterer (though full oft that drie nurſſe deſpaire indeuored to weine them from it) being now as ſtrong in that nurture, as they are weake in fortune, incouraged with the valiant counſell of neuer fainting Deſire, and by the ſame aſſured, that by right of inheritance euen from euer, the fortreſſe of beautie doth belong to hir foſtered children: laſtlie, finding it blazed by all tongs, ingraued in all hearts, and proued by all eies, that this fortreſſe built by nature is ſeated in this realme: theſe foure I ſaie and ſaie againe, thus nouriſhed, thus animated, thus intituled, and thus informed, do will you by me, euen in the name of iuſtice, that you will no longer exclude vertuous Deſire from perfect Beautie. Whereto if you yéeld (O yéeld for ſo all reaſon requireth) then haue I no more to ſaie, but reioiſe that my ſaiengs haue obteined ſo rightfull and yet ſo bliſſefull a requeſt. But if (alas but let not that be needfull) Beautie be accompanied with diſdainefull pride, and pride waighted on by refuſing crueltie; then muſt I denounce vnto you (woo is me, anſwer before it be denounced) that they determine by requeſt to accompliſh their claime. And bicauſe they will better teſtifie to the world, they haue bin brought vp vnder the wings of honorable Deſire, this honorable forewarning they ſend you, that vpon the foure and twentith daie of this moneth of Aprill they will beſiege that fatall fortreſſe, vowing not to ſpare (if this obſtinacie continue) the ſword of faithfulnes, and the fire of affection. Now if ſo it fall out, the worthie knights of your court (moued with paſſion in themſelues) diſdaine of my ſenders boldneſſe, or partiall liking (which I moſt doubt) to the maieſtie of your eies, will either bid them battell before they approch, or ſuffering them to approch, will after labour to leuie the ſiege; they proteſt to meet them in what ſort they will chooſe, wiſhing onelie it may be performed before your diuine eies, whome they know as euen in iudgement as dauntie in chooſing: where if ſo they liſt, firſt at the tilt in ſo manie courſes, as your ſelfe ſhall pleaſe to appoint; and then if anie will call them to the courſe of the field with lance and ſword, they hope to giue ſuch true proofes of their valour, as at leſt ſhall make their deſires more noble. Vowing on the other ſide, that if before the night part the fraie, they do not ouercome all them that come in againſt them, they will yéeld themſelues ſlaues vnto you for euer. This therefore O quéene (greater in that you are quéene of your ſelfe, than in paſſing the whole compaſſe of the earth) haue I deliuered my charge, not as a challenge to your knights, againſt whome (but in ſo ſuit a cauſe) they acknowledge themſelues vnable to match the meaneſt; but as a plaine proclamation of war, vnles the fortres of Beautie, that hath wone ſo manie to loſe themſelues, be ſpéedilie ſurrendered. And now it ſhall be ſéene what knights you haue, whome Beautie may draw to reſiſt a rightfull title. And I for my poore part moued by that I ſée in you (though I ſerue your enimies) will dailie praie that all men may ſée you, & then you ſhall not feare anie armes of aduerſaries: or if enimies you muſt haue, that either they may haue the mind of them that ſend me, or their fortune in that they haue long deſired.

The challenge made and how to be tried.

The fortreſſe of Beautie.

At which daie aboueſaid for certeine vrgent occaſions, the ſaid challenge and triumph, by hir maieſties commandement, was deferred till the firſt daie of Maie: at which daie for like cauſes it was further deferred till the next mondaie following, being the eight daie of Maie: and ſo till Whitſun mondaie, when they firſt began to performe it. The ſaid daie being come, the foure foſter children had made preparation to beſiege the fortreſſe of Beautie, and thereto had prouided a frame of wood, which was couered with canuas, and painted outwardlie in ſuch excellent order, as if it had bin verie naturall earth or mould, and caried the name of a rowling trench, which went on wheeles, which waie ſoeuer the perſons within did driue it. Vpon the top whereof was placed two cannons of wood, ſo paſſing well coloured as they ſéemed to be in déed two faire field peeces of ordinances, and by them was placed two men for gunners clothed in crimſon ſarcenet, with their baſkets of earth for defenſe of their bodies by them. And alſo there ſtood on the top of the trench an enſigne bearer in the ſame ſute with the gunners, diſplaieng his enſigne, and within the ſaid trench was cunninglie conueied diuerſe kind of moſt excellent muſike againſt the caſtell of Beautie. Theſe things thus all in a readineſſe, the challengers approched, & came from the ſtable toward the tiltyard, one after another in braue & excellent order as followeth.

Urgent cauſes why the challenge was deferd.

The order of the rowling trench with moſt excellent inuentions.

First, the earle of Arundell entred the tiltyard, all in gilt and ingrauen armour, with capariſons and furniture richlie and brauelie imbrodered, hauing attendant vpon him two gentlemen vshers, foure pages riding on foure ſpare horſſes, and twentie of his gentlemen. All which aforeſaid were apparelled in ſhort cloakes and venetian hoſe of crimſon velvet, laid with gold lace, doublets of yellow ſattin, hats of crimſon velvet with gold bands and yellow feathers, and yellow ſilke ſtockes. Then had he ſix trumpetters that ſounded before him, and one and thirtie yeomen that waited after him apparelled in caſſocke coats, and venetian hoſe of crimſon velvet, laid on with red ſilke and gold lace, doublets of yellow taffatie, hats of crimſon taffatie, with yellow feathers, and yellow worſted ſtockings.

The lord Windſors entrie the firſt daie and his attendants.

After him proceeded the lord Windſore, in gilt and ingraven armour, with capariſons and furniture, richlie imbrodered with gold, having attendant on him foure pages riding on foure ſpare horſſes, and foure and twentie gentlemen, all apparelled in ſhort cloaks of ſcarlet, lined throughout with orange tawnie taffatie, and laid about with ſilver lace, doublets of orange tawnie ſattin, venetian hoſe of orange tawnie velvet, blacke velvet caps, with ſilver bands and white feathers, and ſilvered rapiers and daggers, with ſcabbards of blacke velvet; foure trumpetters, and two footmen in caſſocke coats and venetian hoſe of orange tawnie velvet, and blacke velvet caps with ſilver bands and white feathers, foure groomes of his ſtable leading of his foure horſſes, in caſſocke coats and venetian hoſe of orange tawnie taffatie and orange tawnie felts with ſilver bands, and white feathers. Then had he three ſcore yeomen in coats of orange tawnie cloth, with the unicorne of ſilver plate on their ſleeves, and orange tawnie felts with ſilver bands and white feathers.

M. Sidneis entrie, now ſir Philip Sidneie and his attendants.

Then proceeded maiſter Philip Sidnete, in verie ſumptuous maner, with armour part blew, and the reſt gilt and ingraven, with foure ſpare horſſes, having capariſons and furniture verie rich and coſtlie, as ſome of cloth of gold imbrodered with pearle, and ſome imbrodered with gold and ſilver feathers, verie richlie and cunninglie wrought: he had foure pages that rode on his foure ſpare horſſes, who had caſſocke coats, and venetian hoſe all of cloth of ſilver, laied with gold lace, and hats of the ſame with gold bands and white feathers, and ech one a paire of white buſkins. Then had he a thirtie gentlemen and yeomen, & foure trumpetters, who were all in caſſocke coats and venetian hoſe of yelow velvet, laied with ſilver lace, yelow velvet caps with ſilver bands and white fethers, and everie one a paire of white buſkins; and they had vpon their coats, a ſcrowle or band of ſilver, which came ſcarſe wiſe ouer the ſhoulder, and ſo downe vnder the arme, with this poeſie, or ſentence written vpon it, both before and behind, Sic nos non nobis.

M. Fulke Greuils entrie with his traine of attendants.

Then came maiſter Fulke Greuill, in gilt armour, with rich and faire capariſons and furniture, having foure ſpare horſſes with foure pages riding vpon them, and foure trumpetters ſounding before him, and a twentie gentlemen and yeomen attending vpon him, who with the pages and trumpetters were all apparelled in loſe ierkins of tawnie taffatie, cut and lined with yelow ſarſenet, and laied with gold lace, and cut downe the arme and ſet with lopes and buttons of gold, venetian hoſe of the ſame lined (as aforeſaid) laied with gold lace downe the ſide with lopes and buttons of gold, with ech a paire of yelow worſted ſtockings, and hats of tawnie taffetie with gold bands and yelow feathers. Having thus all entered the tiltyard, they proceeded on with the rowling trench before them, which ſtaied againſt the queene, and they paſſed by, as though they would behold the Fortreſſe of beautie, and ſo went about the tilt. At laſt the boie that vttered the firſt defiance pronounced theſe ſpeeches to hir maieſtie.

The ſecond defie or challenge.

If the meſſage latelie delivered vnto you had beene beleeved and followed (O queene) in whome the whole ſtorie of vertus is written, with the language of beautie; nothing ſhould this violence haue needed in your inuiolate preſence. Your eies, which till now haue beene onelie wont to diſcerne the bowed knees of kneeling hearts, and inwardlie turned, found alwaies the heauenlie peace of a ſweet mind, ſhould not now haue their faire beames reflected with the ſhining of armour, ſhould not now be driuen to ſee the furie of deſire, nor the fierie force of furie. But ſith ſo it is (alas that ſo it is) that in the defenſe of obſtinate refuſall there neuer groweth victorie but by compaſſion; they are come: what need I ſaie more, you ſee them, readie in hart as you know, and able with hands as they hope, not onelie to aſſailing but to prevailing. Perchance you deſpiſe the ſmalneſſe of number. I ſaie vnto you, the force of deſire goeth not by fulneſſe of companie. Rate rather view with what vnreſiſtable determination themſelues approch, and how not onelie the heauens ſend their inuiſible inſtrument to aid them: but alſo the verie earth the dulleſt of all the elements, which with naturall heauineſſe ſtill ſtriues to the ſlaepie centre; yet for aduancing his enterprize is content actiuelie (as you ſhall ſee) to moue it ſelfe vpon it ſelfe to riſe vp in height, that it maie the better command the high and highminded fortreſſes. Manie words, when deeds are in the field, are tedious both vnto the ſpeaker and hearer. You ſee their forces, but know not their fortunes; if you be reſolued, it boots not, and threats dread not. I haue diſcharged my charge, which was euen when all things were readie for the aſſault, then to offer partlie a thing not ſo much vnuſed as gratious in beſiegers. You ſhall now be ſummoned to yeeld, which if it be reiected, then looke for the affectionat alarme to be followed with deſirous aſſault. The time approcheth for their approches, but no time ſhall take me from wiſhing, that howſoeuer this ſucceed, the world maie long inioie hir chiefeſt ornament, which decks it with hir ſelfe, and hir ſelfe with the loue of goodneſſe.

Which ſpeech being ended, the rowling trench or mount of earth was moued as neere the queenes maieſtie as might be, which being ſetled, the muſike plaied verie pleaſantlie, and one of the boies being then accompanied with cornets, ſummoned the fortreſſe with this delectable ſong, here vnder noted.

The shooting off of the two canons, the one with sweet water, and the other with sweet powder.

Which ended, the two canons were shot off, the one with sweet powder, and the other with sweet water, verie odoriferous and pleasant, and the noise of the shooting was verie excellent consent of melodie within the mount. And after that was store of prette scaling ladders, and the footmen threw floures and such fansies against the wals, with all such deuises as might seeme fit shot for desire. All which did continue till time the defendants came in.

The maner of the defendants coming in.

Then came in the defendants in most sumptuous maner, with euerie one his seruants, pages, and trumpetters (hauing some more, some lesse) in such order as I haue here vnder placed them, with euerie one his sundrie inuention, which for that some of them be mysticall and not knowne to manie, I omit therefore for breuities sake to speake of anie. Yet such speeches as were spoken or presented for them to hir maiestie, so manie as were, or at the least as I could come by, I haue here in their order placed them, whereby their inuentions for whome they were spoken, are therein plainelie declared. Therefore I referre you to the reading of them hereafter. But thus the defendants entered the tiltyard, one after an other as followeth. First maister Henrie Greie, sir Thomas Perot, maister Anthonie Coke, maister Thomas Ratcliffe, maister Henrie Knolles, maister William Knolles, maister Robert Knolles, maister Francis Knolles, maister Rafe Bowes, maister Thomas Kelwaie, maister George Goring, maister William Tresham, maister Robert Alexander, maister Edward Dennie, maister Hercules Meautus, maister Edward Moze, maister Richard Skipwith, maister Richard Ward, maister Edward Digbie, maister Henrie Nowell, maister Henrie Brunkerd. And afterwards in the middest of the running came in sir Henrie Leigh, as vnknowne, and when he had broken his sir staues went out in like maner againe. So passing on one after an other, when sir Thomas Perot & maister Coke came to the end of the tilt, ouer against the quéenes maiestie, one of their pages arraied like an angell vttered these speeches vnto hir.

The speech of sir Thomas Perot and maister Coke to the quéene.

Despaire, no not despaire (most high and happie princesse) could so congeale the frozen knight in the aier, but that desire (ah sweet desire) inforced him to behold the sun on the earth, whereon as he was gazing with twinkling eie (for who can behold such beames stedfastlie?) he begun to dissolue into drops, melting with such delight, that he seemed to preferre the lingering of a certeine death before the lasting of an vncerteine life. Such is the nature of ingrauen loialtie, that it chooseth rather to haue the bodie dissolued, than the mind disliked. Thus consuming with content (a sweet sickenesse is conceipt) and pining with more than speakeable passions, he suddenlie beheld that sun to be besieged which he so deuoutlie serued. Wherewith boiling in no lesse disdaine, than surprised with immoderat pensiuenesse, he vttered these words: O Ioue, if thou meane to resolue nature into contraries; why doo I liue to see it? If into nothing, why doo I liue at all? If the foot scale the head, there is no rest; if desire ouershot dutie, there is no reason: and where either of these are, there can be no rule. And so setting more sighs than maie be numbred by ciphers, this present time (ah griefe) this present time, that honest & faire hearted frozen knight died (what said I) euen that which againe with griefe I must say died, whose ghost making spéedie passage into the Elisian fields (for what more swift than a soule) in the midst of the infernall multitude, with schéeches, cries & clamors made both heauen & hell to redouble this echo: O times, O men, O corruption of ma-

By the sun is meant hir maiestie, called before The fortresse of beautie.

ners! The sun is besieged, the sun (O mischiefe) the sun is besieged. Which strange and vnacquainted termes caused not onelie murmuring amongst the ghosts beneath, but a musing amongst the gods aboue: who as well to represse the tumults, which might haue risen among the shadows, as to reuenge the pride which began to grow on the earth, sent downe an angell with this commandement; Go descend, and cause Adam and Eue to appeare on the earth in that sort as they were in paradise, that the world may know them & wonder at them. For seeing out of their loines haue issued those preposterous limmes, I know none more fit to correct them. Certes none more willing. They will attempt anie thing for thy sake, and seruice of that earthlie, and yet (O strange conceipt) most heauenlie sun. For as they were before driuen from their desire, bicause they desired to know the best: so now shall they be driuen vnto their desire, which they couet to honour most. This shall be their reward, they shall come neére and yet shall not search, and be they farre off, it shall warme. A cloud maie sometimes barre their sight, but nothing shall depriue them of the safegard: yet command them to be humble in affection, though feruent, least they séeme to disdaine that pride in others which they desire themselues.

Sir Thomas Perot & maister Coke were both in like armour beset with apples and fruit, the one signifieng Adam & the other Eue, who had haire hang all downe his helmet.

The sun in the highest delighteth in the shadow which is shortest, nourisheth the tree whose root groweth depest, not whose top springeth loftiest. This commission and counsell ended, all things were in a moment accomplished with such celeritie (for to the gods time is tied) that they were sped so sone as they were spoken. And now most renowmed and diuine sun, Adam and Eue being present, vouchsafe to heare somwhat in their behalfs pronounced. Sir knights, if in besieging the sunne ye vnderstood what you had vndertaken, ye would not destroie a common blessing for a priuat benefit. Will you subdue the sun? Who shall rest in the shadow where the wearie take breath, the disquiet rest and all comfort? Will ye bereue all men of those glistering & gladsome beams? What shall then prosper in the shining, but you will clime it by the rales? O rare exhalations! Brothers you may be to desire, but sons ye are to ill hap, which thinke you can not sinke deepe inough into the sea, vnlesse you take your fall from the sun. Desist you knights, desist, sith it is impossible to resist: content your selues with the sunnes indifferent succor, suffer the iuniper shrub to grow by the loftie oke, and clame no prerogatiue where the sun grants no priuilege; for being of the same mettall that others are, the sun will worke the like effects, as she doth in others. The giants would haue bin gods, if they could haue scaled the heauens; and you no lesse than stars could you conquer the same: but as their throwing hill vpon hill did manifest their pride, but nothing further their pretense; so your laieng chalenge vpon claime, and conquest vpon chalenge, may well proue a will but no worthinesse; a desire to reach, but no possibilitie to recouer. In which your soaring assaies if you chance to fall, the only comfort you haue is to crie with Phaeton, Magnis excidimus ausis. But if no persuasions may moue your minds, know yée proud knights, there are that haue hearts as big as mounteins, and as far aboue you in prowesse as ye are aboue all in presumption, yet not so vaine (which ye terme valiant) to assalt the sun. And whie? bicause it is impregnible. We content to inioie the light, yée to eclipse it; we to rest vnder the feet, yée to run ouer the head; we to yéeld to that which nothing can conquer, you to conquer that which maketh all men captiues. But were it possible that head could deuise, courage attempt, or hand execute anie thing that might shew the depth of our vnspotted loialtie, sone should be seene (and for your selues to some) that your enterprises should be of as small account then, as now they are of likelihood; so deepe an impression is ingrauen in our thoughts, for the maiestie of that sun which now perling our eies hath fullie subdued our hearts, that we are prest in hir defense to offer the whole world defiance. In proofe whereof I am charged to throw downe this gantlet, which who so dareth take vp, shall feele both the heat of their iust conceiued quarrell, and the reproch of their owne deserued follie, not by riding in breaking a few staues to end the strife, but at tourneie, or what else soeuer they can deuise, or dare aduenture to win the benefit of Beautie. Thus most renowmed & diuine Beautie, whose beams shine like the sun, haue Adam & Eue aduentured to defend the sun. The same I call Beautie the light of the world, the maruell of men, the mirrour of nature, on which their incounter if those fauourable gleames may fall, they will not onlie thinke to haue done good herein, but to be restored againe to paradise. The one meaneth to repose his trust in a woman, who like Eue cannot be beguiled, the other to rest on a saint which by a serpent will not be tempted. Thus being placed in the garden of your graces, O of all things most gratious, where vertues grow as thicke as leaues did in paradise, they will take heede to tast of the forbidden fruit, contented to behold, not coueting to take hold. And for that it hath beene long argued, and no arguing can end, whether the first offense came by the crudelitie of Adam, or the simplicitie of Eue; the one defending his fault by sound arguments, the other excusing hirs by sharpe answers: they most humblie sue for this, that either by six courses betweene them the quarrell may be ended, or by your highnesse peremptorie sentence determined. For they both being in the world, are desirous that one might beare the blame of both. And what herein your excellencie shall set downe, there is none shall gainesaie; for whensoeuer the question shall be moued, no other reason shall be allowed or liked than this; Elizabetha dixit. This speach being thus ended, sir Thomas Perot and maister Cooke proceeded backward on the other side of the tilt. And when maister Ratclife came likewise against the queene, one of his pages pronounced these speeches in his masters behalfe to hir maiestie.

M. Ratclifs speech to the queene.

So manie were the misfortunes (most renowned and beautifull princesse) of the desolate knight my master, as neither the shortnesse of the time will suffer me to repeat, nor the greatnesse of the mysterie to remember. But let this suffice, that some there were and so manifold, that geometrie whereon the bodie of man hangeth could not beare being intollerable, nor the mind which consisteth in arithmetike number being infinit. Thus alwaies crossed by fortune, whose crossing is no blessing, he determined to separate himselfe as far from societie, as his actions were from succesle; who wandering through manie deserts, yet finding as he thought no place desolate, happened at the last to come to a cliffe adioining to the maine sea, couered all with mosse, whereon he was walking: much delighted with the solitarie seat, but not well liking the cold situation, he suddenlie sunke into a hollow vault, surprised at the first with feare, but seeing it at the last a place of succour, he accounted his former miseries meetlie appeased by this present fortune. In this den he vsed for his bed mosse, for his candle mosse, for his ceeling mosse, and vnlesse now and then a few coales, mosse for his meat: a drie sod God wot and a fresh, but so moistened with wet teares, and so salt, that hard it was to coniecture, whether it were better to feed or to fast. Here he gaue himselfe to continuall meditation, separating his mind from his bodie, his thought from his hart, yea diuorcing himselfe from himselfe, in so much that with his strange diet and new conceits he became so inchanted, that neither the remembrance of others, nor a thought touching himselfe could enter into his mind: an alteration seldome heard of, that the place whereas he was throwded in, should make him to forget who he is. Liuing thus a long time, for that no lim should seeme short, rising according to his maner to walke in the mosse in the grisping of the day, he espied vpon the shore certeine men either cast awaie by shipwracke, or ouer bord by pirates, vnto whome he went; and perceiuing by their plaints one which laie dead amongst them to be their master, inquired whense they were: But they not willing to repeat their misfortunes, opened the bosome of the gentleman, and pulled out a scroll conteining a claime, a challenge, naie a conquest of Beautie. At the sight whereof, suddenlie (quoth he) Beautie! and therewithall appalled pansed, entring by litle and litle out of his present melancholies into his former misfortunes, who as one awaked out of a long dreame began thus to debate. O Beautie, where thy fortresse is founded I know, but what these brethren should meane I maruell; for as I am assured that to win thée none could be so fortunate, so did I thinke that to claime thée none could be so fond; when as thou O diuine Beautie art of eurie one to be desired, but neuer to be conquered of Desire. But as the eagle beholding the sunne, coueteth to build hir nest in the same, and so dimmeth hir sight: so they bewing the brightnesse of Beautie ars incensed to conquere it by Desire. And what then? Bicause she is inuincible shall I be indifferent? No, I will forsake this caitife cottage, and will take arms to defend that Beauties castell. Nothing shall remoue me from mine attempt, which being performed, nothing can moue me. Yea but she hath seruants alreadie a number; I but vnles I be there, not the whole number: but manie were famous, but none more faithfull: yet alas, if thou go, thou shalt euer be infortunat: better alwaies infortunat, than once disloiall. Which words being ended, he demanded whether they would in like case aduenture with one of no lesse courage than their master, but certenlie of greter affection: whose seruice he hauing vpon small intreatie obteined, for that belike they were desirous to see the euent for the which they had suffered such aduentures, he departed to his cave, hewing a shield out of the hard cliffe inriched onelie with soft mosse: a double signe of his desire, thinking that nothing could manifest Beautie so well as Pythagoras walnut, a tender rine and a hard shell. And now most excellent and diuine Beautie, diuine it must néeds be that worketh so heauenlie, sith he is called from his solitarie caue to your sumptuous court, from bondage to libertie, from a liuing death to a neuer dieng life, and all for the sake and seruice of Beautie: vouchsafe his shield, which is the ensigne of your fame, to be the instrument of his fortune. And for prostrating himselfe to your feet, he is here readie prest to aduenture anie aduentures for your gratious fauour.

Which speech being ended, he retired backe as the rest. And after him came the foure sonnes of sir Francis Knolles, one after an other, according to their age, and all in like armour: who comming to the end of the tilt, staied till these speeches were vttered by one of their pages, who being apparelled like vnto Mercurie, pronounced these speeches in the knights behalfes to hir maiestie.

lesse beautie, and that the chiefest champions of this most famous enterprise are foure of fansies fellowes, fosterbrothers to desire, and drie nurst by despaire, valiant knights, and honorable personages, whose hautie hearts deserue renowme at least, for venturing to win the golden fleece without Medeas helpe. The giants long ago did scale the clouds men sate, in hope to win the fort of Iupiter. The wanton youth, whose waren wings did trie with soaring vp aloft, had scapt vnscorcht if he had kept a meaner gale below. So falles it out in this attempt, desire vaunts to conquer Beauties fort by force, wherein the goddesse keepes continuallie watch and ward, so that desire may despaire to win one inch of hir against hir will. Hir statelie seat is set so high, as that no leuell can be laid against hir walles: and soner may men vndertake to hit a starre with a stone, than to beat hir braue bulworkes by batterie. No vndermining may preuaile, for that hir fort is founded vpon so firme a rocke, as will not stir for either fraud or force. And is there anie hope to win by famine such a fort as yelds continuall food to all hir foes? And though they fed not fat therwith, yet must they either feed thereon or fast: for Beautie is the onlie bait whereon desire bites; and loue the chiefe restoritie that ladie Beautie likes, so that she can no more be left without meat, than men can liue without minds. Of all affections that are, desire is the most worthie to woo, but lest deserues to win Beautie: for in winning his saint, he loseth himselfe: no soner hath desire what he desireth, but that he dieth presentlie: so that when Beautie yeldeth once to desire, then can she neuer vant to be desired againe. Wherfore of force this principle must stand, it is conuenient for desire euer to wish, and necessarie that he alwais want. O rare and most renowmed Beautie, O goddesse to be honored of all, not to be equalled of anie, become not now a prisoner: your fortresse is inuincible. No doubt desire will content himselfe with a fauourable parlee, and wait for grace by loialtie, not chalenge it by lance; although he make neuer so braue. The world doth know that ladie Beautie neds no rescue to raise this siege, for that she sits aboue all reach, hir heauenlie lokes aboue when she so liks can dazell all mens eies. But though she lik not vse those meanes, yet it is meete that all hir seruants come and shew themselues deuout to do hir will: perchance hir pleasure is to see the forts tried of these foure foster friends. O happie, ten times happie they whose hap shall be with fauour of hir destie, to take in hand this braue attempt: in hope whereof these foure legitimate sonnes of despaire, brethren to hard mishap, suckled with sighes, and swathed vp in sorrow, weaned in woo, and drie nurst by desire, long time fostered with fauourable countenance, and fed with sweet fansies, but now of late (alas) wholie giuen ouer to griefe and disgraced by disdaine, are come with readie hearts and hands, to prooue against these other foure, that desire doth not deserue one winke of good fauour from ladie Beauties smiling eies, for threatning to win hir fort by force. They doubt not the victorie, if onelie they may find some like shew from their saint in fauor of their enterprise. If Mercurie haue said amisse, blame those bright beams which haue bereft him of his wit; if well, vouchsafe one becke to bid him packe awaie.

These speeches being ended, both they and the rest marched about the tilt, and so going backe to the nether end thereof prepared themselues to run, euerie one in his turne, each defendant sir courses against the former challengers: who performed their parts so valiantlie on both sides, that their prowesse hath demerited perpetuall memorie, and worthilie won honor both to themselues and their native countrie, as fame hath the same reported. When this daies sport was thus accomplished, the boie that vttered the defiances, in these few speeches toke his good night of the quéne.

The boie that vttered the defiance, in this speech toke his good night of the quéne.

In the triall of this debatefull question (O your selfe) what can be said more than is? You se that séeing begins to faile. Night the ordinarie truce maker, though no truce be treated (if at least your presence make it not lightsome) will wrap all in hir blacke and mourning weeds, perchance mourning, for that the noblest desire hath béene subiect to vndeserued torments: and therefore these knights by the authoritie of darkenes verie vndesirouslie are compelled to depart from whence they came. To conclude, thus much they command me in their names to confesse, that such excellencie they find in your knights, and in comparison of them such vnableneesse in their selues, that if desire did not banish despaire as a traitor out of his kingdome, it would haue alreadie vndermined their best grounded determination: but no inward nor outward wound, no weakenesse, no wearinesse, can dant desire, nor take awaie the naturall effects that follow it. Therfore hauing left them no other courage than desire, no other strength than desire, no other beginning or ending cause but desire, they will continue this hard and hardie enterprise to morow. In the meane time they can find no place in their hearts that doth not wish you as swéet rest, as Psyche was conueied vnto by the gentle Zephyrus, and if it be possible by the same ghest visited. They wish that when your lids loke vp, your eies may be brightened, to sée to morrow a better daie than this, and therewithall so singular successe, as you may long, frélie, and joyfullie inioy your selfe, to the delight of lokers, and wonder of markers. ¶ This said, and all the triumphant shewes ended, the knights in verie comelie and conuenient order (as they came) departed:

Et fessos soluunt artus, mollissima quæque
Gustant, & dulci membra quiete fouent.

The running at the tilt.

The next daies shew was done in this order. The foure foster children of desire entered in a braue chariot (verie finelie and curiouslie decked) as men forewearied & halfe ouercome. The charriot was made in such sort, as vpon the top the foure knights sat, with a beautifull ladie, representing desire about them. Whereunto their eies were turned, in token what they desired. In the bulke of the charriot was conueied rome for a full consort of musike, who plaid still verie dolefull musike as the charriot moued. The charriot was drawne by foure horsses according to the foure knights, which horsses were apparelled in white and carnation silke, being the colours of desire. And as it passed by the vpper end of the tilt, a herald of armes was sent before to vtter these speeches in the knights behalfe to hir maiestie.

Here entereth a most excellent and braue charriot, with rare, curious, and costlie workes with the foure challengers in it, which charriot was verie curiouslie shadowed with fine lawne.

No confidence in themselues, O most vnmatched princesse, before whome enuie dieth, wanting all nérenes of comparison to susteine it, & admiration is exprelled, finding the scope of it void of conceiuable limits, nor anie slight regarding the force of your valiant knights, hath incouraged the foster children of desire to make this daie an inheritour of yesterdaies action: but the wing of memorie alas, the sworne enimie vnto the woefull mans quietnesse, being constantlie held by the hand of perfection, and neuer ceasling to blow the cole of some kindled desire, hath brought their inward fire to blaze forth this flame vnquenchable by anie meanes: till by death the whole fewell be consumed. And therefore not able to maister it, they are violentlie borne whither desire draweth, although they must confesse (alas) that yesterdaies braue onset should come to such a confession, that they are not greatlie comforted with hope,

So as now from ſummoning this caſtell to yéld, they are fallen lowlie to beſæch you to vouchſaue your eies out of that impregnable fortreſſe, to behold what will fall out betwixt them and your famous knights: wherin though they be ſo ouerpæſſed with the others valour, that alreadie they could ſcarſelie haue bæne able to come hither, if the charriot of deſire had not carried them; yet will they make this whole aſſemblie witneſſes ſo farre of their will, that ſooner their ſoules ſhall leaue their bodies than deſire ſhall leaue their ſoules. In that onelie ſtandeth their ſtrength that gaue them their firſt courage, and muſt be their laſt comfort. For what reſiſtance is there, where not onlie they are met with foren enimies, ſuch as ſtatelie diſdeine, which loketh from ſo high a tower to poze deſire, that though (in it ſelfe) it be great, yet in hir eies (ſo ſeated) it ſéemeth ſmall, or ſuch on the other ſide as vnfortunat deſpaire, which maketh the countrie ſo barren where they laie their ſiege, that it would take awaie all the food of fanſie: but euen ciuill warre yeſterdaie grew betwixt them and others who beare the ſame badge of deſire: that they do ſo, as thus beſtead they are brought to this faire paſſe, to deſire no moze, but that this death or ouerthrow maie be ſéene by thoſe eies who are onlie vnhappie, in that they can neither find fellows nor ſée themſelues.

Which ſpæch being done, the defendants came in, in ſuch order as they came in the daie before. Therefore I ſhall not need to make a new repetition of the ſame, ſith all hath bæne touched alreadie. Then went they to the tourneie, where they did verie noblie, as the ſhiuering of the ſwords might verie well teſtifie; and after that to the barriers, where they laſhed it out luſtilie, & fought couragiouſlie, as if the Grécks and Troians had dealt their deadlie dole. No partie was ſpared, no eſtate excepted, but ech knight indured to win the golden fléece, that expected either fame or the fauour of his miſtreſſe, which ſport continued all the ſame daie. And towards the euening the ſport being ended, there was a boie ſent vp to the quéene being clothed in aſh coloured garments in token of humble ſubmiſſion, who hauing an oliue branch in his hand, & falling downe proſtrate on his face, and then knéeling vp, concluded this noble exerciſe with theſe words to hir maieſtie.

Tourneies & barriers couragiouſlie tried.

The laſt ſpæch to the quéene ſignifieng the humble hearted ſubmiſſion of the foure foſter children of deſire.

Moſt renowmed princeſſe of princes, in whome can nothing obteine victorie, but vertue. The foſter children of deſire (but heires onelie to miſfortune) ſend me to deliuer in ſuch words as ſorrow can afford their moſt humble hearted ſubmiſſion. They acknowledge this fortreſſe to be reſerued for the eie of the whole world, farre lifted vp from the compaſſe of their deſtinie. They acknowledge the blindneſſe of their error, in that they did not know deſire (how ſtrong ſoeuer it be) within it ſelfe to be ſtronger without it ſelfe than it pleaſed the deſired. They acknowledge they haue degenerated from their foſterer in making violence accompanie deſire. They acknowledge that deſire receiued his beginning and nouriſhment of this fortreſſe, and therefore to commit vngratefulneſſe in bearing armes (though deſirous armes) againſt it. They acknowledge noble deſire ſhould haue deſired nothing ſo much, as the flouriſhing of that fortreſſe, which was to be eſtéemed according to it ſelfes liking. They acknowledge the leaſt determination of vertue (which ſtands for the gard of this fortreſſe) to be too ſtrong for the ſtrongeſt deſire, & therefore they do acknowledge themſelues ouercome, as to be ſlaues to this fortreſſe for euer, which title they will beare in their foreheads, as their other name is ingrauen in their hearts. For witneſſe therof they preſent this olue branch to your preſence, in token of your triumphant peace, and of their peaceable ſeruitude, whereby they preſent themſelues as bondmen by thoſe bonds, which the loſſe of life can onelie looſe. Onelie from out of that which was theirs they craue thus much, to giue ſome token to thoſe knights, which maie be iudged to haue done beſt in ech kind of weapon, or who by his deuiſe hath come in beſt ſort in this deſirous ſtrife. This being done, they being now ſlaues (in whome much dutie requireth) for feare of offenſe, dare ſaie no further; but with from the bottome of their captiued hearts, that while this realme is thus fortified and beautified; deſire maie be your chiefeſt aduerſarie.

In oliue branch preſented to the quéene.

Which ſpæch being ended, hir maieſtie gaue them all praiſe and great thanks, which they eſtéemed ſo well, and thought themſelues rewarded according to their owne wiſhing: and ſo they departed ech one in order, according to the firſt comming in. And thus ceaſſed theſe courtlie triumphes, ſet forth with moſt coſtlie brauerie and gallantneſſe, whereof I maie ſaie as the academicall poet ſometime ſaid at the gratious entering of hir maieſtie into Cambridge:

Hîc cocco murex, aurum ſuperatur ab auro,
Naturam certant vincere quæque ſuam:
Nil ibi ſat pulchrum, quamuis pulcherrima quæque,
Et quamuis vincant omnia, victa iacent.

Croſſe in Cheape defaced.

The one and twentith of June in the night, the loweſt images (which were of Chriſts reſurrection, of the virgin Marie, and of kings and biſhops of this realme) about the croſſe in Cheape (being ſix ſquare) on all the ſides, were broken and defaced: whereupon two daies after, proclamation was made thorough out the citie, that who ſo would bewraie the doers thereof, ſhould haue fortie crownes for their labour: but nothing came to light. The ſeauen and twentith of June, Thomas Butcher brewer, was conuicted in the Guildhall of London, for that he as principall, and others as acceſſaries, to the number of a thouſand perſons, on the fiue and twentith of June laſt paſt, about ten of the clocke in the night, with force of armes, in weſt Smithfield of London, & other ſtréets of the citie congregated themſelues, and with diuerſe exclamations, prouoked the people in maner of a rebellion, contrarie to the peace & ſtatutes of the realme. On the eight and twentith of June, the ſame Thomas Butcher, being areigned at the Iuſtice hall in the old Baſtie, was found giltie, and had iudgement to be whiped on the nert market daie from Newgate thorough Smithfield, Long lane, Alderſgate ſtreet, ſaint Martins le grand; & ſo thorough the citie to the bars without Aldgate, & then to be committed to Newgate. On the 30 of June, the ſame T. Butcher, being deliuered vnto James Maſe and other beadles, to haue receiued execution, as is aforeſaid, he being whiped from Newgate into weſt Smithfield, was there reſcued, taken from the beadles, and ſent to ſhift for himſelfe abrode: for the which fact the one & twentith of Julie, William Downe, I. Hand, T. Yarres, and T. Appowell, three ſhomakers and a brewer, were whiped from Newgate to the middeſt of Smithfield, and there ſet on the pillorie, whereon they ſtood from ten of the clocke till twelue, and from thence againe committed to priſon. The thirtéenth of Julie, Richard Cox doctor of diuinitie, ſometime ſcholemaiſter to king Edward the firſt, deane of Weſtminſter, and of Chriſts college in Oxenford, and of late biſhop of Elie deceaſſed, and was buried at Elie; whoſe epitaph (alluding to his name and the execution of his charge, wherein he was iuſt) hereafter followeth:

This yeare were to be seene in London two Dutchmen of strange statures, the one in height seauen foot & seauen inches, in breadth betwixt the shoulders three quarters of a yard and an inch, the compasse of his breast one yard, an halfe, and two inches; & about the waist one yard, quarter, and one inch; the length of his arme to the hand a full yard: a comelie man of person, but lame of his legs (for he had broken them with lifting of a barrell of beere.) The other was in height but three foot, had neuer a good foot, nor anie knee at all, and yet could he danse a galliard, he had no arme, but a stumpe to the elbow or little more on the right side, on the which, singing, he would danse a cup, and after tosse it about three or foure times, and euerie time receiue the same on the said stumpe: he would shoot an arrow neere to the marke, flourish with a rapier, throw a bowle, beat with an hammar, hew with an ax, sound a trumpet, and drinke euerie daie ten quartes of the best beere, if he could get it. About the seauentéenth of Julie, I saw these men in the parish of saint Peter vpon Cornehill, the taller sitting on a bench bareheaded, the lesser stood on the same bench, and hauing on his head a hat with a feather, was yet the lower. Also the taller man standing on his feet, the lesser (with his hat & feather on his head) went vpright betweene his legs, and touched him not.

Strangers of strange stature to be seene.

The eightéenth of Julie, Euerard Hance, alias Ducket, a seminarie priest, was in the sessions hall in the old Bailie of London arreigned, where he before the quéenes iustices affirmed that himselfe being now in England was subiect to the pope in ecclesiasticall causes, and that the pope hath now the same authoritie here in England that he had an hundred yeares past, and which he hath now at Rome, with other traitorous spéeches: for the which he was condemned to be drawne, hanged, and quartered, and was executed accordinglie on the last of Julie. At the same sessions were brought from the Fléet, the Gatehouse, Newgate, and the Counters, sundrie prisoners, indicted for refusing to come to church; all which being conuicted by their owne confession, had iudgement according to the statute, to paie twentie pounds for euery moneth of such wilfull absence from the church. The first of Nouember, monsieur Francis duke of Anion, the French kings brother, and other nobles of France (hauing latelie arriued in Kent) came to London, and were honourablie receiued, and reteined at the court with banketting, and diuerse pleasant shewes and pastimes, of whome more hereafter in place conuenient.

Euerard Hance executed.

Crosse in Cheape defaced.

Thomas Butcher whipped and relieued.

Men arreigned for not comming to church.

Monsieur duke of Anion came into England.

On mondaie being the twentith of Nouember, Edmund Campion, Rafe Sherwin, Lucas Kerbie, Edward Rishton, Thomas Cotebam, Henrie Orton, Robert Johnson, & James Bolgraue. All these before named persons were brought vnto the high barre at Westminster: where they were seuerallie, and altogither indicted vpon high treason, the sum whereof followeth in briefe as thus. That these persons, contrarie both to loue and dutie, forsoke their natiue countrie, to liue beyond the seas, vnder the popes obedience, as at Rome, Rheimes, and diuerse other places: where (the pope hauing with other princes practised the death and depriuation of our most gratious princesse, and vtter subuersion of hir seat & kingdome, to aduance his most abhominable religion) these men, hauing vowed their allegiance to the pope, to obeie him in all causes whatsoeuer, being there, gaue their consent; yea vttermost furtherance they might, to aid him in this most traitorous determination. And for this intent and purpose they were sent ouer to seduce the hearts of hir maiesties louing subiects, and to conspire and practise hir graces death, as much as in them laie, against a great daie, set and appointed, when the generall hauocke should be made, those onelie reserued that ioined with them. This laied to their charge, they boldlie and impudentlie denied. Whereupon a iurie was impanelled, their owne confessions, their owne writings, and credible witnesses viua voce produced to their faces, approuing them giltie of the former allegations, as hereafter followeth.

Ex libro cui titulus A discoueric of Edmund Campion dedicated to certeine Lords of the councell.

Edmund Campion with diuerse others arraigned of high treason. The forenamed parties iudgment.

After the indictment was read vnto them, and their answer, that it was beyond their power to proue them faultie in such matters, so stiffelie they stood in their apparant impudencie; first was moued to them sundrie treasons past, attempted against hir maiestie by those of their sect and disposition: yet notwithstanding the vttermost of their malice, how mightilie God had defended his chosen Elisabeth, returning their dealings to their owne destruction. Among sundrie these treasonable practises, which the pope, the ancient aduersarie to hir maiestie hath at diuerse times set abroch, the rebellion in the north may remaine as a witnesse of his excéeding malice and spite against hir grace and gouernement. Whereto let vs ad the bull sent ouer by John Felton, which traitorouslie he placed on the bishop of Londons gate: in which bull, the pope vtterlie excommunicated hir maiestie, she was an heretike, he had dispossessed hir of hir crowne and dominion, she was not the lawfull quéene of this realme, and hir subiects were not bound to obeie anie of hir laws or decrées; but they were all frée, and perfectlie discharged of their allegiance to hir, so that they might lawfullie, when time serued so conuenient for them, both stirre rebellion against hir, and also enter into armes against hir maiestie. The popes will in this hath bin put in execution, as through the ill demeanor of diuerse persons to him affected it was moued in the north, where mainteining themselues on the authoritie of the pope and his traitorous bull secretlie dispersed abrode, they entred into a plaine and manifest rebellion. The like was put in practise in Ireland through doctor Sanders and other traitors, who there ioined themselues togither vnder the popes standard, to bring to passe their secret appointment in this realme. Through their persuasions and dealings, the people were moued in the popes name to fight against their lawfull princesse vnder his banner; and to rebell against hir so notoriouslie as they might. The incouragement to this great disobedience they receiued through doctor Sanders a fugitiue and ranke traitor to his prince and countrie, as also through diuerse Iesuits both English and Irish, whose hypocriticall shew of holinesse and diuellish persuasions on the behalfe of the pope their maister and head, intised a multitude of the people there to change their profession in religion, and to yeeld themselues to the popes authoritie, whereby they should renounce the most certeine and iust title of hir maiestie: and when force forces should be assembled there, they to ioine with them in their intent, and so traitorouslie rebell against their lawfull souereigne. All these practises take their originall from the pope, as well by sending his secret messengers, as also by his traitorous bull, which being sent by Pius quintus, is neuertheless confirmed (in the former authoritie) by this pope Gregorie the thirteenth, and remaineth in hope to take effect at some time or other, for which he doth watch opportunitie as conuenientlie as he maie. But God the iust auenger of all causes, as he hath hitherto preserued hir maiestie & this litle Iland from all their malicious attempts and practises, and hath deseruedlie throwne the yoke of their shame on their owne necks: so will he no doubt continue his fatherlie care, that his children shall be preserued, & their aduersaries confounded.

The rebellion in the north, onlie through the popes meanes.

The sum of the popes bull which our Englishmen beyond the seas hold as their authoritie to rebell against hir maiestie.

Doctor Sanders his rebellion in Ireland, through whome the people were seduced to fight against their lawfull princesse.

This bull remaineth in his former force by this pope, onelie & toleration for the straitnesse to the subiects there in amended.

This

Campion desireth not to heare how these treasons toke their originall, and how from time to time they haue bene enterpised and confounded: wherefore to blind the peoples eies he maketh this counterfeit answer.

But saith Campion: What is this to vs here present? What apperteineth this to our indictment? We are here both seuerallie and all togither indicted of high treason; and for that that is obiected against vs we must answer. Let not other mens offenses be laid to our charge, that we should answer for other mens faults committed long since. Some of vs were then but nouices here in the vniuersities, and were altogither ignorant of these matters. What haue we to do with anie thing that they did? They that were offendors, let them answer to that you can lay against them. For vs that be here at this instant, you must either saie; Thou Campion didst this thing, or thou (naming some of the other) committedst this offense, and therupon bring your proofes and witnesses, otherwise you shall neuer be able to touch vs. As for these assertions, for the strength they haue against vs, I will not esteeme it worth a penniworth of pippins. And therefore to your indictment.

This answer so smoothlie deliuered, and with such coie lookes and protestation of action gested, that all the standers by gaue perfect notice of the man, both of his nature and disposition, as also of his prompt & ingenious wit, to shadow an absolute truth with a shew of great wisedome and learning. For this he knew right well, that before he came to that place, he had woone a maruellous goodlie report, to be such a man as his like was not to be found, either for life, learning, or anie other qualitie that might beautifie a man. So that by his fauorers and frends it was blowen abrode, that we had neither doctors, nor others that were worthie to enter disputation with him, he was so farre aboue them all, that they might not deale with him. Hereto do the great titles which they adorne him withall giue credit, saieng thus:

Ex libello cuiusdam famoso.

Quid? Campiano deerat doctrina perito,
Doctrinæ natus qui penetrale fuit:
Cui fuit in primis sponsata scientia cunis,
Quique puer nulli mente secundus erat:
Ingenuas iuuenis qui sedulus imbibit artes,
Virque videbatur vix habuisse parem, &c.

Now being brought vnto a publike triall, it stood him vpon to argue somewhat of the praise that had bene giuen him: wherefore in verie quaint and familiar eloquent gloses he stood vpon quirks and fine deuise of speech, thinking as he had deluded manie before, so at that present he might blind the eies of iustice, & acquite himselfe of his horrible treasons. But as truth sheweth most braue when she goeth bare & naked, and deceipt finest when he is cunninglie florished; euen so the pore habit of the one discouered the proud hart of the other, and confounded his boldnesse with hir sacred brightnesse, giuing all men to vnderstand, that Veritas vincit omnia. And bicause Campion would haue made such a cunning conueiance of the matter, as though it neither might or could attaint him or anie of them: it was giuen him to vnderstand, that they would not alone touch him in the sequele of the former causes, but them all, and he that thought himselfe the cléerest. Wherevpon doctor Sanders and doctor Bristow, their traitorous writings in defense of the popes bull exhibited against hir maiestie, were read vnto them, how they both allowed it, and also the rebellion in the north. Afterwards it was manifestlie proued to their faces, that Bristows booke in allowance thereof, named his Motiues, was especiallie commanded to be vsed amongest them both at Rome and at Rheimes, euerie one being expressie charged not to be without one of these bookes.

Doctor Sanders and doctor Bristows bookes were there read vnto them, wherin most traitorously they defended the rebellion against hir maiestie.

This with open mouths they altogither denied, some that they had neuer seene it, and some that they neuer heard of anie such commandement: when as John Hart one of their owne fellowes had auouched it, and therevnto subscribed. Besides, my selfe when * I came to Rheimes, saw them as common amongst them, as the litle catechisme here amongst children, the inequalitie of the number considered. Againe, at Rome they were as common likewise in the seminarie, and among the English men in the citie, for * my selfe had it, and one of doctor Allens catechismes deliuered me, with great charge to embrace it as my chiefe instruction. My companion that went with me had one likewise; the rest of the witnesses had seene how common they were, and in what reuerence and authoritie they esteemed them: yet these men would with shamelesse faces denie it; yea, and if they might haue bene credited, would haue sworne against it. This manifest reproofe they would not grant vnto, but Campion taketh vpon him to wrest it according vnto his humor, by answering that the booke was not so ill as they toke it for, nor deserued anie such iudgement of preiudice. Now he thought he could not be taken tardie, but supposed his argument to passe vnreprouable; for that in the new imprinting of this booke, such matters as did most sharplie touch them, were abridged, thinking none of the former bookes should come to light. But here Campion ouershot himselfe, for so slie an answer could not couer so foule a blemish. When they had notablie convicted them of these matters, which with obstinacie they still denied, they came to the intent of their secret comming ouer into this realme, which was for the death of hir maiestie, and ouerthrow of the whole realme, which should be by domesticall rebellion and forren hostilitie, the sum whereof in briefe is thus. This little Iland, God hauing so bountifullie bestowed his blessings vpon it, that except it proue false within it selfe, no treason whatsoeuer can preuaile against it, and the pope being hereof verie well persuaded, by reason that all his attempts haue proued of no effect: he hath found out a meane, whereby he assureth himselfe to spéed of his desire. Secret rebellion must be stirred here at home among our selues, the harts of the people must be obdurated against God and their prince; so that when a forren power shall on a sudden inuade this realme, the subiects thus seduced must ioine with these in armes, and so shall the pope atteine the sum of his wish. And all this must be wrought by certeine locusts of the popes seminaries maintened at Rome & Rheimes, arriuing in England, and dispersing themselues into such places, where they thinke themselues to be surest, some in one place, and some in another; and disguising themselues like gentlemen, seruingmen, or what apparell they may find meetest for them, haue accesse to manie and sundrie places, where hauing reconciled some, their frends must likewise be of the same stampe. And so, what from father to son, husband and wife, kinsman and acquaintance, a number are seduced & brought into their detestable dealings. For, after they haue gotten anie litle ground within them to build vpon, then do they laie vnto them, what a generall blondie daie is toward England, that the pope and other forren princes haue fullie determined to ouerrun the realme; then better it were for you (saie they) to yéeld your selues willinglie, than to see so horrible a slaughter, both of your princesse, and all that dare presume to take hir part. Your selues, yea and your frends shall abide the same hard iudgement, except you ioine with vs in this action. Thus through terrifieng, and a thousand traitorous scritches they haue; one friend bringeth another, and one kinsman another. So that, as they themselues will make their boast, in short time they doubt not to haue the most part of all England: yea and further they presume, that hir maiestie thinking hir selfe in most ſafetie, ſhall then be ſoneſt of all beguiled & deceiued. Campion coueth their cloming ouer, affirming it was for the ſafeguard of ſoules. These are the men that make themſelues ſo ſound and ſubſtantiall, that they are as true ſubiects to hir maieſtie, as the beſt of vs. Yea, ſaith Campion, neuer ſhall you pꝛoue this, that we came ouer either foꝛ this intent oꝛ purpoſe: but onelie foꝛ the ſauing of ſoules, which mære loue and conſcience compelled vs to doo, foꝛ that we did pittie the miſerable eſtate of our countrie. But where are your pꝛoofes (ſaith he) theſe are but quirkes by the waie, our liues I perceiue ſtandeth vpon points of rhetoꝛike, you haue ſhewen vs the antecedent, now let vs haue the Ergo. When he had no other ſhift, he fell into theſe words. With this continuall courſe of boldneſſe and impudencie, Campion and his fellowes would grant nothing, but ſtiflie denied euerie cauſe: and Campion he toke it foꝛ a cuſtome to wꝛeſt euerie thing as pleaſed him, ſaieng: that the iurie were not men learned, and therfoꝛe cauſes of conſcience ought not to be committed to them, neither was that barre appointed to define on cauſes of conſcience: wherfoꝛe, all that you doo (ſaith he) is but to bꝛing vs in Odium with the iurie. After this oꝛder he deluded the people, appealing ſtill to the deuoutneſſe of his conſcience: bicauſe he ſaw the matter bꝛought to the verie puſh that would generallie conuict them all, foꝛ the witneſſes were pꝛoduced and ſwoꝛne, Harts confeſſion and their owne wꝛitings befoꝛe them, ſo that they would remoue them from their oꝛdinarie illuſions.

The depoſition of G. Eliot. George Eliot, one of the oꝛdinarie yeomen of hir maieſties chamber, vpon his oth gaue foꝛth in euidence as followeth. That he, liuing here in England among certeine of that ſect, fell in acquaintance with one Paine a pꝛieſt: who gaue him to vnderſtand of a hoꝛrible treaſon intended againſt hir maieſtie and the ſtate, which he did expect ſhoꝛtlie to happen, the oꝛder how & after what manner in bꝛiefe is thus. That there ſhould be leuied a certeine companie of armed men, which on a ſudden ſhould enterpꝛiſe a moſt monſtruous attempt: a certeine companie of theſe armed men ſhould be pꝛepared againſt hir maieſtie, as manie againſt my L. of L. as manie gainſt my L. T. as manie againſt S. F. W. and diuerſe other, whoſe names he doth not well remember. The deaths of theſe noble perſonages ſhould be pꝛeſentlie fulfilled, and hir maieſtie vſed in ſuch ſoꝛt, as modeſtie noꝛ dutie will not ſuffer a ſubiect to rehearſe: but this ſhould be the generall crie euerie where, Quæne Marie, quæne Marie. It was alſo appointed and agréed vpon who ſhould haue this man of honours rome, and who ſhould haue that office, euerie thing was determined, there wanted nothing but the comming ouer of ſuch pꝛieſts and others, as were long loked foꝛ. Vpon this repoꝛt, this aforenamed George Eliot toke occaſion to queſtion with this Paine, how they could find in their hearts to attempt an act of ſo great and hoꝛrible crueltie, conſidering how high an offenſe it ſhould be to God, beſide great dangers might ariſe thereby. Whereto Paine made anſwer, that the killing hir maieſtie was no offenſe to God, noꝛ the vttermoſt crueltie they could vſe to hir, oꝛ anie that toke hir part, but that they might as lawfullie doo it as to a brute beaſt; and himſelfe would be one of the foꝛmoſt in execuring of this villanous and moſt traitoꝛous action.

By this you may perceiue, that the death of hir maieſtie and ouerthꝛow of this realme was thꝛoughlie agréed vpon, and fullie determined: there wanted nothing but oppoꝛtunitie, foꝛ pꝛieſts both then and after came ouer continuallie to further it; ſo much as in them laie. To the ſaid effect did A. M. vtter moſt odious matter, the reading whereof would make anie true Engliſh hart quake & tremble; and to wꝛite it, what loiall ſubiect is able to abide? And therefoꝛe as deriued from the diuell to his dearlings we omit the ſame; counting it moꝛe loialtie to lull ſuch deuiſes and conſultations aſleepe, than to publiſh them to the woꝛld in blacke & white: due reuerence to the pꝛincipall obiects alwaies reſerued. All which abhominable ſtuffe, circumſtances of times, places, perſons, and other particulars dulie pondered, giue euident demonſtration what affection theſe fellowes aſſoꝛd their lawfull quæne and countrie: well is he that can imagine moſt againſt hir maieſtie, and highlie is he eſteemed that beareth the moſt traitoꝛous hart to hir. Yet Campion and the reſt of his fellowes they plead ignoꝛance in all theſe cauſes, they bolſter vp one another with large pꝛoteſtations, railing woꝛds, and ſubtill ſurmiſes: affirming that they were not ſent hither foꝛ anie ſuch intent; which is as vntrue, as we know it foꝛ truth, that the Loꝛd God liueth in heauen. Campion noꝛ his fellowes will grant to anie thing, but raile and vſe bold ſpæches, whereby their guiltie conſciences were diſcouered. * M. A.

Foꝛ this ⋆ I am able to ſaie my ſelfe, that at diuerſe other times, it was whiſpered among them in the ſeminarie: that ſhoꝛtlie there ſhould be pꝛieſts apointed foꝛ England, to win the people againſt the apointed time, when as a great armie ſhould be readie to ioine with them: and Campion, who was then at Pꝛaga in Bohemia, he was ſpoken of amongſt them all, to be a rare and ſingular fellow, and therefoꝛe generallie was taken foꝛ a méet man to be ſent about ſuch a meſſage, ſo that they iudged that he ſhould be ſent foꝛ to be a chiefe man in this matter. Well (ſaith Campion) it may be they had ſuch an opinion of me, which in my ſelfe I find not to be deſerued; and it may be that I was appointed to be ſent into England, accoꝛding as thoſe other pꝛieſts were, foꝛ the ſauing of ſoules and benefit of my countrie: muſt it follow then that we are ſent to pꝛactiſe the death of the quæne, and to ſæke the ruine of our countrie? Alas, this is a hard caſe, and I deſire you of the iurie to marke it, foꝛ theſe are but ſhadowes without anie ſubſtance. This you are to note, that we which enter into that Bleſſed ſoꝛtetie of the Jeſuites: we doo as it were foꝛſake the woꝛld, bowing our ſelues to chaſtitie and ſincerittie of conſcience, to obeie our ſuperiours, and to be readie to go whither they ſhall apoint vs. If they ſend vs to the Indies, oꝛ to anie ſuch places, where the people haue not the true catholike faith: we are bound by dutie in conſcience to go whither they appoint vs. And ſhall it then be ſaid that we come foꝛ the deſtruction of the pꝛince and countrie, where we ſettle our ſelues? Alas, that were a hard caſe, foꝛ chriſtian charitie willeth vs to comfoꝛt one another, and if we can to get the ſhéepe into the fold which hath long run aſtraie. And when we heare confeſſion, we doo not perſuade them to anie diſobedience; foꝛ that is againſt the nature of confeſſion: God foꝛbid that we ſhould once thinke anie ſuch thing. Campion confeſſeth his traitoꝛous intents vnder the ſauing of ſoules. A holie kind of life were it not foꝛ the ꝛ. Note here the perfect image of hypocriſie.

Behold the ſubtill ſhifts that he found out ſtill to flie vnto, yea though the manifeſt diſpꝛoſe laie befoꝛe them, yet would he find ſome cauill oꝛ other: foꝛ not onelie the euidence of their generall determination beyond the ſeas was ſhewed them, but alſo the traitoꝛous articles were there read vnto them, which John Hart had copied out foꝛ doctoꝛ Allen (concerning the pꝛoceéding of theſe traitoꝛous cauſes, and foꝛ which he went purpoſelie to Rome to confer with the pope about) and ſubſcribed vnto, that they were certeine and true, as alſo their owne confeſſions and wꝛitings were laid open befoꝛe them, approuing them notablie guiltie of the matters aforeſaid, and yet in their lieng pamphlets ſcattered here & there in ſundꝛy hands, they haue faces of bꝛaſſe to repoꝛt, that when manifeſt pꝛoofes of their treaſons were laid befoꝛe them: they would in no wiſe grant their guiltineſſe.

Inſidiæ ſanctos implicuere viros.

Charles Sled, who ſometime ſerued maſter doctoꝛ Woꝛton in Rome, in whoſe houſe there was manie matters determined, both by doctor Allen when he came to Rome, and diuers other doctors liuing there in the citie, as also diuerse of the seminarie: he likewise vnderstood of the prouision for the great daie, that it was generallie spoken of among the Englishmen: and to be more certeine he kept a iournall or booke of their dailie dealings, noting the daie, time, place, and persons present at their secret conferences, and verie much matter hath he iustified against them. One Cradocke a merchant, when he was in Rome, he vnderstood the aforesaid determination, and how that doctor Shelleie the English prior, who is a knight of the Rhodes, for that he somewhat spake against such crueltie to be vsed to his natiue countrie, was somewhat misliked of himselfe, and had almost beene turned out of his office. And this aforesaid Cradocke being in prison there for the space of twentie moneths and more: it was said to him, that he might account himselfe blessed of God that he was there, because he should not see the grieuous ruine of his natiue countrie. He that hath but halfe an eie may see how these matters concord and agree togither, and noting euerie thing as it lieth, may plainelie see their horrible and traitorous deuises.

Consider euerie matter and then iudge how they concord and agree togither.

And further, there was a little booke in Latine, which they themselues brought ouer with them, it was there openlie read vnto them: wherin was certeine rules and orders prescribed, how they should behaue themselues here in England, and how if they were demanded of anie thing, they should make answer indirectlie: or to take the word it selfe, according as it is mentioned in the booke, they must answer Sophistice, whereby is meant as thus. If they be examined as concerning their allegiance to hir maiestie, they will make their answer after this maner; She is our lawfull souereigne ladie & queene, and we obeie hir. But then obiect vnto them; Will you obeis hir, notwithstanding the popes excommunication, or anie thing that he commandeth to the contrarie? Then will they answer: We desire you not to charge our consciences, and that you would not enter so deepe into our consciences, we trust the pope will not command vs anie thing against hir: & a hundred such like slæueleslie answers they make, neuer agreeing to anie certeintie, but holding the pope in more reuerence than they do hir maiestie.

A booke which they vse as their instruction, how to answer to euerie question sophisticallie.

To dow their dutie is a weightie burden to their consciences, and therefore they abide in their obstinacie and blindnesse.

For this consideration they carrie with them, that if by their shew of humilitie, & their deuised order of craftie answering, they might mooue our magistrats to haue a good opinion of them; & not to deale so strictlie as law and their deserued doth worthlie merit: then they might with lesse suspect go about their holie fathers businesse, in that their sophisticall answers couered so foule an abuse. And then so manie as come after them, purposelie sent about the same affaires, seeing their passage made before them, and being schooled after the same maner: they might withdraw the hearts of a number of hir maiesties subiects, by such meanes as is before largelie expressed; so that destruction should come vpon vs, before we had discouered their trecherous dealings. But God be thanked, as all their deuises haue had their deserued successe, this sophisticall order hath sped alike with them for companie: and this let them fullie assure themselues, that what meanes soeuer they seeke against their princesse and countrie, God will reward them after their owne dealings.

Campion his owne answer as concerning his allegiance to hir maiestie.

To Campion himselfe the former questions were put forth at the barre: and this answer he made to them. She is my lawfull souereigne ladie & queene, and I do obeie hir. But when he was demanded, although the pope did expressedlie command him the contrarie: if he would neuertheles faithfullie obeie hir? Oh then! they must not so deepelie enter into his conscience, that barre was not a barre to define on causes of conscience: that question touched his conscience, wherefore he flatlie said he might not answer it. No, no, he knew full well that the traitorous affaires he came about, would not allow him such a direct answer as they had looked for, and gladlie would haue had, that of a Saule they might haue made him a Paule. Wherefore his secret and guilefull behauiour made perfect appearance of his wicked intent, which he shadowed vnder the counterfeit cloke of sauing soules, and reconciling his countriemen to the catholike faith, vnder the sweet bait of the amiable title of the societie of Iesus, to which order hauing bequeathed himselfe (and become a resolute and obstinate votarie) he thirsted after the kingdome of heauen; if we maie beleeue their owne report concerning Campion, of whome they saie:

Nominis inde tui sancto deuotus Iesu
Ille sodalitio cœlica regna sitit.

Here it can not be greatlie amisse, to rehearse vnto you the cause why this pope hath tolerated the former bull, seeing this sophisticall kind of answering grew chieflie thereby. When ante of these secret messengers should be sent about their holie fathers determination here in England, to reconcile, shrine, & win hir maiesties subiects to their diuelish intent: if such misaduenture should happen to them, that their secret delings came to the eares of iustice, then they fell into the danger of law. Wherfore to shadow their subtiltie, and to prosecute the effect of their message, the pope thought good to harten them by this sophisticall addition. For well we know, & themselues likewise are not ignorant thereof, that being examined, if they should denie the queenes maiestie to be their supreme princesse and gouernesse in all causes: then they fell into condemnation by hir lawes. Against, if they denied the authoritie of the pope, as of force they must needs do, if they will esteeme themselues good subiects, and manifest a dutifull and obedient heart to hir maiestie: then they breake their vow made to the pope, and so fall into his cursse and condemnation likewise: so that this is certeinlie appointed them, to cleaue faithfullie to the one, and vtterlie to forsake the other.

The cause why this pope hath tolerated the former bull of Pius Quintus.

Yet that they might haue as much fauour and friendship, as the furtherance of such a cause required: this hard clause (being well scanned of diuerse our English doctors and others, both at Rome and at Rheimes) was thorough earnest sute deliuered to diuerse of the cardinals, who laieng their heads togither, and throughlie searching the bottome of euerie doubt: a toleration for that strict point was found out, which was ordeined as you haue heard before. Then in all the hast the pope was giuen to vnderstand thereof, who respecting what might be for his benefit, and what might turne to his discommoditie, authorised them this former toleration, which (God be thanked) carried as slender strength as the rest of his practises hath done. Yet all this being knowne to vs, Campion & his fellowes will grant no knowledge; but pleade still their deuout consciences. An other of their owne bookes was also there read vnto them, wherein was other orders prescribed them; how they should handle a nobleman, how a gentleman, and how a poore man: which being openlie read before them, gaue all there present to vnderstand, how assuredlie they had appointed the course for their treason. A number of inuincible proofs passing against them, they came at last to the point of their comming ouer, how suddenlie, how hastilie, & all thorough a generall appointment. Campion, he had staid a long time at Praga in Bohemia, and

Our English doctors conferring with the cardinals found out the meane for this toleration.

In other booke how to handle all manner of persons to win them to their intent.

Campion staieng for from Prage and on a sudden he was hastilie sent for to Rome: by his owne confession he knew not wherefore, but the message was in such hast, that he must come thither with all speed.

They go with other priests appointed for England.

When he came to Rome, he staied there but fiue daies: in which time, receiuing the summe of their charge from the pope, as is their vsuall wont, and their father generall deliuering them what he hath in office: he was dispatched from thense with other preests, who had their Viaticum from the popes treasurie, and were all especiallie apointed for England. These preests were sent (as all other are) about the cheefe cause, for that none come from thense but onelie for that purpose. The effect of the cause before expressed, it is too manifest; that Campion and his fellowes are guiltie of the matters obiected against them. For this you are to remember, that none must staie there without they will be preests; when they receiue their preesthod, they enter into their oth, which oth conteineth the summe of the treason: so that all which come from thense (hauing taken that oth) come about the execution of the treason; in so that none but they that are especiallie sent, can haue their Viaticum of the pope; and then he sending them, the case is too euident.

The preists are there onelie maintained to this purpose, and none come from thense, but about this cause, which ouerth them altogither guiltie.

Let not a light iudgement passe ouer a matter of so great respect, let the popes intent of keeping them there be considered, the great malice and spite that he beareth hir maiestie and the relme, and then their oth to execute his commandements; all these laid togither, discouereth the depth of their trecherie. But what answereth maister Campion to this? He confesseth that he was quietlie setled at Praga, and little expected anie such hastie sending for: beside that, he went to Rome with great speed, tarrieng there no longer than fiue daies, as is before expressed, and that he receiued his Viaticum of the pope, when as he was dispatched thense with other preests, purposelie apointed for England, and that he came no otherwise than they did, nor for anie other intent than for the benefit of soules, as he still termed it: but he would not grant that he came for anie treason.

The cause why this pope hath tolerated the former bull of Pius Quintus.

Campion granteth, he came as the other preests did to reconcile thriue: but he will not allow that he came for anie treason.

So that to seduce hir maiesties subiects, to persuade them from their duetie and obedience, and to ioine themselues in such sort, as their princelie and countrie must be destroied thereby: this is no treason in his opinion. Howbeit, Campion and his fellowes pleaded ignorance still, they saw and would not see, they were so craftilie scholed. James Bolgraue, he was at Wilna in Polonia, and as he confessed himselfe, he vnderstood that there was preests apointed for England: vpon which report he came awaie from thense in verie great hast. And in his passage, he mentioned to one in the ship, who was sworne, and confessed the same before certeine iustices, that there was such matter towards in England, as hath beene before expressed: and thereupon he sought to haue wonne him, if his purpose could haue taken effect. Campion seeing this begun somewhat to touch the quicke, and that in truth it discouered the dealings of them all: he taketh vpon him to answer on his behalfe, for that they all reposed themselues on him.

Our English doctors conferring with the cardinals found out the meane for this toleration.

James Bolgraue, his hastie comming from Wilna, whe he heard that preests were appointed for England.

Campion frequenteth his accustomed order of subtill answering.

He saith, that if Bolgraue did heare such newes, that there were papists apointed for England, whie should they take hold vpon so small a cause? Flieng reports are not to be credited, for albeit he heard such newes, how knew he, if they were certeins or no? Againe (quoth he) the man hath beene long out of England, and he doth not speake English perfectlie: it maie be then that some word maie escape him vnawares, which you are not to build vpon, considering the defect of the man, for he maie peraduenture speake he knoweth not what. And where you saie, that such a one hath auouched before certeine iustices, that he died such and such words to him; where is the man, we are not to credit a written paper, what know we if it be true or no? Let vs heare him selfe saie so, and then we will beleeue it. See what a number of shifts he had continuallie to wall the time, and all to no purpose. The mans owne confession was there, wherto himselfe had subscribed, and foure or fiue iustices set their hands to it for the certeintie thereof; yet this was not sufficient to answer them.

Traitors will neuer beleeue anie truth, especiallie if it touch themselues.

Robert Johnson he was likewise at Auinion in France, from whense he came also in verie great hast, vpon the report he had heard of preests that were appointed for England. Now there is an other thing to be considered, that these men, setled where they were, by their owne confession they must not depart from thense without they be appointed by their superiors, then it is easie to be answered, that they came by their superiors apointment at this present: and as the generall determination was, so they came all for one cause & intent. Edward Rishton he being here in England, wrote a letter to Richardson a preest, and who is likewise condemned amongest them; which letter was there openlie read to his face. How there were foure goldsmiths of his occupation latelie come ouer, who indeed were preests, and how all things went successiuelie forwards. And Campion being in the Tower wrote a letter vnto Pownd likewise, wherein he gaue him to vnderstand that he was verie sorie, that through his frailtie he had betraied those, at whose houses he had beene so freendlie interteined; wherefore he asked God hartilie forgiuenesse, and them all whome he had so highlie offended. But (saith he) as for the cheefe matter that is as yet vnreuealed, and come racke come rope, neuer shall that be discouered. A number of matters more were brought against them, which to rehearse, would require a farre more large discourse: but to be briefe, in the end, this was the full and certeine issue. That these men, when they were beyond the seas: the generall agreement and determination amongest them, was to worke the death of our most gratious princesse, to destroie hir dominion, and to erect such as pleased them when this aforesaid date should take effect. And that their comming ouer, was to seduce hir louing subiects, to win their obedient hearts from hir, so that they should be in a readinesse to ioine with a forren power, and so they should likewise be destroiers of their princesse and countrie. And that in the meane while they themselues sought to accomplish hir maiesties death, so much as in them late.

Campions letter to maister Pownd in the Tower.

Campion was resolute in the cheefe matter.

This was manifestlie proued by verie large and ample euidence, credible witnesses, and their owne confessions and writings: whereon the iurie, hauing wiselie and discreetlie pondered and searched and seene into the depth of euerie cause, worthilie and deseruedlie gaue them vp all guiltie of the treasons whereof they were indicted and arreigned. Which being done, after a godlie and comfortable exhortation, persuading them patientlie to suffer and abide the death for them appointed, and to be heartilie sorie for their greeuous and hainous offenses, the sentence of death was pronounced on them; that they should depart to the places from whense they came, and from thense to be drawne on hordles to the place of execution, where they should be hanged till they were halfe dead: then to be cut downe, their priuie members to be cut off, and their entrailes taken forth, and to be burned in the fire before their eies: then their heads to be cut off, their bodies parted into foure quarters to be disposed at hir maiesties pleasure, and the Lord God to receiue their soules to his mercie. Afterwards they were conueied from thense with botes to a place of landing for them appointed, from whense they were conducted to the Tower of London, diuers of them giuing forth sundrie lewd and dishonest speeches: as Thomas Cotcham, seeing so manie people to behold them, desired that fire and brimstone might fall from heauen, to destroie both the citie and all that were in it: with diuerse other wicked words, which for modesties sake I omit here to rehearse, desiring God in mercie to giue men better grace.

On the next daie, being tuesdaie and the one and twentith daie of Nouember, there was brought to the said high barre these persons following; John Hart, Thomas Ford, William Filbie, Laurence Richardson, John Shert, Alexander Brian, and John Collington. Alexander Brian, he had shauen his crowne himselfe, & made him a crosse of a peece of a trencher, which he held in his hand openlie & praied to: which when he was rebuked for, he boldlie and stoutlie made answer; that his crowne was of his owne shauing, and he had good hope to do it againe. In breefe, they were all indicted on the selfe same treasons as they were the daie before; and John Harts traitorous sermon which he made at Rhems against hir maiestie auouched to his face, their owne writings and confessions with substantiall witnesse produced against them, so that they were found giltie of their treasons, as the other were before them, except John Collington, he was quit of the former high treason by the Iurie.

A verie holie thing, but verie meet for his deuotion.

On fridaie being the first of December, Edmund Campion Iesuit, Ralfe Sherwin, & Alexander Brian seminarie priests, being condemned for high treason against hir maiesties most roiall person, as also for traitorous practises, touching the subuersion of the true & vndoubted religion here maintained, with the vtter ruine and ouerthrow of this realme of England, were drawne from the Tower of London on hurdles, to the place of execution appointed, garded with such a sufficient companie as might expresse the honor of iustice the larger in that behalfe. Being come to the place of execution, where diuerse of hir maiesties honorable councell, with manie honorable personages, and gentlemen of worship and good account, beside a multitude of people not here to be remembred attended their comming; Edmund Campion was first brought vp into the cart, where after the great rumor of so manie people somewhat appeased, he spake thus.

Execution of Campion, Sherwin, and Brian.

First he began (the people then present expecting his confession) with a praise or two in Latine, when immediatlie after he fell into English in this maner. I am here brought as a spectacle before the face of God, of angelles, and of men, satisfieng my selfe to die as becommeth a true christian & catholike man. As for the treasons that haue beene laid to my charge, and I am come here to suffer for: I desire you all to beare witnesse with me, that thereof I am altogither innocent. Whereupon answer was made to him by one of the councell, that he might not seeme to denie th'obiections against him, hauing beene proued so manifestlie to his face, both by sufficient witnesse and euidence. Well my lord (quoth he) I am a catholike man, and a priest, in that faith haue I liued hitherto, and in that faith I do intend to die; and if you esteeme my religion treason, then of force I must grant vnto you, as for anie other treason I will not consent vnto. Then was he moued as concerning his traitorous and hainous offense to the queenes most excellent maiestie. Whereto he answered; She is my lawfull princesse and queene. There somwhat he drew in his words to himselfe, whereby was gathered, that somwhat he would haue gladlie spoken: but the great timiditie and vnstable opinion of his conscience, wherein he was all the time euen to the death, would not suffer him to vtter it.

Here is with iudgement a deepe point and high matter to be considered, that this man alwaies directing the course of his life to a vaineglorious imagination, and alwaies couetous to make himselfe famous; at this instant made a perfect discourrie of himselfe. For being somewhat learned, all matters whatsoeuer (as you haue heard before) he bare away with a maiesticall countenance, the visor of vanitie aptlie fitting the face of onelie hypocrisie; what was sound he would make sophisticall, what was the infallible truth of it selfe he would carrie in his owne conceipt, and delude the people with a pleasant quirke, or some such stuffe, onlie to purchase him credit and affection. And he was not to learne to set a corragious countenance on euerie such slight reason, whereby he peruerted manie, deceiued more, and was thought such a champion, as the pope neuer had the like. But now behold the man, whom neither racke nor rope should alter, whose faith was such as he boasted inuincible: feare had caught hold on this braue boaster, and terror entred his thoughts, whereby was discouered his impudent dissimulations. Now let it with patience be moued a little, that the outward protestations of this man vrged some there present to teares, not entring into conceipt of his inward hypocrisie to make a plausible definition of this perillous deceiuer, not by coniecture, but by proofe it shall be thus answered.

Campion noted to be verie vaineglorious.

Campion described.

Edmund Campion, as it is by men of sufficient credit reported, at what time he spent his studie here in England both in the hospitall, and also at the vniuersitie of Oxford, was alwaies addicted to a maruellous suppose in himselfe of ripe iudgement, prompt audacitie, and cunning conueiance in his schole points: wherethrough he fell into a proud and vaineglorious iudgement, practising to be eloquent in phrase, and so fine in his quirks and fantasticall coniectures, that the ignorant he won by his smoth deuises, some other affecting his pleasant imaginations he charmed with subtiltie and choked with sophistrie. The learned, who beheld his practises and peremptorie order of life, pitieng his follie, and wishing him a more staied determination, lothed his maners; yet loued the man, because christian charitie willed them so to do. Now this glorious Thrasо hauing by his libels made himselfe famous, and vnder shew and suppose of great learning (though indeed being approued, found verie simple to the speeches giuen of him) subdued manie to affect him verie much, when he was taken he knew it stood him vpon, not to lose the credit openlie he had wone secretlie. Wherefore in his former ridiculous maner, both in prison, at his arreignment, yea and at his death, he continued the same in all points, which the fondnesse of his treasons blemished euerie waie. Now indeed, as our English nation is both louing and pitifull: so manie seeing the gifts of God so well bestowed on the man, and by him applied to so great abuse, through naturall kindnesse bemoned his case, wishing he had not fallen into so traitorous a cause. Then was moued to him againe his treasons and hainous offenses against the queenes maiestie, which impudentlie he still denied, seeming to vtter words on the behalfe of one Richardson, one likewise of the condemned traitors, taking on his conscience that it was not he. Which hath bin proued to the contrarie, for that it is knowne how this Richardson is he, who distributed Campions libels and bookes abrode: and when he was put to his oth, whether it was he or no, he refused to sweare on his behalfe. And because the world might be fullie resolued, that (notwithstanding

An aduertisement and defense for truth against hir backebiters, and speciallie against the whispering fauourers and colourers of Campions and the rest of his confederats treasons.

ALthough at the late arreignements at Westminster of Edmund Campion, & other his complices condemned there of sundrie high treasons, it was manifestlie declared and fullie prooued, how they all, vnder pretense of the names of Iesuits, seminarie priests, & other persons of like condition, had secretlie come into this realme, by sending of sundrie persons authorised by the pope, to moue the people by their secret persuasions to change their professions in the matter of religion, of long time quietlie established in this realme, and to be reconciled to the obedience of the pope, and withdrawen from their naturall allegiance due to the quænes maiestie, and by these meanes to be readie in their hearts and minds and otherwise prouided, to ioine their forces as well with such as their heads and superiors which sent them intended spedilie to procure to be sent into this relme, as with other rebellious subiects by them to be thereto also excited, of purpose to depriue hir maiestie of hir life, crowne, and dignitie; in like maner as latelie hath beene notoriouslie attempted and put in execution by doctor Sanders an arrant and detestable traitor, and whilest he liued one of the said Campions companions, and by other English and Irish Iesuits and traitors in Ireland, where they had first by their like secret meanes and persuasions, intised a great multitude of people of that land, first to change their profession of religion, and to acknowledge the popes authoritie, and to renounce the iust authoritie of hir maiestie; & so departing from their allegiance, vpon the arriuall of forren forces they did enter into a manifest rebellion, against the which almightie God the iust auenger of rebels by his goodnesse hath giuen hir maiestie (through hir good ministers) power to the vanquishing, not onelie of those forren forces, but also of a great number of the rebels there. Yet it is maliciouslie, falselie, and traitorouslie by some of the secret fauourers of the said Campion, and other the said condemned traitors whispered in corners, that the offenses of these traitors were but for their secret attemptings as Iesuits, by exhorting and teaching; with shriuing, massing, and such like acts, to moue people to change their religion, & to yeld their obedience to the pope as Christs vicar (although the same be of themselues offenses verie heinous, and seeds of sedition not allowable by the laws of the realme) whereas in verie truth neuertheless it did manifestlie appere vpon their indictments, and at their arreignements, by sundrie confessions of some of their owne companions, and by manie good proofes and witnesses produced and sworne before their faces, that their facts whereof they were arreigned and condemned, were such as were in truth hie tresons committed against hir maiesties roiall person, and against the ancient lawes and statutes of this realme, which manie hundred yeres past were in force against like traitors, and not for facts of doctrine or religion, nor yet for offenses against anie late or new statutes, the same being manie conspiracies at sundrie times beyond the seas, at Rome in Italie and other places, and lastlie at Rheimes in France, where there are nourished by the popes authoritie in seminaries multitudes of English Iesuits, seminarie priests, and fugitiues, whereof their heads and gouernors vse continuallie in their sermons, and in their bookes publikelie printed, as traitors to declare their traitorous minds as far forth as they can, to the depriuation of the quænes maiestie of hir life and crowne: to which ends the said Campion and his said companions, by procurement of their said heads, came secretlie into this realme, to moue the subiects to renounce their naturall obedience; & according to a bull of the last pope Pius published to persuade all sorts with whom they durst secretlie deale, that hir maiestie by the said popes excommunication was not the lawfull quæne of the realme, nor that the subiects were bound to obeie anie of hir lawes or ministers: but that they were all free, and discharged of their obedience and allegiance, and that they might lawfullie, yea that when time might serue, they ought to take armes against hir maiestie, as in the late rebellion in the north was manifestlie by like meanes put in execution, and as now also latelie was notoriouslie attempted in Ireland, by stirring vp the people in the popes name, and vnder his standard to an open generall rebellion. And to haue brought these things to passe in this realme, was the comming into this realme of the said Campion and his complices most manifestlie tried and prooued; as if by Gods goodnes by their apprehensions, after their secret wandrings and disguisings of themselues in a great part of the shires of the realme, these traitors had not beene now staied, and by iust punishments ordered to be executed, there would haue appeared such mischiefe as is lamentable to be thought of; to the danger of hir maiesties person, and to the hazard and ruine of the whole realme by inuasion of the same with forren enimies, and by raising of inward warre within the realme; the end and euent whereof, as of warre ciuill, can not be without great greefe mentioned or imagined.

The true occasion of Campions & other of his stampe comming into England.

The cruell practises of the Iesuits in Ireland.

The proceeding of iustice against Campion, &c. defamed.

Campion and his complices offense was rank treason.

The sum and drift of pope Pius his seditious bull.

Much mischiefe preuented by the timelie attaching of Campion and his like.

And to the further reproofe and condemnation of the said Campion and other the traitours now condemned, they being all seuerallie and earnestlie required at the place of their arreignement to declare what they thought of the said popes bull (by which hir maiestie was in the popes intention depriued of the crowne) and of doctor Sanders, and of Bristowes traitorous writings in maintenance of the said bull, and allowance of the rebellion in the north, and of Sanders traitorous actions in Ireland; and being likewise demanded what they did thinke if the present pope should publish the like bull: none of them all, but one onelie named Ruthton, could be persuaded by anie their answers to shew in anie part their mislikings either of the former bull, or of doctor Sanders, or Bristowes traitorous writings or actions, or of the pope that now is, if he should now publish the like bull against hir maiestie; so as they did apparantlie shew their traitorous harts still fired to persist in their diuelish minds against their naturall allegiance: whereof God giue all good subiects, being true Englishmen borne, grace to beware, and in no sort to giue eare or succour to such pernicious traitors, howsoeuer they shall be couered with hypocrisie, & false and fained holines of Rome.

How the traitors stood optioned to the said factious bull, &c.

This aduertisement read and heard, the time by pitifull delaies began to passe awaie, in somuch that the executioner was now to fall to his charge: wherupon Campion was exhorted to praie with the people in English; naie, to doo so he was desired, howbeit he would not: but said his Pater noster in Latine, and desired all those of the household of faith to saie one Credo for him. Manie indirect answers he made, as when he was moued to aske the queene forgiuenesse, and when the preacher requested him to shew some signe of a penitent sinner, then shortlie he replied: You and I, weare not of one religion. After a few silent praiers to himselfe, the cart was drawen awaie, & he committed to the merice of God. There he hanged till he was dead, when being cut downe, he was bowelled and quartered, according as it was appointed by iustice. Rafe Sherwin seemed a man of better iudgement, more learned, and more obedient; he said the Lords praier in English, beléeuing in God that made him, in Christ his sonne that saued him, and in the Holieghost that sanctified him: and according to the saieng of S. Augustine, desired Jesus, that he would be to him Jesus, as much to saie, as his sauiour and redéemer. He likewise confessed himselfe a catholike man and a préest, intending to die in that faith. But when the treasons were moued to him, he likewise did make denial thereof. He asked the queenes maiestie forgiuenesse, and desired that she might long liue and reigne ouer vs. Then was read to him the booke of the aduertisement, which before had béene read to Campion, and after a few praiers he likewise ended his life. Alexander Brian seemed more obstinat and impious, using verie little signe of repentance and hartie humilitie: he vsed manie praiers to himselfe, and spake verie little worthie the rehearsall. Iustice being executed on him, he and Sherwin were quartered, according as Campion had béene before them.

Rafe Sherwins behauiour at his death.

Alexander Brians demeanour at his death.

¶ No sooner had iustice giuen the blow of execution, and cut off the foresaid offendors from the earth; but certeine enimies to the state politike and ecclesiastike, greatlie fauouring them, and their cause, which they falslie gaue out to be religion, dispersed abroad their libels of most impudent deuise, tending to the iustifieng of the malefactors innocencie, to the heinous and vnrecompensable defamation of the course of iustice and iudgement against them commensed and finished: in somuch that speaking of the daie whereon they died, they blushed not to intitle them martyrs, saieng among other things not publishable, as in these few verses extracted followeth:

Vna dies viuos pariter cæsósque videbat,
In cœlum missos vidit & vna dies:
Aeternisque breui gaudent pro morte coronis,
Hæc sunt martyribus dona parata pijs.
Fœlix illa dies mensis fuit illa Decembris,
Martyrijs donans cœlica regna tribus:

Thus slanderouslie against the administration of iustice scattered these vipers brood their lieng reports, therein to the skies aduancing the children of iniquitie as spotlesse; yea forging most monstruous fables, put them in print; as though God and nature had suffered violence to their vnappeaseable indignation, for that men of such integritie forsooth and extraordinarilie sanctified, suffered so shamefull a death: in somuch that it was bruted abroad not by men, but brute beasts, that on the selfe same daie wheron Campion was executed, the riuer of Thams did neither ebb nor flow, but stood still. O miracle! Whether this were a lie or not, as all the world may sweare it was no truth; this is certeine and vndoubted, that there was found a faultie about Campion a litle before his death, wherein authoritie was giuen him from the bishop of Rome Gregorie the thirteenth, to execute the sentence of the bull published by Pius Quintus against all the queens maiesties subiects as heretiks, &c: and yet this man forsooth (albeit notorious) died not for treason but for religion, as with fowle mouths they are not ashamed to saie:

Religio crimen non mala vita fuit.

But of this matter inough, & now to the processe of English accidents after this tragicall narration.]

Monsieur duke of Anion departeth out of England.

When the queene of England and the monsieur euen duke of Aniou vnderstood by report made to hir maiestie and his highnesse by monsieur de Puyneaur (who had bene sent ouer a litle before from the duke to the prince of Orange, and had prosecuted the treatie the former yeares as his ordinarie ambassador) what good will and great longing he had found in the prince of Orange, who was come into the Ile of Walkeren with a great number of gentlemen, and with the deputies of the states, and of the chiefest of the best cities of the low countrie to receiue his highnesse, and to dow him most humble seruice: and when they had also heard the ambassage of the lords of Dhain & Junius, sent from the lords of the state to the duke, to shew vnto him the exceeding great desire which all the people had to see his highnes, for the present ratifieng of the former couenants that had passed betwixt them: for accomplishing whereof it was needfull that he should passe ouer with all speed: whereby the same thing was confirmed which had bene declared oft afore by the lord of mount saint Aldegond, ordinarie ambassador to hir maiestie and his hignes: vpon the intelligence of these things, it was resolued by hir maiestie & his highnes, that the monsieur should depart. Whereupon the queene calling the lord Howard, commanded him (for the earle of Lincolne was then sicke) to take vpon him the charge of the admerals ship, and to go to Rochester, and there to chose vessels meet for transporting of the monsieur & his traine, & to furnish them with men of war, mariners, and all manner of necessaries as well of war as of vittels. Which thing was done with such diligence and speed, that the ships being readie with all things in lesse than eight daies, passed out of the riuer of Rochester and the Thames, and were conueied to the downes nere to the towne of Sandwich, where the monsieur was to take shipping. And for so much as the monsieur came into England accompanied but with a few princes and lords, & they also had left their traine in France, & some of the same lords were sent backe againe afterward by his commandement and for his seruice; the queene determined to giue him a companie & traine meet for his greatnesse, taking his iournie about so great & noble exploit. And therfore (as agreeing with hir highnesse hart) she commanded the earle of Leicester master of hir horses, the lord of Hunsdon gouernour of Berwike hir maiesties nere kinsman,

The queenes maiestie lodgeth at Rochester.

The queenes maiestie accompanied the monsieur to Canturburie where they & their traine parted.

and the lord Howard the viceadmerall (of whom the first two were of hir priuie councell, and all three were knights of the order of the garter) to attend vpon him, and to assemble as great a number of English lords and gentlemen as could be gotten in so litle time, to honour him withall: whereunto the said lords obeied verie willinglie. And there went with them to accompanie them, the lord Willoughbie, the lord Windsore, the lord Sheffield, the lord Howard, the lord Awdleie second sonne to the late duke of Norffolke: master Philip Sidneie nephue to the forenamed erle of Leicester, sir George Careie, and master John & Robert Careie all three sonnes of the said lord of Hunsdon; master William Howard brother of the said lord Howard, sir Thomas Sherleie, sir Thomas Perot, sir William Russell, sir William Drurie, & sir George Bowser knights, and a great number of gentlemen; namelie, master Henrie Windsore brother to the lord Windsore, master ſter Iohn Bozough bzother to the lozd Bozough, maſter Walter Ralegh, maſter Georze Carew, maſter Edward Hobbie, maſter Francis Darcie, maſter Michaell Stanhope, maſter William Knols maſter Francis Knolles, maſter Georze Digbie, maſter Thomas Vauaſor, maſter Anthonie Wildemaie, maſter Henrie Nowell, maſter Nicholas Gorges, maſter Michaell Harecourt, maſter Fulke Greuill: ſo as the whole traine that attended vpon the ſaid earle, was to the number of an hundzed gentlemen, and moze than thzee hundzed ſeruingmen. The lozd of Hunſdon had of gentlemen and others togither to the number of a hundzed and fiftie: and the lozd Howard had as manie; beſides manie moze, whereof diuerſe were hir maieſties ſeruants. The quæne determined to accompanie the monſieur to the ſea ſide, & yet neuertheleſſe commanded the ſaid lozds to kæpe their courſe, and to attend vpon his highneſſe to the ſaid place, with all maner of ſolemnities, interteinments, and feaſtings. He on the other ſide deſired and beſought hir maieſtie not to depart from London, as well for that the iournie would be painefull vnto hir; and for that he ſaw the weather faire and wind fauozable, and therefoze was loth to loſe anie occaſion of perfozming his voiage with all ſpæd. But he could not preuaile.

The queenes maieſtie lodgeth at Rochſter.

Wherevpon hir maieſtie toke hir iournie with hir whole court, the firſt daie of Febzuarie, & lodged that night at Rochester. The nert daie abiding ſtill at Rochester, hir maieſtie ſhewed him all hir great ſhips which were in that place, into moſt whereof his highneſſe and the prince and lozds of his traine entered, not without great admiration of the French lozds & gentlemen, who confeſſed that of good right the quæne of England was repozted to be ladie of the ſeas. Alſo he beheld how all thoſe ſhips were readie furniſhed and well appointed. And hir maieſtie told him that all thoſe veſſels & the furniture of them ſhould doo him ſeruice, when ſoeuer he would imploie them: for the which he moſt humblie thanked hir maieſtie, and ſo after all the great ordinance had bæne ſhot off, they returned for that daie againe to Rochester. The third day they went to Sittingborne, where dining both togither, the quæne was ſerued after the Engliſh manner by the greateſt ladies of hir court; and the monſieur after the French manner by the gentlemen of his traine, which ladies and gentlemen dined afterwards togither. Then his highneſſe beſought hir maieſtie againe to go no further, declaring vnto hir that the faire weather paſſed awaie. But notwithſtanding his intreatance the quæne went on ſtill to Canturburie. At which place, after one daies tarriance, when ſhe had openlie feaſted all the French nobilitie, either part toke their leaue of other, not without great griefe and ſhew of verie great amitie, eſpeciallie betweene hir maieſtie and the monſieur. Which thing was perceiued alſo in the lozds and gentlemen of both nations, & likewiſe in the ladies, to all whome it was like griefe to depart after they had bæne conuerſant and had liued friendlie and bzotherlie togither by the ſpace of thzee moneths, without anie change oz alteration of good wilies. But the honoz which inforced his highneſſe, aſſwaged his griefe, and made him to prozceed on his iournie with the ſaid prince and lozds of both nations.

The queenes maieſtie accompanied the monſieur to Canturburie where they & their traine paſſed.

The firſt daie of the ſame moneth, whereas he was determined to haue taken ſhip, he was counſelled to lodge that night at Sandwich, bicauſe the wind was ſomewhat changed. Howbeit, ſome of the Engliſh gentlemen, namelie maſter Killegreie, maſter Diar and diuerſe others, to eſchew thzonging at their imbarking went to Douer, and there taking ſhip the ſame night laie a while at anchoz, and ſomwhat after midnight ſailed awaie with certeine other veſſels. The ſeuenth daie in the mozning about nine of the clocke, his highneſſe toke the ſea in thzee great ſhips of war. In the greateſt of them named the Diſcouerer, ſailed the monſieur himſelfe with the erle of Leiceſter, and the lozd Howard the viceadmerall; in the ſecond called the Sentinell went the prince Dolphin; and in the third was the countie of Louall, and the lozd of Hunſdon. Now as his highneſſe was yet at anchoz, there came a poſt from a lozd of England, who bzought him wozd that the ſtates of the low countries were reuolted, and namelie the citie of Antwerpe, and therefoze he praied him not to depart vntill he had moze certeine newes. Notwithſtanding this, his highneſſe determined to depart, and ſo ſailed awaie with fiftæne ſhips: and he had ſo faire weather (which continued euen vntill after his entering into Antwerpe, and his feaſting and ſolemne interteinement there) that the heauen, the winds, the ſea, and the earth ſæmed all to fauour his voiage, and to further the gladneſſe which the people ſhewed in receiuing him with ſo great good will.

The prince of Orange taketh order for the interteinment of the monſieur.

In the meane time the prince of Orange, ſæing the time fit, departed from Middleborough, where he had taried the monſieurs comming ſix wæks and moze, and came to Flushing to take ozder for all things that were requiſit for the honozable and commodious interteinement of ſo great a prince. At the which place, vnderſtanding by the letters of the ſaid lozds ambaſſadours and others, that the monſieur was departed from London and come to Canturburie; and therefoze thinking it would not be long yer he arriued there: he diſpatched monſieur Treſlon his viceadmerall of Zeland, with a litle pinneſſe called the Chaſe, to go befoze to mæt the monſieur: commanding him that as ſoone as he had diſcouered his flæt, he ſhould giue him a watchwozd thereof by the ſhot of two cannons. Monſieur Treſlon hauing about noonetide diſcouered the ſhips that were parted from Douer, and thinking that they had bæne the great flæt, gaue his watchwozd, which was the cauſe that a certeine veſſell went fozth to the ſea to mæt his highneſſe; but anon after perceiuing his errour, he returned to Flushing, where by and by the flæt of Douer arriued. Then monſieur Treſlon going fozth, found the monſieur and the great flæt betweene Newport and Dunkirke: where after ſalutation giuen and taken on either ſide, the monſieur ſtanding vpon the hatches of his ſhip, eſpied his owne ſecretarie named Nephue ſtanding likewiſe vpon the hatches of the Chaſe; to whome he ſent his ſhipbote, commanding him to come abozd to him, which thing he did, and there aduertiſed the monſieur that as concerning the reuolting of the ſtates there was no ſuch matter, but that all things went verie well, & that his highneſſe was waited for with great longing. That daie, by reaſon the wind was turned nozthealt, they could go no further, but were faine to caſt anchoz ouer againſt a place called Oſtend, where they paſſed that night, waiting for the tide the nert mozning. His ſhips were perceiued by them of Flushing, where after midnight arriued the lozd of S. Aldegond, who aſſured the prince of Orange, that the nert mozning the monſieur would arriue there with the tide. Wherevpon the prince of Orange and the prince of Eſpinoie with a great number of gentlemen toke the ſea the nert mozning: but bicauſe the tide was againſt them, and on the other part the monſieur hauing a ſide wind with him was conſtreined to haſt to the land. By meanes whereof the prince, being not able to come abozd to him with his ſhip, was faine to turne ſaile backe againe to Flushing, where the prince Dolphin had taken land alreadie & ſought euerie where for the prince his bzother.

When

the princes and lords had not their horſſes there) to go through with his ſomie on foot, and ſo entred into the citie of Middleborough in this order. Firſt went the magiſtrates of the citie with their vnder officers and miniſters of iuſtice. Next them the deputies of the ſtates of Zeland. After them followed diuerſe gentlemen of all the three nations, with the deputies of the cities of Brabant, and of the foure members of Flanders. Then marched the Swiſſers after their accuſtomed faſhion; in whoſe traine were a great ſort of noblemen and alſo gentlemen, of whome the moſt part were Engliſhmen of the retinue of the three lords ſent thither by the queene. Behind them inſued as it were in one troope togither, the prince Dolphin, the earle of Leiceſter, the prince of Eſpinoie, the countie de Lauall, the lord of Hunſdon, the lord Howard, and the reſt of the lords. Then came the monſieur himſelfe, hauing on his left hand ſomewhat more than halfe a pace beneath him, the prince of Orange, of whome he alwaies aſked ſome queſtion. After him followed his gard of Frenchmen, and after them the gard of the prince of Orange; and laſt of all the ſir enſignes that ſtood in battell raie without the citie, and ten others which had marſhalled the ſtreets vnto the market place, where all the reſt of the citizens were imbattelled. Throughout all the ſtreets from the gate to the monſieurs lodging, there were railes, and at euerie tenth pace on either ſide were burning creſſets. And ſo his highneſſe and all the nobilitie which accompanied him, paſſed on, marueiled to ſee ſo goodlie a citie in ſo little an Ile, and ſo neere to three other good towns, not diſtant one from another aboue one league. But moſt of all they wondered at the beautie of the marketſted, and of the common hall of the citie. His highnes lodging was verie well and richlie hanged and furniſhed, conſidering the ſmall reſpit that the inhabitants had, ſo as he was verie well and commodiouſlie lodged, both he and all the princes, noblemen, and gentlemen of all nations that attended vpon him. That euening was paſſed in feaſting, in making of bonfires in the ſtreets, in artificiall fireworks vpon the towers and ſteeples, and in ſounding of trumpets. The next morning the twelue deputies of the foure members of Flanders ſpeaking to his highneſſe by the mouth of monſieur Taiard the recorder of Gant, declared at large the great goodwill of all the people of Flanders towards him, and that like as they had beene of the firſt that had ſent vnto him, ſo they hoped to be of the firſt that ſhould yeeld all humble ſeruice and ſubiection vnto him. Wherevnto his highneſſe anſwered verie diſcreetlie, as his cuſtome was. He paſſed the reſt of the time in plaieng at tennis with the prince of Orange, and after with other lords.

The thirteenth daie he had a ſolemne feaſt made him in the townehall, where his highneſſe commanded the tables to be prepared of purpoſe, that he might haue the companie of the prince Dolphin, the prince of Orange, the earle of Leiceſter, the prince of Eſpinoie, the countie de Lauall, the lord of Hunſdon, and the lord Howard. For the lords of England were highlie regarded & honored euerie where, both in reſpect of hir maieſtie which ſent them, and alſo for the worthines of their perſons. The feaſt was excellentlie well furniſhed of all things, & ſpeciallie of paſtrie worke & other deuiſes of ſugar; inſomuch that both the Frenchmen and Engliſhmen confeſſed, that they had not beene wont to ſee ſuch manner of ſeruices in their countries. The fourteenth daie the prince of Orange would needs go ſee the putting of the ſhips in a readineſſe, which ſhould carrie the monſieur and his traine, which were in number foure and fiftie, and therefore he would haue gone to the foreland of Middleborough. Whereof the monſieur hearing would needs go with him. On thurſdaie the fifteenth of that moneth, his highneſſe went to ſee the towne of Ermwiden, which is about halfe a league from Middleborough. And vnderſtanding that the Engliſh lords were gone to ſee the towne of Vere, (called by ſtrangers Camfer by reſon of the paſſage that was ſometime in the towne of Campe which is now drowned) he alſo toke bote and went thither, where all the companie was verie well receiued by the inhabitants, notwithſtanding that they were taken vnprouided. The fiftéenth daie his highneſſe was determined to haue taken ſhip, but there aroſe ſo great a ſtorme, that the mariners counſelled him to forbeare the ſea for that daie: by reaſon whereof his imbarking was deferred till the next morow, at which time his highneſſe with all his traine ſailed awaie. He himſelfe was caried in a ſhip painted all ouer with his owne colours beſet with a number of flags and penſils of the armes of Anion. The reſt due had their accuſtomed flags ſo greatlie feared of the Spaniards, belaied with the colours of the princes of Orange. This fleet came that daie againſt Beerland in the Ile of ſouth Beueland, where they caſt anchor and ſpent that night there. The next daie being arriued luckilie at Liſſo, after manie ſhot of ordinance from the fort and from the ſhips of warre which accompanied his highneſſe, they did caſt anchor againe. He himſelfe went aland, and laie that night in the captens lodging longing for the morning. This fort of Liſſo is builded a three leagues beneath Antwerpe vpon the point of a dike or cauſete in the parith of Liſſo. The place is ſo commodious, that with a muſket a man may eaſilie ſhot from the one banke of the riuer Skeld to the other; and by reaſon that the ſtreame of the riuer and the tide of the ſea, which paſſeth that waie twiſe a daie, doo make it crooked, that place being occupied by the enimie, might greatlie hinder and annoie the ſailing thereof. And therefore the citizens of Antwerpe following the aduiſe and platforme laid forth by the prince of Orange, beſtowed great coſt in fortifieng that place, which hath a great tower with great bulworks rampires, and ditches, and is ſo well ſtrengthned and flanked to the purpoſe, and hath the water ſo at commandement, that as now it is not to be woone by anie force. The next daie being mondaie, the nineteenth daie of Februarie, his highneſſe departed thenſe to make his entrie into the renowmed citie of Antwerpe.

First went the magistrates of the citie with their vnder officers and ministers of iustice. Next them the deputies of the states of Zeland. After them followed diuerse gentlemen of all the three nations, with the deputies of the cities of Brabant, and of the foure members of Flanders. Then marched the Swissers after their accustomed fashion; in whose traine were a great sort of noblemen and also gentlemen, of whome the most part were Englishmen of the retinue of the monsieur himselfe, hauing on his left hand somewhat more than halfe a pase beneath him, the prince of Orange, of whome he alwaies asked some question. After him followed his gard of Frenchmen, and after them the gard of the prince of Orange; and last of all the six ensigns that stood in battell raie without the citie, and ten others which had marshalled the streets vnto the market place, where all the rest of the citizens were imbattelled. Throughout all the streets from the gate to the monsieurs lodging, there were railes, and at euerie tenth pase on either side were burning cressets. And so his highnesse and all the nobilitie which accompanied him, passed on, marueiled to see so goodlie a citie in so little an Ile, and so neere to three other good townes, not distant one from another aboue one league. But most of all they wondered at the beautie of the marketsted, and of the common hall of the citie. His highnes lodging was verie well and richlie hanged and furnished, considering the small respit that the inhabitants had, so as he was verie well and commodiouslie lodged, both he and all the princes, noblemen, and gentlemen of all nations that attended vpon him. That euening was passed in feasting, in making of bonfires in the streets, in artificiall fireworks vpon the towers and steeples, and in sounding of trumpets. The next morning the twelue deputies of the foure members of Flanders speaking to his highnesse by the mouth of monsieur Taiard the recorder of Gant, declared at large the great goodwill of all the people of Flanders towards him, and that like as they had beene of the first that had sent vnto him, so they hoped to be of the first that should yeeld all humble seruice and subiection vnto him. Whereunto his highnesse answered verie discretlie, as his custome was. He passed the rest of the time in plaieng at tennis with the prince of Orange, and after with other lords.

The thirteenth daie he had a solemne feast made him in the townehall, where his highnesse commanded the tables to be prepared of purpose, that he might haue the companie of the prince Dolphin, the prince of Orange, the earle of Leicester, the prince of Espinoie, the countie de Lauall, the lord of Hunsdon, and the lord Howard. For the lords of England were highlie regarded & honored euerie where, both in respect of hir maiestie which sent them, and also for the worthines of their persons. The feast was excellentlie well furnished of all things, & speciallie of tailentlie well furnished of all things, & speciallie of tailpitrie worke & other deuises of sugar; insomuch that both the Frenchmen and Englishmen confessed, that they had not beene wont to see such manner of seruices in their countries. The fourteenth daie the prince of Orange would needs go see the putting of the ships in a readinesse, which should carrie the monsieur and his traine, which were in number foure and fiftie, and therefore he would haue gone to the forelland of Middleborough. Whereof the monsieur hearing would needs go with him. On thursdaie the fifteenth of that moneth, his highnesse went to see the towne of Ermwiden, which is about halfe a league from Middleborough. And vnderstanding that the English lords were gone to see the towne of Vere, (called by strangers Camfer by reason of the passage that was sometime in the towne of Campe which is now drowned) he also toke boate and went thither, where all the companie was verie well receiued by the inhabitants, notwithstanding that they were taken vnprouided. The fifteenth daie his highnesse was determined to haue taken ship, but there arose so great a storme, that the mariners counselled him to forbeare the sea for that daie; by reason whereof his imbarking was deferred till the next morrow, at which time his highnesse with all his traine sailed awaie. He himselfe was caried in a ship painted all ouer with his owne colours beset with a number of flags and pensils of the armes of Anion. The residue had their accustomed flags so greatlie feared of the Spaniards, belaied with the colours of the princes of Orange. This fleet came that daie against Beerland in the Ile of south Beueland, where they cast ancher and spent that night there. The next daie being arriued luckilie at Lisso, after manie shot of ordinance from the fort and from the ships of warre which accompanied his highnesse, they did cast ancher againe. He himselfe went aland, and laie that night in the capteins lodging longing for the morning. This fort of Lisso is builded a three leagues beneath Antwerpe vpon the point of a dike or causete in the parish of Lisso. The place is so commodious, that with a musket a man may easilie shot from the one banke of the riuer Skeld to the other; and by reason that the streame of the riuer and the tide of the sea, which passeth that waie twise a daie, do make it crooked, that place being occupied by the enimie, might greatlie hinder and annoie the sailing thereof. And therefore the citizens of Antwerpe following the aduise and platforme laid forth by the prince of Orange, bestowed great cost in fortifieng that place, which hath a great tower with great bulworks rampires, and ditches, and is so well strengthned and flanked to the purpose, and hath the water so at commandement, that as now it is not to be woone by anie force. The next daie being mondaie, the nineteenth daie of Februarie, his highnesse departed thense to make his entrie into the renowmed citie of Antwerpe.

The ancient historiographers describe vnto vs manie great triumphes, and stately interteinements of emperours, kings, and great capteins, and they forget not to put into their writings the great costlinesse and charges, and whatsoeuer else was set forth to the shew, to content the eies of the beholders. And albeit that neither gold, siluer, pretious stones, tapistrie, cloth of silke, fine linnen, diuersities of vessels, nor varietie of paintings were spared, but all such things haue inriched those shewes: yet notwithstanding, ding, there is not anie thing that hath yelded greater grace, beautie, and contentment to such assemblies, than the multitude and brightnesse of armorie and of things perteining to martiall affaires, as engines, artillerie, and shewes of cities and castels beaten downe or taken by force from the enimies. And therefore in the Romane empire (which excelled all the other not onlie in conquests, martiall discipline, and politike order of government, but also in sumptuousnes and royaltie) although infinit numbers of publike games and exercises were exhibited by them being the greatest lords of the world, who not onelie spared not anie thing that was in their owne power, but also made the cities and countries, which were anie waie bound vnto them, to send vnto them whatsoeuer rare and exquisit things they could come by, to serue their turnes in the shewes which they exhibited to the people: yet notwithstanding their triumphes haue so borne the bell aboue all the rest, that the word triumphing which commeth thereof, hath beene applied to all high, great, and statelie doings.

The triumphs of the Romans excelled all their other shewes.

Not that in their other shewes anie thing was spared, which might content the eies euen of couetous folke, or satisfie the bloudthirstie harts of such as take no pleasure but to behold the sheading of bloud, yea oftentimes of mans bloud before their eies: but in their triumphings nothing was so glorious as the armorie and personages of the great captaines that had beene conquerors, which thing contented the beholders far more without all comparison. And therefore when men intend to betoken the exceeding huge greatnesse of Rome, they terme it the triumphant Rome, which importeth as much as the rich, wealthie, and glorious Rome, replenished with great numbers of noble capteines, and valiant souldiors. And this terme is come of the great numbers of triumphs, which were seene there in the times of the Scipios, Paules, Claudies, Metelles, Pompeis, Cesars, and others. True it is that the other shewes also were verie glorious and beautifull to behold, and did (I wote not how) tickle the harts of such as were fed with the beholding of their riches and of the infinite numbers of lions, tigres, panthers, beares, and swordplaiers incountring one another to the death: but yet the beholding of a goodlie companie of men armed in goodlie armour, marching in good order (besides the contenting of the sight, which is far better than to see riches) doth also wonderfullie rauish mens minds, and driue the beholder into an astonishment, setting him after a sort besides himselfe; and yet neuertheless filling him with a ioy and contentation surmounting all others. For as in the pleasures of the bodie, those seene greatest which do most alter the senses with their pleasantnes: so fares it also with the delights of the mind, which become so much the greater, when admiration being matched with them, doth also moreouer rauish the vnderstanding, and set a man as it were out of his wits. And therefore when great personages (who can better iudge of matters than plaine simple folke can) do make discourse of things that are beautifull and desireable to behold: they speake of gold, siluer, pretious stones, pictures, vessels, tablets, and diuers other exquisit iewels: but yet they passe ouer those things & stand not vpon them. But when they come to talke of faire armour, good horses, and such other things as belong to knighthod and chiualrie: then they make such tariance vpon them, as they hold it for a thing fullie agreed vpon & granted, that in beautie and glorie nothing is comparable to a goodlie armie.

Other shews of the Romãs verie gallant.

A comparison betweene the pleasures of the bodie and delights of the mind.

A question vndecided touching gallant

Onelie this matter remaineth still in question vndecided; namelie, whether is the pleasanter sight, to see three or foure great battels of footmen well appointed in bright armour, well flanked with small and great shot, and with their great ordinance before them: or to see as manie squadrons of horsemen, or else two or three hundred ships furnished with their flags and banners, and ranged in order as if they were readie to giue battell. But as for the rest of all goodlie things, all men are fullie agreed that they come nothing neere to anie of those three, and much lesse do them all three together, if a man might behold them all at once: as it is reported that at one instant a man might haue seene the great armie of Xerres both footmen and horsemen ranged in battell raie: and also the two fleets of the Persians and of the Grecians fighting vpon the sea by Salamine, where by the wisedome and valiantnesse of Themistocles, the Grecians got that famous victorie of the Persians. In mine opinion that is the cause why the glad receiuing and ioifull entering of Francis duke of Brabant into the citie of Antwerpe seemed so goodlie and roiall to all such as saw it: in somuch that there hath not beene anie of them which hath not confessed that he neuer saw the like. And yet were there verie manie present at it, as well of the same countrie as of strangers, which haue seene manie statelie and roiall meetings, both in the same citie and in other cities of the low countries, and also in other great cities of other countries, as Paris, London, Rome, and Lions: and yet neuertheles the common voice is, that this last hath passed all the rest. And truelie the citie had no more but six daies respit to prepare for it, as I said before: in somuch that they could not put to making anie worke of silke, nor of gold and siluer beaten or wouen, nor anie imbrodrie: no nor in so short time make anie meane apparell new, nor anie rare costlinesse of imageries, pilers, triumphall arches, or other pageants: but were constreined to make a shift with such things as they had in a readinesse afore hand of their owne store.

The nobilitie that Antwerpe had to prouide for the triumphant shew.

In other interteinments there haue in deed beene seene great plentie of riches and roialties in attires of kings and queenes, princes and princesses, lords and ladies, citizens and their wiues; but in this interteinment no such were seene: howbeit there was not anie grosenesse, nor ought that might not well beseeme the neatnesse and finenesse of that people, although it came nothing neere the sumptuousnesse of other interteinements. As touching triumphall arches, chariots, portraitures, and such other shewes; although there were manie wittie inuentions and agreeable to the time: yet haue men seene of them in other places, which might match these. And as touching the number of their people, although it was great: yet it is well knowen that Paris exceedeth them in that behalfe. But the onelie reason of this contentment commeth cheeflie of the great number of people in armour, being not fewer than twentie thousand, in so good and so faire armour: and of their order and obedience, and of the small noise which all that huge multitude made: in somuch that if it had not beene for the thundering of the canons, and the sounding of trumpets, clarions, hautboies, and other instruments, there was no more noise than is among a councell of graue men. That then was in mine opinion the onlie verie cause, which was greatlie furthered by their beholding of the monsieur of Brabant, who representing the statelinesse of old time, was clothed in a large mantell, with the bonnet of his dukedome vpon his head: so that among that great number of people (which were so well armed, that three of the best cities in christendome could not shew so manie faire armors of their owne) his highnesse resembled a pretious stone or iewell set in fine gold. And bicause that they which were the beholders thereof (for they could not be euerie where, nor see euerie thing) will be verie glad to vnderstand of the things that so escaped them, and delight their minds now with the remembrance of the things which they saw before, as they delighted their eies and minds with the beholding of them that daie: and strange nations, to whom the fame of that so renowmed daies worke is come, will take pleasure to vnderstand the same, where of they could not be beholders. Therefore is this booke set forth, for the satisfieing of all men, and also to make it knowen to a number of men (who partlie for enimitie, partlie for enuie, and partlie for other surmises and mistrusts will not beleeue it) with what mind and affection the prince of Orange, and the other lords and noblemen of Brabant, the good cities, and the small townes, and namelie the most renowmed citie of Antwerp, haue received their new prince and soueregine lord.

The nineteenth daie of the foresaid moneth in the forenoone, the monsieur the duke of Anion departed from Lisle and sailed towards Antwerpe, hauing in his companie but twentie ships, for the rest had gotten to Antwerpe afore, as well to put themselues in a readinesse as for other affaires. And he came about eight of the clocke nigh to the new towne, and passing along by the townes side, left the foreland of Flanders on his right hand and the towne on his left, and passed beyond all the towne and the place where the castell was. By the waie he heard all the canons shot off from that part of the towne which faceth the riuer, & from a great number of ships which rode at anchor there: and he saw all the wharfes furnished with men of warre of the citie, well armed, who welcommed him with their shot, and were answered againe by the ships of warre that accompanied him, conducted by monsieur de Treslon and the viceadmerals, and diuerse capteins of Flushing. And so the first fot that he did set on land in Brabant, was at a village called Kiell, which is at the canon wharfe at Antwerpe. The states of Brabant, the magistrates of the citie, and diuers other states, comming in like order on horsebacke to the same place with their trumpets, sergeants and heralds, apparelled in cotes of the armes of Lothier, Brabant, and Limbosough, alighted there, and waited on fot at the wharfe to receiue his highnesse, and to shew him the good will and affection of the states and people. But the preasse of people was so great, which resorted thither to see the prince, whome they longed for to be their duke; and againe there were so manie impediments in his landing; that it was found better for them by the aduise of the prince of Orange to returne backe, and to tarie for his highnesse vpon a theater which was prepared for him.

This theater was set vp towards a corner of the castell, and opened towards the citie, to as his highnesse being there, might at one time view both the citie and the castell, and behold the countercastles: the deepe ditches full of faire water cleere to the verie bottome of the castell, inclosed on either side with hewne stone: the great and faire buildings, the goodlie walles, beautifull to looke on and verie thicke: and the broad rampires garnished with trees planted by hand, that it resembled a little forrest. The monsieur was brought vp to this theater accompanied with the prince Dolphin the onelie sonne of the duke of Montpansier: the earle of Leycester, and other English lords representing the queene of England: the princes of Orange and Espinoie, the countie de Lallall, the other English lords, the countie de Chateaurour, and a great nor of the barons, lords and gentlemen, besides the chiefe magistrats and maisters of the companies of the citie of Antwerpe.

The lords of the state of Brabant waiting vpon the theater, came hastilie downe to go and meet his highnesse: which thing he perceiuing, did stand still. When the prince of Orange stepped forth to take his place among the states, as one of the chiefe lords and barons of the duchie of Brabant. As soone as they had saluted his highnesse, and with great humblenesse kissed his hand, they mounted vp the steps againe with him, after whome followed the princes and lords of France and of England: and when they were come vp aboue, they ranged themselues on either side. There was set for the monsieur a chaire couered with cloth of gold, wherein he sat him downe. And vpon the theater there was likewise a trauerse of cloth of gold, and all the theater was couered with tapistrie. On the front of the theater on the highest part thereof were the armes of the marquesship of the holie empire: and a little beneath them on the right hand did stand the armes of Brabant with a wreath of fruits: and on the left hand stood the armes of the citie of Antwerpe. Also there were set vp two banners of silke azured with the armes of Anion, & in one partition were written these same verses:

O noble prince, whose footsteps faith and gentlenesse preserue: Receiue thou here the honour which thy vertue doth deserue.
That these low countries maie at length take breath by meanes of thee,
And thou a father to vs all in name and doings bee.

After that euerie man had taken his place, and silence was made, the states of Brabant began their oration by the mouth of monsieur de Hesselles doctor of both the lawes, secretarie to the said estates, and one of their councell. The summe whereof was, that the barons, noblemen, & deputies of the chiefe cities, and of the other good townes, representing the states of the duchie and countrie of Brabant, hauing now the good hap to see among them and to behold face to face the prince, in whome next vnto God they had wholie set the hope of their deliuerance, and of the establishing of their ancient rest and libertie, did highlie thanke the almightie Lord, which had shewed them that fauour, taking it for an assured warrant, that he of his infinite goodnesse and prouidence, had not forgotten nor forsaken their full quarrell: but had chosen his highnesse to be the defender of his people and the administrer of his iustice to the end that to Gods glorie, and to his owne honour and renowme, the stormes of all troubles, & of all other things that annoied their estate, might by the beames of his princelie maiestie, wisedome, and prowesse be chased awaie; and the brightnesse of their former prosperitie heretofore knowne to all nations, be made to spring vp & shine forth againe. In respect whereof they gaue his highnesse most humble thanks for the singular loue and good will, which he of his owne onelie motion and princelie disposition had vouchsafed to continue towards them vnto that instant, notwithstanding all the crosse dealings and practises that cunning heads could skill to put forth to the hinderance of their affaires, forasmuch as they were not ignorant that for their calamities and miseries sakes, nothing could haue fallen in, which could haue made more to the fauour and furtherance of their case. Which thing they had esteemed and would esteeme for euer, as a peerelesse president of his incomparable stalednes and rare constantie: for the which, and for the great number of his other benefits and gratious dealings towards them, they were & euer should be bound to acknowledge themselues indebted to his highnesse with all faithfull obedience, and were readie that daie (by Gods grace) to submit themselues to him, as his humble vassals and subiects. And although they doubted not but that that his highnesse did well vnderstand, and was fullie satisfied, not onelie of the generall causes which had vniuersallie moued the states of the prouinces of the low countries togither, to sue to him for succour, and to put themselues into his hands: but also of the particular causes, which the states of that duchie and countrie of Brabant had to renounce their obedience to the king of Spaine: yet notwithstanding, to the intent to put his highnesse in remembrance therof, and to confirme that sacred resolution and high enterprise of his, builded therupon; and moreouer to yeeld some reason of all their doings to the princes and noblemen, and vnto the rest of that whole companie, who for the honour of his highnesse were come thither of courtesie, to further the solemnitie of his interteinment: to the intent that at this his repaire thither (which alwaies was called joifull) they might vtter the more good will and gladnesse of heart; they would saie no more but this, that as long as the dukes of Brabant (speciallie since the falling of that duchie into the hands of the dukes of Burgognie, and other the famous ancestors of his highnesse) gaue themselues vnto the gouerning of their subiects by themselues, thereby making it to appeere that they loued them, and were not careiesse of them; they reaped so great commodities and notable seruices at their hands, that their names and puissances became oftentimes renowmed, yea and sometimes dreadfull to the greatest monarchs, kings, and common-wealths of christendome, whereof their warres and conquests made proofe: howbeit that of those things, as of matters familiarlie knowne by the histories, it was not requisit to make discourse in that place and time, which were appointed to greater matters. But after that their dukes and princes either by other allurements, or being withheld in their other countrie and seignories, began to leaue them for a time, and afterward at length to forget them, abandoning them to the pleasure and will, and sometimes also to the lust and couetousnesse of their vnder officers, whereof the king of Spaine had lastlie finished and perfected vp the worke, leauing them disdainefullie as husbandelesse and fatherlesse, vtterlie destitute of his presence by the space of twentie yeares; it came to passe, that hauing altered & changed almost all the whole state of the countrie, and committed the offices to such as by the lawes and priuileges of the countrie were not capable of them, or rather to such as would giue most for them, and yet the vnsatiable couetousnesse, malice, and exceeding tyrannicall lordlinesse of the Spaniards being not contented therwith: in the end, when they had abused the whole common-wealth after their owne lust, they grew into so great pride, that they fell to snatching of the priuat goods and substance of the inhabitants, to liuing vpon the labour and sweat of the poore: yea and to rauishing the chastitie of mens wiues and daughters: and (to fill vp the measure of all abhomination and crueltie) they fell to taking away the liues, & to sucking the bloud of those which sought by all meanes to please them. Wherupon in the end the great and righteous God (who hath a care of his seruants) being offended therat, made that people (who had aforetimes beene of great valour) to call to mind their former state and libertie: and gaue them both will and courage to maintaine the same, in such sort as they had receiued from their forefathers. Which thing they said could not be better done than by the election which the said states of Brabant, vnited with the other prouinces, had made of his highnesse person to be their prince and lord, of purpose to bring all things backe to their former order; hauing first sought (howbeit in vaine) for all remedies of their mischiefes, and of the disorders of the estate, from the causes and welsprings therof. Declaring that the dukes in old time had beene of great valour, prowesse, and power; and had made manie renowmed voiages and exploits of warre, and that amongest others, they had chosen a duke of Anjou heretofore, who had beene equall with the rest in chiualrie & feats of armes, as their conquests and dominions witnessed: that they had had their princes gentle, mild, gratious, familiar, and fauourable to their subiects: and that his highnesse had in that behalfe alreadie giuen such proofes of his gentlenesse, truth, and soundnesse, that to their seeming, some ancient duke of Burgognie was raised vp againe vnto them. Insomuch that in his onelie highnesse, they firmelie beleeued themselues to haue recouered whatsoeuer good renowme the duks of Brabant, Anjou and Burgognie could haue left vnto them. Wherefore, insomuch as there remained no more, but to proceed in the performance of the chiefe worke, which it had pleased the soueregne God to put into the hands of his highnesse, and of the said states to performe that daie: they on their part were readie and resolute to doo him the homage, fealtie, dutie, and obedience, which loiall subiects and good vassals ought to doo to their rightfull princes: of which sort they trusted in God without doubting, that his highnesse was, & that he would promise by solemne oth vnto God so to continue.

Hereunto his highnesse answered in effect, that intending not to hold the states with long talke, but onelie to be mindfull of the honor and good will which they had vouchsafed to yeeld to him, in that among so manie other great princes, they had chosen him out to deliuer them from the oppression and tyrannie of the Spaniards, and to rule them according to their customes, lawes, and priuileges: he thanked them hartilie for it, assuring them that the iustnesse and equitie of their case, their honourable dealings in his behalfe, and the loue which they had shewed him, had made him to resolue with himselfe to take vpon him their protection, and the reestablishing of their ancient libertie, and to hazard therein whatsoeuer abilitie God had put into his hands, and whatsoeuer else it should please the king his lord and brother, and the queene of England, of their fauour to bestow vpon him; yea euen to the shedding of his owne bloud and the spending of his life.

This done the foresaid monsieur Hessels told his highnesse, how it was the custome there, to proclame openlie before the people in the Dutch tong the points and articles of the joifull entrance, which the dukes of Brabant are bound to promise and sweare at their admission. Herevpon, when as one held the said articles translated into French, readie to rehearse them point by point after the proclaiming of them in Dutch, forsomuch as the daie was farre spent, and communication had beene had thereof alreadie, the monsieur to win time, thought it expedient, by the aduise of the prince of Orange, that they should be read but onlie in Dutch. Which thing was done by the said monsieur Hessels, with a new preface added to the articles, conteining briefflie the reasons and causes of that dealing. After the reading of the said articles, it was demanded of his highnes whether he liked of them, and whether he were contented to be sworne to them, or whether it were his pleasure to be further satisfied of them: Wherevpon he said to the prince of Orange, that forsomuch as he had seene the articles, and conferred of them with him as they came by ship out of Zeland, he held himselfe well satisfied with them, and was well contented to sweare vnto them. Which speech of his was forthwith proclamed, and with further declaration, that for their better contentation his highnesse was desirous to haue them all knowne, that although the said articles were read but onelie in Dutch, yet would he of his owne good mind, with aduised deliberation and certeine knowledge be sworne vnto them.

Then did the said monsieur Hessels recite vnto the people in the Dutch tong, the first oth which the dukes of Brabant were of old time accustomed and bound to take for the obseruing of the said articles. Which done, deliuering the booke wherein it was conteined to maister Thierreie de Leisfield chancellor of Brabant, he read the same openlie in French, & the monsieur spake it after him word for word. Then the monsieur Hessels taking the booke againe, told the people that the dukes of Brabant made an other second oth to the barons, noblemen, cities, boroughs, & all the inhabitants & subiects of the countrie, to be to them a good & iust prince, and not to deale with them after his owne will, nor by waie of rigor, but by law and iustice, & according to their priuileges. Which oth was likewise rehearsed in the Dutch tong, & the booke deliuered againe to the said chancellor, and the monsieur repeated the oth after him as he had done the first. Then were the mantle and bonnet of the dutchie brought vnto him, which were crimosin velvet; the mantle was trailed on the ground, and both of them were furred with powdered ermine turned vp verie brode. The prince of Orange told his highnesse, that it behoued him to be apparelled in those robes. And when he asked whether he must weare them into the citie? It was answered, yea: and that it was the solemne attire of the princes and dukes of Brabant of old time. Wherevnto when his highnesse had agreed, the prince did first put vpon him the said mantle, and fastening the button thereof, said these words; My lord, you must keepe this button fast closed, that no man may pull your mantle from you. And then he set the bonnet vpon his head, and said vnto him: Sir I praie God you may well keepe this attire, for now you may well assure your selfe that you be duke of Brabant.

Then the said Hessels told him how the custome required that the states should presentlie be sworne to him againe to yeeld him fealtie. Wherevpon he vttered to the people the forme of the oth; and then the said chancellor required it of the barons, noblemen, and deputies, and they pronounced it after him according to the maner of the former othes, reuerentlie doing againe their homage, and promising fealtie and obedience. After the taking of the othes on both sides, as well by the monsieur as by the states of Brabant, while his highnesse was yet still in his robes of estate, the magistrates of Antwerpe commanded their recorder and councellor maister Vanderwerke to come vp vpon the stage, to make him an offer of the marquesship of the sacred empire, in the name of the citie of Antwerpe, which thing he did as followeth. Most gratious lord and prince, the markegraue, amptman, borroughmasters, and skepons, the treasurors, and receiuers, the chiefe burgesses, and quartermaisters, the wardens, and ancients of the handicrafts, togither with the corpnels, wardens of guilds, and captaines of the citie, were verie glad when they vnderstood of your highnesse happie arriuall in the Ile of Walkeren, as they haue caused to be verie largelie and with all humanitie and reuerence shewed vnto you, by their deputies sent to your highnesse for the same purpose. But now, forsomuch as they se your highnesse not onelie arriued in the countrie of Brabant, but also receiued for duke, and for their prince and lord: their fore-conceiued ioie is greatlie increased and made fullie perfect, trusting that by this your comming there will once insue an end of the desolations, calamities, and miseries, whereinto the countrie hath beene brought by the vniust gouernement past, and by the more vniust and wrongfull warre which the enimies hold yet still to bring the whole countrie to destruction, with all maner of calamities and oppressions which they are able to deuise. And therfore they giue your highnesse most humble thanks for the paines & trauell which you haue vouchsafed to take to come into this countrie: yeelding infinitelie like thanks vnto God, for that he hath giuen & sent them such a prince, as not onelie is of abilitie and power, but also is verie willing, and well disposed to defend them from all enimies, & to rule and gouerne them with all good policie & iustice, according to the priuileges, lawes, and customs of the countrie. For although they be ioined in league with the rest of the states of Brabant, and generallie with all the states of the low countries, & that they haue all entred into armes iointlie togither; yet their so doing hath not beene to exempt and withdraw themselues from the iust gouernement of their lord and prince, but onlie to mainteine their ancient liberties, lawes, and priuileges, that being gouerned according to the same, they might liue with all dutifull obedience in good rest, peace, and tranquillitie. The full accomplishment of which their desires, they thinke themselues to haue most happilie obteined, sith it hath pleased God of his infinit grace & mercie to put into your highnesse heart, to take vpon you the souereigntie of these low countries, the dukedome of Brabant, the citie of Antwerpe, and the marquesship of the sacred empire. For seeing that God hath stirred them vp so great a prince, the brother of a mightie king; they haue no doubt at all, but that your highnesse will (by Gods grace) soone find meanes to deliuer these countries from the wretched warres wherein they haue beene so long plunged.

The markegraue, amptman, borroughmaisters, skepons, and other members of this citie, thinke it not expedient to repeat the causes of the warre, and the equitie of the cause whereon they stand; forsomuch as it hath diuerse times heretofore beene discussed largelie enough by the generall estates: and moreouer beene notablie knowne to the world, and manie waies allowed by your highnesse. Yet againe therfore with all humble submission and reuerence, they thanke your highnesse, that it hath pleased you to agree vnto them, and to promise the maintenance of their priuileges, lawes, and customs: yea and of the articles compassed in the principall composition, and in the ioifull entrance into the dutchie of Brabant, assuring your highnesse, that the people of the citie of Antwerpe, and of the marquesship of the holie empire shall be, and continue right humble subiects to you, euen to the spending of their bodies & goods, and whatsoeuer else they be able to make for the increasing of your honour and glorie. Herevnto his highnesse answered verie gratiouslie, that he thanked those noblemen for their good will and affection towards him; and that he meant to shew them by his doings how desirous he was to gouerne and rule the countrie with good policie and iustice. And all this he did at large and with verie great grace. This done, the said Vanderwerke turning himselfe to the people cried with a lowd voice, that his highnesse, as duke of Brabant, Alanson, Anion, Berreie, &c: should be sworne to the citie of Antwerpe, and the marquesship of the sacred empire, desiring them to praie vnto God, that by that so good and solemne deed Gods name might be sanctified, the safetie and prosperitie of the countrie procured, and the honour and glorie of the said duke increased.

Then was the oth, which his highnesse should take,

The oth that the dukes of Brabant were accustomed to take.

The mantle and bonnet of the dutchie of Brabant.

The monsieur created duke of Brabant.

The monsieurs prosperitie.

The states promise their loialtie and obeisance.

An offer of the marquesship of the sacred empire made to the monsieur.

The magistrates of Antwerps thankfulnesse to the monsieur signified.

The soueraigntie of what places the monsieur had vnderta-ken.

Antwerpe and the marquesship promiseth humble subiection.

The oth that the monsieur should take openlie read to the people.

read openlie to the people in the Flemmish tong by the same Vanderwercke. Which being done, monsieur the amptman read the same oth to his highnesse in French, and his highnesse made and perfourmed the same in his hands, which the burroughmaster of the towne of Antwerpe held vp, because the receiuing of the oth at his hand belonged vnto him. Also the said burroughmaster, whose name was sir Philip of Schonehouen, kneeling downe before the dukes highnesse, at the same time gaue him a gilt keie in token of subiection, and that he might dispose of the citie as of his owne: which keie was deliuered againe by his highnes to the burroughmaster, to whome he said verie gratiouslie, that he assured himselfe, that the said burroughmaster and all the burgesses and inhabitants of the citie, would keepe the citie faithfullie for him, as they had done vntill that instant.

After the finishing and accomplishment of all the said solemnities, the heralds of Brabant and Lotricke (or in the vulgar Brabant, Wallon, Lothier, that is to saie Lotharing, or the true Lorraine) cried with a lowd voice, God saue the duke of Brabant. And then sounding the trumpets, they made a largesse, casting a great sort of peeces of gold and siluer among the standers by. These peeces were of two sorts: the one sort had on the one side the image of the monsieur then duke of Brabant: the other sort had on the one side the armes of Anjou & Brabant, and about the verges was written; Francis of France duke of Brabant. On the other side of them all was a deuise of the sunne, with the monsieurs owne inscription, Cherisseth and Chaseth, which is the monsieurs ordinarie posie. Without the towne were three regiments of the citizens, to the number of a three thousand men in order of battell, who made a goodlie shew with their faire armours and their ensignes displaied. And they neuer went out of their place vntill all the ceremonies were dispatched, and that his highnesse was gone into the citie. Besides these, there was an infinit number of people in the citie, whereof manie were strangers, who maruelled greatlie at these sights, and especiallie the Frenchmen, who wondered to see their master in that apparell, and spake diuerslie of it, as is wont to be done in matters that are new and erst vnseene. But when they vnderstood how it was the dukelie apparell, and that he wore it as a representation of antiquitie, the like whereof is worne yet still by the electors of the sacred empire in their great ceremonies; they were astonished, and thought him to be a prince of more statelie countenance and maiestie than afore: in so much that it was said alowd among them, that seeing it was the mantell of the duchie, it should cost the liues of fiftie thousand Frenchmen, before it should be plucked from him againe.

As soone as the ceremonies were ended, his highnesse came downe from the theater, and mounted vpon a white courser of Naples, couered with a cassocke of veluet richlie imbrodered with gold. And so he began to take his waie towards the right renowmed and rich citie of Antwerpe, and was conueied along by the counterscarfe, vnto the sumptuous and statelie gate, called Keisers gate or S. Georges gate, whereat he entered into the good citie of Antwerpe in this sort. First marched the two sergeants maiors or marshals of the citie, accompanied of two pursenants with the armes of the citie, after whome followed the trumpets with the armes of Brabant. The first companie was of Almane merchants commonlie called Easterlings, well mounted and well apparelled after the maner of Almane. Next them followed the English merchants in excellent good order, all apparelled in cassockes of blacke veluet all of one fashion. Then came the coronels and capteins of the citie: after whome followed a great number of gentlemen, as well of the same countrie as of other nations. Behind them went the bodie of the citie, that is to wit, the wickemasters, the wardens, the ancient magistrate, the masters of the wardes, the burroughmasters, deputies, and wardens of the halles, the vshers, the secretaries, the regisers, the receiuers and treasurers, the schepons, the amptman, & the two burroughmasters, all apparelled in clokes of blacke veluet, and all of one fashion. After them came the trumpets of the states of Brabant, Lembourgh, and Lothier, & after them the states themselues in this order. First went the deputies of the vnder cities. The deputies of the citie of Antwerpe. The deputies of Brussels. Then succéded the noblemen of Brabant, as the chancellor of Brabant, and aboue him Lamorall Egmond brother to the countie of Egmond, baron of Gasebecke. A great number of lords of the same countrie, of France, and of England well horsed and richlie apparelled. The Swissers with their drums and fifes. The monsieurs owne household, among whome were intermingled certeine lords of England. Next this came the countie de Lauall, hauing on either hand an English lord. The prince of Espinoie, hauing on his right hand the lord of Hunsdon, & on his left the lord Howard: the prince Dolphin, hauing on his right hand the earle of Leicester, & on his left the prince of Orange: the markegraue of Antwerpe bareheaded, bearing the mace of iustice: the lord Peterson baron of Merode, taking vpon him that date as marshall of Brabant, and bearing the naked sword before the dukes highnesse: then came the duke himselfe, mounted and apparelled as you haue heard afore. Next behind the duke followed countie Morice of Nassau sonne to the prince of Orange, hauing on his right hand countie Philip of Nassau nephue to the said prince, and sonne to countie Iohn of Nassau, and on his left hand the lord Sheffield. His highnes was garded by the companies of the guilds, that is to saie, by the ancient brotherhods of the archers, crossebowes, and harquebuzers in so goodlie armour, as fairer could not be found: these went afore him and about him on a clutter without order, like flowre deluces vpon a rotall robe.

Lords of England and France well horsed.

The earle of Leicester on the right hand of prince Dolphin.

The companies of the guilds.

After them followed the gard of Frenchmen on a like heape, and after them the prince of Oranges gard on foot. Then lastlie in verie good order came the twentie ensignes of citizens, which had stood in order of battell without the towne. Ouer the gate where his highnes entered, there was a compartement of Doricke worke, wherein was written this title. To Francis the sonne of Henrie the second, and onelie brother of Henrie the third king of France, called by Gods singular prouidence to the souereigne principalitie of the low countries, and to the dukedome of Brabant, and the marquesship of the sacred empire, which God grant to be most happie and luckie vnto him, as to their inuested prince whom they haue most earnestlie wished for, and who as now is happilie come into this his most seruiceable citie, his most hartie fauourers: The senate & people of Antwerpe.

An interpreted congratulatorie to the monsieur.

The order of the monsieurs entering into Antwerpe.

The chariot of the maiden of Antwerpe could not go out of the citie for want of rome to turne in: and therefore it tarried for his highnes at the gate within the citie. This chariot was called the chariot of aliance: wherein sat a damosell apparelled in satin red and white, which are the colours of Antwerpe: who had in hir left hand a branch of baietrie, & on hir head a garland of laurell, in token of victorie against the tyrannies of the king of Spaine, and in token of the deliuerance which the people hoped for by meanes of their new prince, through his gratious godnelle,

The chariot of the maiden of Antwerpe described.

godnesse, faithfulnesse, victorieusnesse, and defense: to whom with hir other hand shée presented the keies of the towne, according to the verses written ouer hir head, which shall be set downe hereafter. Before hir were the armes of the marqueship of the holie empire. On hir right hand was Religion apparelled like one of the Sybils, holding in hir one hand an open booke, named the Law and the Gospell: and in hir other hand a sword; named Gods word: and on hir left hand was Iustice holding a balance and a sword in hir hand, and ouer the balance was written, Yea and Naie.

The keies of Antwerpe presented to monsieur.

Dukes.

Before the damosell sate Concord, clothed in white, yellow, and orange tawnie, bearing a target vpon hir arme, wherein was painted a crowned scepter, with two little snakes; and vnder them, two doues, all closed in with a garland of olife, betokening commendable gouernement with prouidence. Vpon hir head shée had a helmet, betokening Wisedome. In hir hand shée caried a lance, with a penon vpon it, on the one side whereof were the armes of Anion crowned with olife, and on the other side a lambe with a woolfe, and a lion with an ox, to betoken the great peacefulnesse that is loked for vnder this prince, as well in religion as in matters of state. At Concordes right hand sat Wisedome, and at hir left hand Force. In the middest of the chariot was a piller richlie made of Corinthian worke, vpon the top whereof was a Hart held betweene two armed hands, which hart had two wings, betokening Anion, Faith, and Force: and a sword with two serpents writhing about it, and holding their tailes to their eares; signifieng Discréet gouernement, and eares stopped against flatterers. At the foot of the piller was a compartement with the armes of Anion and Brabant. On the brest of the lion of Brabant, were the armes of the marqueship of the sacred empire, and of the citie of Antwerpe. Vpon the armes was written Attonement. Upon the corners of the chariot were two armed images with mozians on their heads, attired in orange white and blew. The one of them was named Faithfulnes, and the other Watchfulnes. In their hands they had ech of them a shield, wherein were painted two swords acrosse, and two doues with a sheafe of arrowes, betokening Anion. Upon one of the shields was written, Defense: and vpon the other, Offense; each of the images had a penon of azure silke: in one of the which there was a pellican killing hirselfe for hir yong birds: and in the other a hen a brooding hir chickens. Ouer the maidens head were these verses set:

Marquesdome.

Emblems of peace & tranquillitie.

Discrét gouernement.

Attonement.

Faithfulnes. Watchfulnes.

Anion.

Defense. Offense.

My rulers outrage, wickednesse,
and furious tyrannie,
Haue cast me backe these keies, which I had giuen obedientlie, Vpon conditions neuer kept,
ô prince of noble fame,
With better hoad of lucke and lot,
receiue thou now the same.
Thy godlines and prowesse haue of right deserued it.
O treble happie prince to whom these countries doo submit Their state! ô happie Belgike, ô most happie like to bee,
Which vnderneath so great a prince, maist now liue safe and free.

Sir gentlemen of the citie waited at the gate with a canopie of cloth of gold frized, which they afterward vnfolded & carried it ouer the dukes head, who went vnder it into the towne in the forementioned order. All the streets from the gate to his lodging were set on either side with armed men vnder their ensignes with their fifes & drums. The officers caried gilt targets and swords in their hands: and all the rest were armed after the best and godliest maner that could be séene. His highnesse proceeded forth on to the corner of the street called Gasthouse street, that is to saie, the Spittlehouse street, neere vnto saint Georges church, where was a shew made in the likenesse of a table, verie great and high, which was made by one of the companies of their tragicall and comicall poets, commonlie called amongst them rhetoricians. The companie was called Care, or as some others terme it, the Followsun, after the name of a floure which followeth the sun, & the speech of the deuise was, Growing vp in vertue. The shew or table had three compartements or partitions. The first was the first booke of Samuell the fiftéenth chapter, where Samuell chargeth Saule with his disobedience, & hath a péece of his garment rent off by him, in token that the kingdome should be plucked from Saules house & giuen to a better. Whereby was meant, that the souereigntie of those low countries was taken from the king of Spaine for his abhominable periuries, tyrannies, & extortions. In the second compartement was set forth, how Samuell commanded Jshaie the father of Dauid to bring forth his sonnes: of whome God would make one the prince of his people, that is to wit, the yongest, which was Dauid. In the third was shewed how Dauid being annointed fought with Golias, and ouercame him. The title or superscription was a Phrygian worke, wherein were written these verses:

I shew in the likenesse of a table verie great and high, &c.

The signification of the shewes concerning the K. of Spaine and the monsieur.

As God bereauing Saule of crowne and mace,
Did dispossesse him of his kingdome quight,
And after set vp Dauid in his place:
So now likewise dispatching from our sight,
The tyrans which oppressed vs by might,
He giueth thee (ô noble duke) the reine
Of these our countries, ouer vs to reine.

The front and creft being garnished with baners, scutchions of armes, crestets and torches, caried the dukes deuise, Cherisheth and Chaseth. And at the foot of the table laie Discord closed vp in a prison of latisworke, where she was tormented with hellhounds and serpents; and there were these verses following:

Alanson whom God Cherish aie,
Doth Chase all ire and wrath awaie.

His highnesse passing forth still beyond the place called the Thrœwateleet, came to the street named Hwluetterstréet, that is to say, the chandellors street, where was an other statelie pageant with armes, torches, and crestets, made by an other companie of the rhetoricians, called painters or violers, who had for their deuise, Knit together by singlenesse. In this pageant was painted the nére aliance of Dauid and Jonathas: to betoken the firmenesse of the oth mutuallie made by his highnes & the states of Brabant; and the magistrats, members, colonels, and capteins of the citie of Antwerpe. In this table was written in a compartement of Phrygian worke:

A statelie pageant important to the present purpose.

Like as the faithfull Jonathas did promise to defend,
Good Dauid from the harmes which Saule against him did intend:
So keepe thou vs (ô gratious prince) which loue to liue in rest, Against the tyrans by whose force
we haue beene sore oppresst.

Then went he further to the end of the street, where the vpholsters shops are, which part was full of burning torches & barrels of burning pitch, and so came to the Pœrebridge. At the entering thereof stood an oliphant bearing a castell of stone with souldiers and artillerie. Before the oliphant were painted the armes of the marquesdome and of the citie, and behind, a speare with a banner of taffetie, with the armes of Anion in a wreath of laurell, and foure other bannerets of crimsin tafeta, pulled out, wherin were painted the hands of Antwerpe, with this poesie: Cherisheth and Chaseth. And vpon his side of his bellie were these verses manifestlie written:

Whome light of Phebee heretofore did lead,
I now am drawne awaie,
Her brothers beames to follow in hir stead,
A farre more certeine staie.
I thinke my change right gainefull, sith I see,
These lower countries vnder him to bee.

Six enseignes with the ensigne of the youth vnder a greene standard.

Chaseth.

From the Merebridge he went along the Mere-street, vntill he came to the ward, where were foure companies ranged in order of battell. From thense he passed to the corner of Clare street, where was a stage made by a companie of rhetoricians called the Olife branch, who had for their posie, Behold grace. Upon this stage sat a damsell named Antwerpe, bearing in hir bosome a prettie daughter called The knowledge of God: who held a cofer wherin were priuileges, lawes, franchises and truth: which were kept by the Grace of God, and by Prouidence, Wisdome, Faithfulnesse, Diligence, Loialtie, Perseuerance, Vnitie, Good heed, and Order. And aloft was a compartement of Phrygian worke (verie artificiallie handled) wherein were these verses:

The monsieurs posie interpreted in a shew.

A damsell representing Antwerpe holding a cofer of priuileges, &c.

O prince, our father, hope of helpe and staie:
Dame grace, Gods impe, whom here thou seest to stand,
From top to toe faire clad in white araie,
With branch of olife in hir heauenlie hand:
Hath willed thee to harbor here within
The statelie walles of ladie Antwerpe, and
The loue of hir with endlesse fame to win,
By curing of hir griefes with law and right,
And eeke by putting of hir foes to flight.

Somewhat lower towards the midst, was Neptune with his three timed mace, riding ouer waues vpon a dolphin, & on his left hand were these verses:

Gods heauenlie grace, and soothfull skill, reuiuing Antwerpe new,
Through chare defense of faithfull league
haue kept hir safe, as dew
To thee hir duke innobled both by father and by brother,
Both kings of France, tone gone to God long since, still reigning tother.
And therefore bend thou now thy wits, by rightfull force to wreake
Hir cruell foes, which did so oft their leagues through falshood breake.

The ornaments of the arch aloft.

He passed from Clare street thorough long New street to saint Katharins bridge, right ouer against Crosse street, where was a triumphall arch cunninglie painted and builded of white stone, which was garnished with his highnesses armes, and with torches and crellets, and with muslke of hoboies and clarions. And on the top of it was written: To the happie comming hither of Francis, onelie brother to Henrie the third, sonne to Henrie the second, grandchild to Francis the first, now inuested duke of Brabant, the prince that hath most deerelie deserued of this their countrie, as a father of the same: The senat and people of Antwerpe. Underneath this in an other compartement of Phrygian worke, was written this: At length yet hinder not this impe to bring thee wroping world, againe vnto some rest. In passing thorough the short New street, & by the market steed, he turned toward the Cupers street in the street called Cheeselane to the great market place, which was full of torches of war, and of barels of pitch vpon long poles vp to the highest windowes, which commonlie are fiue stories high. In this market place were imbattelled six enseignes, with the ensigne of the youth which was vnder a greene standard, all in the best armor that was to be seene in anie place of the world. In the middest of the citizens was the great giant the founder of the citie of Antwerpe, whose curace was azure, and his apparell tawnie white and graie. He bore banners of azure with the armes of Anion, & had these giantlike speaches coteined in these verses, written before him;

A triumphall arch diuerslie garnished.

Feerce furie, moodie rage, vnbridled ire,
Stout force, hot violence, cruell tyrannie,
Nought booted me, ne furthered my desire:
In keeping of my wished souereignetie.
The surest waie for kings to gouerne by,
Is mildnesse matched with a prudent mind,
To vice seuere, to vertue meeke and kind.
For oft the calme and quiet gouernance,
Brings things to passe which violence could not win:
Feercenesse that case will nought at all aduance,
By mildnesse shalt thou better hold folke in:
Outragious storming is not worth a pin,
By mine example therefore haue a care,
All cruell dealings vtterlie to spare.

Behind the giant were written these verses:

See you this orped giant here,
so huge of limme and bone?
Fame saies that Antwerpe was sometime a thrall to such a one.

This giant was made by cunning to turne his face towards the duke as he passed by, and to let fall the armes of Spaine which he held in his hand, & to put vp the armes of Anion. Also there was a stage in the same market place before the towne house, full of nymphs & vertues. But forsomuch as it serued chieflie for the daie of his taking of his oth in the citie of Antwerpe, which was the 22 daie of that moneth: it shall be spoken of more at large hereafter. His highnes departing out of the market place, toke his waie towards the street called the High street, and when he came to the street called the old Cornemarket, there was a whale carieng Neptune naked with his three forked mace in his hand, which betokened the great commodities which the citie of Antwerpe receiued by the sea and by the riuer Schelt. Before this monster was an other naked man, and by him two other portraitures, the one of nauigation, and the other of merchandize, with a booke of accounts, and a purse, such as the factors do carie with them when they go to receiue monie. Before this Neptune, in a compartement, were written these verses following:

A cunning deuise of a giant turning his head.

A whale carieng Neptune & what betokened.

A monstrous fish hoyse of twentie foot high, & what it signified.

The lordship of the seas to thee
the destinies behight:
In signe whereof I Neptune yeeld
this mace as thine of right.
That Antwerpe hauing rid all lets by thee on sea and land,
Maie once inioie hir wished fruit, and safe from perill stand.

His highnesse kept on his waie thorough the High street, to a place where sometime was the gate called S. Johns gate, which was beaten downe the yeare before: in steed whereof there was a triumphall arch of Ionian worke. This arch was wholie applied vnto his highnesse owne posie Cherisheth and Chaseth. On high ouer it was straines a couering after the maner of a round vant, wherein was painted the sun: & vnder the sun was painted the sea with ships, and the earth clad with hir verdure. Also there appeared a cloud on both sides, so as the light of the sun did shine forth and yeld out his force to the earth. On the outside of the bowing of the arch were painted three goddesses: namelie Flora, who held hir floures in hir hand: Ceres, who had hir corne: and Pomona, who held a horne stored with abundance of all things. Likewise the earth was clad with greene trees, fruits, and fields, replenished with all fruitfulnesse: which thing came to passe by the heat and operation of the sun, which was betokened by this word Cherisheth. On the other side being the left hand,

An arch wholie applied to the monsieurs owne posie.

Cherisheth

hand, were drierie and barren fields, the aire euerie where lowring and cloudie, and the trees and plants withered: which thing was done by the three helhounds, Discord, Violence, & Tyrannie, who fled awaie at the sight of his highnes, according to the signification of his other word, Chaseth. On an other side stood the same posie againe, Cherisheth and Chaseth, by an other meane.

Six ensignes with the ensigne of the youth vnder a greene standard.

Chaseth.

At the right hand ouer the word Cherisheth was a great field well tilled, with a husbandmans house vpon it. The husbandman himselfe being apparelled after the French fashion was sowing of corne, and an other by him was spreading of mucke. At the left hand was written the word Chaseth, on which side also was painted a French capteine in armor following his allies, confederats, and souldiors: to do men to vnderstand, that by the treaties, leagues, and agreements made with the dukes highnesse, all tyrannie, violence, and discord should be chased awaie; and that by the beames of that sun, the countrie should receiue all peace, prosperitie, and abundance. Vpon the forefront were these verses painted:

The monsters posie interpreted in rime.

Like as the rising of the sun doth chase the night awaie,
And with his kindlie heat
the ground well cherish aie:
Euen so thy comming (noble prince) doth chase all tempests quite,
And folke with cheerefull hope of freedome much delite.

This arch was imposed aloft with scutchions of the armes of Anion, compassed about with branches of oliue, all vpon azure. Also there were diuerse other scutchions, whose field was gules bordered with argent, and a great number of burning torches. And the said arch was furnished with diuerse instruments of musicke, and the musicians themselues were clad in the colours of the citie. His highnesse passing vnder this triumphall arch, came to a place called the Dwure, that is to saie, the banke, where were two companies imbattelled, armed like all the residue. And so passing by the ward there, he went to the place that is right ouer against the mint: before the which there was a huge and monstrous seahorsse of twentie foot high, vpon whom sat a nymph called Concord, bearing a shield wherein was painted a booke and a rod, which was named, the Rule of truth. In hir hand she bare a flag, wherein was written, Faithfull alliance. This monster of the sea was named Tyrannie, and he had a bridle in his mouth with double reines of iron chained called Law and Reason. Whereby the dukes highnesse was done to vnderstand, that he as a true Perseus was to deliuer that countrie from all tyrannie, and afterward to gouerne it by iustice and reason. Ouer against the mint gate, where the street is narrowest, were two obelisks or round spires, and betweene them a triumphall arch with his pillers of Corinthian worke, gilded and inriched with his release vnder him. Vpon the forefront were his highnesses arms, and likewise on the sides were other armes, with banners, torches, and cressets. Under the armes of his highnesse were written these verses following:

The ornaments of the arch aloft.

A monstrous sea horsse of twentie foot high, & what it signified.

Full mightie is that common weale,
and in a happie case,
And blest with all commodities
through Gods most heauenlie grace,
Where prince behaues himselfe as head,
and commons him obeie
As members, either carefullie regarding others staie.

From this triumphall arch vnto the palace, that is to wit, all along saint Michaels street, which is a mile in length, stood on either side three score and ten pillers, with a space of two and twentie foot betweene piller and piller. Euerie piller was twelue foot high, and vpon the pillers was a continuall tarras, & on euerie ech other piller was a cressel: and on the pillers betweene were the armes of Brabant, Anion, and Antwerpe, diuided according to the spaces betweene the said pillers. And the pillers were dressed about with garlands of iuie. On the side of the street towards the palace was a pageant with banners, torches, and pyramides; vpon the vppermost part of one of the sides whereof was a crane, and vpon the other side a cocke: giuing knowledge as well to the heads as to the members, that watchfulnesse is needfull. A little spaniell betokening faithfulnesse, & a little lambe betokening peace, were painted accompanied with the Sybils; which represented wisedome, loue, faithfulnesse, obedience, vertue and honor, without the which no true peace can continue. And all these were guided by the light of the holie ghost, which was resembled by a certeine brightnesse that discouered the chiefe instruments of discord, namelie Enuie and Slander, who peered out behind, Enuie gnawing hir owne heart, and Slander hauing double heart, double tong, and double face, howbeit with small effect. For on the two sides of this pageant were two counterfets, on the one side Hercules, & on the other Dauid, as it were in copper, hauing gotten the vpper hand of Goliah, betokening strength and stowtnesse: and vnderneath was Concord, who held Discord in a chaine with collars about his necke: which Discord offering with his one hand an apple of gold, and with his other hand threatning men with his force and tyrannie, was yet neuerthelesse driuen into the dungeon of sorrow, where he is kept prisoner by Concord, who kéepeth the doore fast shut: betokening the same thing which the countrie loketh for at his highnesse hand according to his posie Cherisheth and Chaseth. Vpon the forefront of the compartement made of Phrygian worke were these verses following painted out in most liuelie forme:

Three score and ten pillers, with a space of two and twentie foot betweene each.

Proper emblems and their meanings.

Enuie and Slander.

Concord holding Discord in a chaine, &c.

O let the earth the kissings sweet of peace and iustice see,
And let hir powre hir riches forth in all mens bosoms free:
Let godlines and faithfulnes go matched arme in arme,
And let the bond of endles loue keepe all things knit from harme.

Before the duke came at saint Michaels, where the palace was prepared for his highnesse, the daie was so farre spent, that they were faine to light vp their cressets & torches, which cast so great and cléere a light through the whole towne, that the dukes highnesse, and the princes and lords which accompanied him, and likewise the souldiors with their glistering armors, were séene more cléerelie than at anie time of the daie. And as the multitude of people was verie great in the citie, so the nérer that his highnesse drew to his palace, the greater still did the number grow. So at length the duke of Brabant and Anion entred into his palace in the order afore mentioned, hauing moreouer a two or three hundred as well of offendors as of banished folke which followed him bareheaded and fettered, craning mercie. The heralds did cast péeces of gold and siluer abrode, as they had done at the métings of all the streets as they passed through them. At the entrie of the palace was an arch of twentie foot high, resting vpon three pillers of Phrygian worke; and vpon the top thereof was a compartement wherein were the three graces, that is to wit, Uertue, Glorie, and Honor, who offered vnto his highnesse an olife branch, in token of peace, a laurell bough in token of victorie, and a crowne which was sent him from heauen. And Light with torches and cressets as cléere as the noone daie.

Three graces Uertue, Glorie, and Honor in a compartement.

vnder the compartement were written these verses:

O prince whose merits passe his praise, whose vertues haue no peeres,
Whose mind surmounts his fortune far,
whose thewes exceed his yeeres:
Take gentlie heere this oliue branch, this laurell bough and crowne,
Three presents giuen thee by three nymphs, and sent from heauen downe.

¶ The oth made by Francis duke of Brabant to the members of the right renowmed citie of Antwerpe, and the oth made by them againe vnto his highnesse.

Twentie or thirtie thousand harquebusses shot off.

The duke of Brabant being come into his palace, caused a peale of a twentie or thirtie thousand harquebusses to be shot off, and then all the companies (sauing those which were to watch that night) began to withdraw themselues apase. Which thing was done in such order and with such silence, that in lesse than halfe an houre all the citie was disarmed; after which maner they had also armed themselues in lesse than an houre without anie noise in the morning. The princes also and the lords withdrew themselues to their lodgings, and then was all the great ordinance of the towne shot off twise, as it had beene at the dukes first comming to the citie, that all the towne seemed to be on fire. Tressets were lighted and fires made foorthe through all the streets and meetings, wales, and vpon the steeples, in so great number and so continuallie, that all the night resembled the daie: in so much that when they that were without the towne loked vp into the skie, they thought the element was all on fire. These bonefires continued euerie night vntill the next thursdaie; on which daie his highnesse toke his peculiar oth to the towne of Antwerpe, in doing whereof these solemnities insuing were obserued. The amptman, borroughmaisters, and skepens of Antwerpe came to the said palace of S. Michaell the next thursdaie being the two and twentith daie of the same moneth: at which place they made humble suite vnto his highnesse, that as he had vouchsafed to giue his oth to the states of Brabant and the marquesdome of the sacred empire, and likewise to receiue theirs; so it might please him to giue his oth that daie peculiarlie to the citie of Antwerpe, and likewise to take theirs at the place of old time accustomed. Wherevnto when the duke had assented, they toke their waie in the same order that had beene obserued at his entring into the towne; saning that the lord Edward de Clastro ambassador for Don Antonio king of Portugall, was that daie in the latter companie of the princes and lords. And so they marched along the said street of saint Michaell to the great market sted, where the sumptuous common house of the citie is. And bicause that on the daie of his entrance in, it was not possible for him to take a perfect view of all the shewes, by reason that the night ouertoke them, they were presented vnto his highnes againe, as well in the place before the mint, as in other places. Also there were two pageants more prepared, which were deuised both in one daie; the one was mount Parnassus wheron sat Apollo apparelled like the sun, and accompanied with the nine muses playing vpon diuerse kinds of instruments, and with sweet voice singing a certeine ditie togither written in commendation of his highnesse. This pageant was in the street called the High street, ouer against the street named Keiner street. Right ouer against this pageant was an other on the side of the street called the Flar market, which was a mossie rocke ouergrowen with drie and withered trees, wherin appeared a caue verie hideous, darke, and drierie to behold, & in the same laie lurking the three hellhounds, Discord, Violence, and Tyrannie: who feling Apollos beames, and hearing the sweetnesse and harmonie of the voices and instruments, shronke awaie and hid themselues in the deepest of the dungeon, and afterward peered out againe to harken whether that melodie and harmonie continued still or no, minding to haue come forth againe, and to haue troubled the common wealth, if the same had ceassed.

The night resembled the daie.

Solemnities vsed while the monsieur was taking his peculiar oth to Antwerpe.

Two pageants, one of mount Parnassus, and the other a mossie rocke.

His highnesse passed on, and with verie much adoo came to the great market place, by reason of the infinit multitude of people, which could not be put asunder without great paine. As soone as he was alighted from his horsse, he went vpa scaffold which had beene set vp for the same purpose, in the middest of the market place hard by the towne house; before whome went the magistrate of the citie, and a great number of princes, lords, and gentlemen. This scaffold being great and large of the heigth of fortie foot, was hanged with scarlet. Upon it was a cloth of estate, the backe whereof was cloth of gold frized, vnder the which was a chaire of the same. The daie of his first comming thither, there had beene presented vnto him on the right side, Wisedome offering him a golden scepter: on his left side, Justice offering him the sword of iustice from aboue the chaire: and behind him Clemencie offering him the cap of the dukedome. Before the chaire as it were at the foot of it, were Obedience, Faithfulnes, Loue of God, & Reuerence. And by the chaires sides there were with them, Concord, Sagenesse, Valiantnes, God will, Truth, Pitifulnesse, Perseuerance, and Reason, of whome two on either side held ech of them a torch of virgin wax, & they were all apareled like nymphes. But on this daie when his highnesse went vp to this stage, the nymphes were awaie; and in steed of them, the chaire was garnished on both sides with pillers. On the right side betweene the pillers was a lion holding a naked sword, to betoken the authoritie of the magistrate. Aboue the lion was an egle feeding hir yong, and turning hir selfe towards the shining of the sunne, as taking hir force of the prince. On the left side was an ox with a yoke on his necke, and aboue him a hen brooding hir chickens, and by hir a cocke. The ox with his yoke signified obedience: and the cocke and the hen betokened the watchfulnesse, care, and defense of the superior. The said scaffold was garnished with bannors of azure beaten with the armes of Anion, and with banners of gewles beaten with the armes of Antwerpe, and with cressets and torches. And aboue among the armes were written these verses in verie faire legable letters:

A scaffold hong with scarlet and richlie adorned.

A chaire of estate of cloth of gold frized.

Beautifull emblems about the chaire of estate, & what they signified.

At length thou art come,
and ioifull we bee,
Thy presence long lookt for here present to see.

1 Of triumphs, though statelie, kings boast but in vaine,
Vnlesse they by iustice vprightlie doo raine.

2 Nought booteth law, authoritie, or sage forecast of wit, Vnlesse to lawfull gouernement folke doo their force submit.

3 God, God is he the harts of kings which holdeth in his hand,
He, He it is that higheſt things doth make to fall or stand.
When he with gratious looke beholds a people: they inioy
A goodlie ruler, vnder whom no troubles them annoy.

1 A little vnder, at the right hand vnder the armes of Brabant, were these verses.

2 On the left hand vnder the armes of Antwerpe was written thus.

3 This was written somewhat lower.

But

But if misliking make him frowne, then makes he them a preie
To tyrants, vnder whom they tast of sorrow euerie daie.

From this scaffold he might behold before him an infinit number of people, readie to be sworne vnto him: and also three companies of banished and condemned men in fetters, and bareheaded, crauing mercie at his hand, which was granted vnto them. Moreouer all the houses about the market stead had crestets burning on high before them. Now that, after that rome and silence was made, their councellor and recorder Vanderwerke propounded the matter as followeth. Right gratious lord and prince, the markegraue, the amptman, the borough maisters, the skepens, the treasurors, the receiuers, the old deputies, the chiefe burgesses, the quarter maisters, the wardens, the ancients of the handicrafts, the colonels, the wardens of the guilds, and the captaines of the citie, your highnesses most humble and obedient subiects, are exceeding glad to see that you, whome they haue alreadie receiued for duke of Brabant, and for their souereigne lord and prince, are readie to make your oth vnto this citie, and to receiue it at the hand of the magistrats, burgesses and citizens thereof, in respect of the citie it selfe, and of the marquesdome of the sacred empire: assuring themselues that your highnesse will be vnto them a good, righteous, and lawfull prince, to gouerne them according to their franchises, lawes, and customes: and promising mutuallie on their behalfe to your highnesse, to be good, loiall and faithfull subiects vnto you, to spend all their goods, yea and their liues in your seruice, and in the maintenance of your dignities, rights and preheminences. And like as God hath put into your highnes mind, to take vpon you, first the protection and defense, and secondlie the whole souereingtie of the low countries and prouinces, which haue entered into league with you, vpon hope that the same God will of his gratious goodnesse and mercie so bless and prosper your dealings and enterprises: as that they shall out of hand see the effect of that communication in the hiest degree, to the accomplishment of your roiall and heroicall desires, both in the generall, and also in the particular deliuerance of the countrie from the calamities and miseries of war: whereby they shall haue the better cause to acknowlege the great good turnes and benefits receiued at your highnesse hand, and to honor, loue, and serue you, as the verie protector of the land and father of their countrie.

When Vanderwerke had made an end, and the dukes highnesse had answered him conformablie to that which he had spoken without the towne, the said Vanderwerke told the people alowd, that the duke was readie to take and receiue his oth, at the hand of the magistrate, and of all the people and inhabiters of the citie of Antwerpe: and that God had vouchsafed to send them a prince of so rare and heroicall vertues, of so great puissance, and the onelie brother of so great a king; that they might well hope, that the same God would inable him to rid these countries within a while from the great number of calamities and miseries wherwith they were oppressed. And for somuch as his highnesse had bene receiued with solemne deliberation of the states confederate, yea and with solemne resolution of all the members of that citie, and God had commanded men to loue, honor and obeie their princes: he exhorted the people to yeld him all humble obedience according to Gods commandement. To which intent, the oth as well which his highnesse should make to the people, as which the people should make to his highnesse, should be read vnto them; praieng God to giue such grace vnto his highnes, as he following the same, might well rule and gouerne; and vnto the burgesses and citizens of Antwerpe, as they might performe their obedience, like good, loiall, and faithfull subiects: that Gods name might be sanctified, to the benefit, prosperitie and safegard of the citie, and to the great increase of the dukes puissance, honour, and glorie. Then the same Vanderwerke read the oth which was to be made by the duke, with the stile of the duke of Brabant, and all his other titles. Which oth was read to his highnes in French, and receiued by sir Philip Schonehouen, lord of Waneroe, borroughmaster without the citie.

Which being done, the said Vanderwerke read the oth which the magistrate and people were to make, which was repeated word for word by the magistrats and a great number of people which were within the hearing of it. And this oth was exacted of the magistrate and people of Antwerpe by the amptman in the name and by the commandement of the duke.

Vpon the finishing of these solemnities, the duke himselfe did cast two or three handfuls of gold and siluer among them, & then the heralds cried Alarges, and the trumpets and drunts were sounded euerie where, and manie instruments of muslke were plaied vpon, as had bene done afore at his first arriuall. When he was come downe from the scaffold, he went to the townehouse with all the princes, lords, and gentlemen, which were verie manie: where he was receiued by the worshipfull of the citie, and dined openlie at a verie sumptuous and roiall feast prepared for him: and so that daie passed in great ioy, contentation and admiration, as well of his highnes & his companie, as of all the rest of the people. Towards night were shot off two peales of great ordinance againe, and the fires of ioy were continued much greater, and more in number than afore.

Thus ended the ioifull and roiall interteinement of the right noble prince Francis, sonne and brother to the king of France, by the grace of God duke of Brabant. The rest of the weeke and the daies following, the lords of the priuie councell, the officers of the aides, of the exchekers, of the chambers of the accounts, and of the other corporations, colleges, and communalties came to visit his highnes, and to offer him their humble seruice, promising all faithfulnes and obedience: all whome he receiued verie gratiouslie to their contentation, answering them so aduisedlie, with so good grace & fitnesse, without omitting anie point of that which he had purposed: that all men not onelie wondered at him, but also were inforced to honour and loue him, and to set forth his praises among the people. Finallie the deputies of the reformed churches of both the languages, being presented vnto him by the prince of Orange, were gentlie heard, and they spake to him as followeth.

Sir, we be sent vnto your highnes by the reformed churches of this citie, as well of the language of low Dutchland, as of the French, to shew vnto you with all humilitie, reuerence and subiection, that we haue thanked and still do thanke God with all our hart, for vouchsafing to bring your highnesse so happilie hither. And this our ioie is matched with the ioie of all other folks, as we hope your highnesse hath vnderstood by the glad and ioifull receiuing and interteining of you. Also sir we hope, that as the great honour and felicitie which these countries haue atteined vnto (wherein few countries are able to match them) haue bene purchased vnder the soueraignetie and gouernement of the right renowmed princes, the dukes of Burgognie, which issued out of the most noble house of France: so vnder your guiding and gouernement being of the same house, the ancient renowme of the same dignitie shall be recouered Banished and condemned men in fetters crauing mercie pardoned.

3 This was written some what lower.

uered by your prowesse, and mainteined by your wisdome. It is little more than three hundred yeres ago, that these countries being gouerned by sundrie dukes, earles, and lords, had not atteined the renowme which other nations haue since that time so much wondered at. The first that began to giue increase to it was Philip duke of Burgognie, surnamed the hardie, who was brother to king Charles the fift, the sonne of king John, and grand sonne of king Philip of Valois: of which kings your highnes is lineallie descended from the father to the sonne. For the first duke of Orleance, of whome your highnesse is lineallie descended from the father to the sonne, was the sonne of king Charles the fift; and as now there be no more heires males of the said duke of Orleance, but onelie your highnes and the king your brother. Whereby it falleth out, that the dukes of Burgognie are great vncles to your highnes by the fathers side. And therefore we doubt not but you will follow the footsteps of their vertues, in restoring the state of the countrie to hir ancient renowme and dignitie: and also mainteine and increase the honour whereunto it hath been aduanced, by those noble princes your vncles.

Under whom the state hath been aduanced.

Philip duke of Burgognie surnamed the hardie.

The second duke vnder whom this state hath been greatlie aduanced, was John the second: neuertheles it came not to full perfection, vntill the time of Philip the second. In which perfection it was maintained by Charls the last duke of Burgognie so long as he liued. The said Philip the second, to whom the honour of stablishing that state most peculiarlie belongeth, was one of the most knightlie and valiant princes of his time. He wan the victorie in nine foughten fields, in most of the which he was put to the triall and hazard of his person, by fighting with his owne hands. He was a verie sage prince, and such a one as had to deale with the greatest princes in christendome: of whome some were his aduersaries, and yet he behaued himselfe so wiselie, that he atchiued all things to his honour whatsoeuer he toke in hand. Also he was verie rich: insomuch that for all his warres which lasted aboue thirtie yeares, he left behind him more substance and readie monie, than anie other prince of his time, as the writers of the histories of that age do witnes vnto vs. And yet notwithstanding, for all these great vertues & qualities of his, he was vet named Philip the sage, nor Philip the valiant, nor Philip the rich, but Philip the good. So well do all folke by generall consent vnderstand, which is the vertue that best becometh and becommeth a great prince, & is best liked of his people: namelie, that a prince be good and louing to his subiects. Surelie sir, all men hope that your highnes will follow the example of that good prince, the first bringer of the state of this countrie to perfection, a right noble and renowmed prince of the house of France. And we praise God, for that as manie as haue had the honour to come into your highnes presence, yeeld record that you haue verie great likelihoods of these vertues, which we praie God so to accomplish and make perfect in you, as all his people may to your great honor receiue the perfect and ripe fruits of them. And this do all the rest of the people desire as well as we.

Duke John the second, and Philip the second, aduancers of the state.

Philip the second a verie rich prince, surnamed Philip the good.

He directeth his speech to the monsieur.

Holbeit, we haue a most humble sute to make peculiarlie to your highnes, which we most humblie beseech you to grant. The thing that induceth vs to do it, is that you beare the name of Francis. For as oft as we heare that name named: the remembrance of that great king Francis your highnesse grandfather commeth to our mind. He was a right valiant, couragious, noble and godlie prince: and yet notwithstanding all the nations of the earth did by one common consent surname him the father of learning. For of a truth, since that emperour and great king of France, called Charles the great, there was neuer anie king of France that so highlie fauoured learning, as this great king Francis. And as the said king Charles was the founder of the famous vniuersitie of Paris, so was king Francis the restorer therof againe: and both of them to their great costs & charges called men of excellent knowledge thither out of strange countries, to teach the languages & all kinds of arts & sciences. The house of this great king Francis was as an vniuersitie, and his table was a place of conference concerning all maner of learning. And like as other great princes of his time following his example, inriched their dominions and kingdomes with learned men and learning: so we most humblie beseech your highnes to follow the example of this great king your grandfather in doing the like, and to make singular account of learning, and to take the professours therof vnder your protection. True it is sir, that through the malice of men, warre is commonlie the ouerthrower of learning. But if a great prince set himselfe against the mischiefe, he may easilie stop it. Our desire is not that your highnesse should neglect the exercise of chiualrie, for to giue your selfe to studie: but to follow so the one, as the other be not left off and forgotten. For as we haue seene manie commonweales florish so long as they professed chiualrie and learning together: and yet haue fallen into the hands of their enimies, euen in the chiefe flowre of their skill in sciences, by reason of their discontinuing of their former trade of armes, after which maner it fell to the Athenians to come into subiection to the kings of Macedonie: so the people which haue professed armes alone without learning, haue alwaies become barbarous, cruell, and vtterlie destitute of all humanitie, as we see at this daie by the Tartars and Moscouits. And therefore to our seeming, a man may well saie, that chiualrie is the fundation and sinewes of a commonweale: and that learning garnisheth and beautifieth the bodie therof with liuelie and fresh colours, seruing it for inrichments and ornaments. In respect wherof, as we meant not to desire your highnesse to forget thos which make profession of chiualrie, whome you ought to embrace as your strength: so we most humblie beseech you to vouchsafe to succour learning, and to mainteine learned men with your gratious fauour.

A good sute to the monsieur, & the like of all princes and great men to be preferred and granted.

Learning and chiualrie must go together.

A sute moued to ỹ monsieur.

Sir, verie needfull causes moue vs to make this humble petition to your highnesse: for that we being professors of learning, ought to haue learning in singular estimation, and to procure (if it be possible for vs) that the frute of the things which we haue inioied for a time, may be conueied to our posteritie: and secondlie for the oths sake which we haue taken at the time of our proceeding in our degrees, which is, to mainteine and further the schooles and learning of the vniuersitie, in what degree soeuer we come vnto. And therefore we hope that your highnesse will do vs the honour to take this most humble request of ours in good part. As touching our owne persons, we promise your highnesse all obedience, faithfulnesse, and subiection: and that according to our small abilitie, we will do our indeuor towards such as we may haue accesse vnto, that they also may yeeld obedience to your highnesse, and to the magistrates whome it shall please you to set ouer the people. And here to make an end, we hartilie praie God to preserue your highnes a long time in happie estate among this people, and to giue you the grace to rule and gouerne them iustlie and vprightlie, to rid them out of the hands of their enimies, to mainteine them long in most happie peace, and Causes that moued the making of this sute.

He speaketh in the behalfe of all the rest of like profession and faculte.

Francis the monsieurs grandfather commended.

and to restore this state againe to the ancient dignitie, greatnesse, renowme, and felicitie: that after your decease you maie leaue a most blessed and famous remembrance among all nations. And for the bringing hereof to passe, we yet againe beseech the king of kings and great prince of princes, to make you as valiant as Dauid, as wise as Salomon, and as zelous of his glorie as Ezechias.

The moniter speaketh well what soeuer his meaning was.

Hereunto the duke answered, that he was verie glad to see such a consent of all the people in the receiuing of him: and that he hoped so to rule and gouerne them, as they should not be disappointed of the hope which they had conceiued of his gouernement, which he would fashion out after the paterne of his predecessors and great vncles, who had gouerned these countries so happilie. And he thanked them for their good will & loue, praieng them to continue the same, and promising to take them into his protection togither with the rest of the people in generall: & that as he had heretofore a singular regard of learned men, so would he be willing to continue the same hereafter.

A good state to the mōsieur, & the like of all princes and great men to be preferred and granted.

A good beginning in prince and people.

After this maner began this great prince to gouerne that people with great authoritie and modestie; and the people to yeld vnto him verie willing and honorable obedience: and all men hope both generallie and particularlie, that God will giue him the grace so to hold on in that so holie and commendable gouernement, as that by his example he shall shew to all princes and to all others that come after him, how greatlie the iust and lawfull gouernement auaileth: and that the people on their side shall shew what maner of obedience, loue, and constancie is due to good princes: in which vertues there was neuer yet anie people that could skill to surmount them, neither shall anie hereafter, by the helpe of the great God, and euerlasting father of our saviour Jesus Christ, to whome with the vnitie of the holie spirit be all glorie for euer and euer, Amen.]

Learning and chiualrie must go togither.

John Paine priest being indicted of high treason for words by him spoken, was arreigned and condemned at Chelmsford on the last daie of March, and was there executed on the second daie of Aprill, according to the qualitie of his offense, and as law had awarded. In the moneth of Maie, namelie, on the fifteenth daie at night, about ten of the clocke, a blasing starre appeared, descending in the northwest, the beard whereof streamed into the southeast.

John Paine executed at Chelmsford.

Blasing starre.

On mondaie being the eight & twentith of Maie, Thomas Ford, John Shert, and Robert Johnson priests, hauing bene before indicted, arreigned, and as well by their owne testimonie, as also sufficient witnesses produced to their faces, found giltie, and condemned for high treason intended, practised, and appointed against hir maiesties most rotall person, as also for the vtter ruine, ouerthrow, and subuersion of hir peaceable and well gouerned realme, themselues being sent as instruments, to deale for and in the behalfe of the pope, in this disloiall and traitorous cause; according as iustice had before determined, were drawne vpon hurdles from the Tower of London to the place appointed for execution; hauing bēn so long time spared, by hir maiesties most rotall and princelie regard of mercie, to trie if either the feare of God would take place in them, consideration and respect of their owne duties moue them, or the mere loue and accustomed clemencie of hir maiestie might win them, to acknowledge hir to be their lawfull souereigne, and themselues hir subiects bound to serue hir, notwithstanding any pretense or authoritie to the contrarie, & not for matter of their popish superstition. All this notwithstanding they remained giuen ouer to their owne wickednes, and swallowed vp in the gulfe of their vndutifull affection, which caused iustice to step before mercie, committing them to the reward of their lewd and vnnaturall dealing.

Execution of Thomas Ford, John Shert, and Robert Johnson priests of the popes order.

Causes that moued the making of this sute.

To persuere in wickednes is no constancie but obstinate.

All the waie as they were drawne, they were accompanied with diuers zealous and godlie men, who in mild & louing speeches made knowne vnto them, how iustlie God repaieth the reprobat, how fatherlie againe he receiueth the obedient, how he ouerthroweth the vngodlie in their owne deuises, and protecteth his chosen in all stormes and afflictions. In remembrance of all these, to bethinke themselues of their wickednesses passed, and to shew such hartie and zealous repentance for the same, that albeit they had so grieuouslie trespassed, yet in contrite and humble sorrowing they might be gratiouslie receiued into his heauenlie fauour, whome they had moued and stirred by their vnreuerent regard, to smite and chasten with the rod of his furie. Among which godlie persuasions, maister shiriffe himselfe, both learnedlie and ernestlie labored vnto them, moouing all good occasions he might deuise to change the obstinacie he perceiued in them, into a christianlike humilitie and repentance; but these good indeuors toke no wished effect, their owne euill disposition so blinded them, that there was no waie for grace to enter.

Consolation ministred to them as they went to their deaths.

The shiriffe himselfe trieth what he can do to conuert them.

When they were come beyond saint Giles in the field, there approched vnto the hurdle one of their owne sect, and a priest (as himselfe had confessed) who in this maner spake vnto the prisoners: O gentlemen be ioifull in the bloud of Jesus Christ, for this is the daie of your triumph and ioie. Being asked whie he vsed such words, he said vnto the prisoners again; I pronounce vnto you; yea, I pronounce a full remission and pardon vnto your soules. Using these and other traitorous speeches, hold was laid on him. When as maister shiriffe demanded what he was, he answered; He was the voice of a crier in the wildernesse, and that he was sent to prepare the Lords waie. And notwithstanding such meanes of resistance as himselfe vsed, he was deliuered vnto Thomas Norris pursuant, who brought him vnto Newgate, where he confessed vnto him that he was a priest, and that he had so long dissembled, as he would now leaue off and do so no more.

He was the eccho of a false and antichristian voice.

Being come to the place of execution Thomas Ford was first brought vp into the cart, when as he began in this maner. Whereas I am come hither to die, for matters laid vnto my charge of treason, which should be conspired against the queene, within these two yeares or somewhat more: I giue you to vnderstand, that of ante such matter I am innocent & free, for that I can proue my comming into England to be fiue yeares since. Whereupon maister shiriffe spake vnto him and said; Ford, haue mind on God, and aske him and hir maiestie heartilie forgiuenesse, whome thou hast so highlie offended; thou dost but delude the people, for it is manifestlie known how thou art guiltie of the matters laid to thy charge, here be thine owne answers to shew, affirmed vnder thine owne hand, and other witnesses to reproue thee. Whereupon * I my selfe was called forth, who iustified the causes to his face, that at his arreignement was laid to his charge, and he euidentlie and plainelie found guiltie thereof. Then were his answers whereto he had subscribed read vnto him, which is in the booke latelie set forth by authoritie. Whereupon he toke occasion to tell a long circumstance of a certeine question moued at Oxford, as concerning taking armes against hir maiestie, which horrible treason he seemed to approue thereby.

Then maister shiriffe willed him to aske hir maiestie forgiuenesse, offering him to stand his friend in atteining hir graces mercie, if he would change his former traitorous mind, to become a true and faithfull subiect, acknowledging hir to be his lawfull souereigne ladie, notwithstanding anie thing that anie pope could saie or doo to the contrarie. Where to he answered; I haue not offended hir maiestie, but if I haue, I aske hir forgiuenesse and all the world; and in no other treson haue I offended than my religion, which is the catholike faith, wherein I will liue and die. And as for the quænes maiestie, I doo acknowledge hir supremasie in all things temporall, but as concerning ecclesiasticall causes, I denie hir; that onelie belongeth to the vicar of Christ, the pope. In briefe, he granted to nothing, but shewed himselfe an impious and obstinat traitor, and so he remained to the death, refusing to praie in the English tong, mumbling a few Latine praiers, desiring those that were Ex domo Dei to praie with him, & so he died. In the meane time that he hanged, which was till he was dead, so great is the mercie of our gratious princesse, John Shert was brought from off the hurdle to the gallowes, where seeing Ford hanging, he began with holding vp his hands, as the papists are wont to doo before their images; O swæt Tom, O happie Tom, O blessed Tom. When being staied, Ford was cut downe & caried to the place where his bodie should be quartered. In which time Shert was brought vp into the cart, where looking towards the dead bodie of Ford, he fell downe on his knées, and held vp his hands vnto it, saieng againe: O happie Tom, O blessed Tom, thy swæt soule praie for me; O deare Tom, thy blessed soule praie for me. For which words being rebuked, the executioner lifted him vp on his fæt, when as he prepared him to his confession, saieng; I am brought hither to this place, to die a death which is both shamefull & ignominious, for which I thanke thée my Lord God, who framing me to thine owne similitude and likenesse, hast blessed me to this good end. There being staied, because he sæmed to prolong the time to small purpose, the shiriffe willed him to remember himselfe, for what cause he was come thither, how he had offended the quænes maiestie, and that he was now to aske hir forgiuenesse. Besides, he might receiue hir princelie mercie; whereto with an hypocriticall outward boldnesse, but an inward fainting feare (as afterward euerie one plainelie beheld) he gaue this answer: What (maister shiriffe) shall I saue this fraile and vile carcasse, and damne mine owne soule? No, no, I am a catholike, in that faith I was borne, in that faith will I die, and here shall my bloud seale it.

in

Then maister shiriffe spake vnto him, saieng; By the waie as we came you swore an oth, for which you willed me to beare witnesse that you were heartilie sorie: now I praie you let me be a witnesse, that you are heartilie sorie for offending the quæns maiestie. Whie sir (quoth he) I haue not offended hir, without it be in my religion; and if I haue offended hir, then I aske hir forgiuenesse. Maister shiriffe vpon this said vnto him; Is this the fruit of your religion, to kneele to the dead bodie of thy fellow, and to desire his soule to praie for thée? Alas, what can it either profit or hinder thée? Praie thou to God, and he will helpe thée. Maister shiriffe (quoth Shert) this is the true catholike religion, and whosoeuer is not of it is damned. I desire his soule to praie for me, the most glorious virgin Marie to praie for me, and all the holie companie of heauen to praie for me. At which words the people cried; Awaie with the traitor, hang him, hang him. O Shert (quoth maister shiriffe) forsake that whore of Rome, that wicked Antichrist, with all his abhominable blasphemies and treacheries, and put thy whole confidence in Jesus Christ. Whereto he answered; O maister shiriffe, you little remember the daie when as you & I shall stand both at one barre, and I come as witnesse against you, that you called that holie and blessed vicar of Christ the whore of Rome. At which words the people cried againe; Hang him, hang him, awaie with him. Then he beganne his Pater noster in Latine, and before he had fullie ended two petitions of it he fell into the Creed, and then to the Pater noster againe, afterward he said the Aue Maria, which done, knocking himselfe on the breast, saieng, Iesus esto mihi Iesus, the cart was drawen awaie, and he committed to the mercie of God. But then, to manifest that his former boldnesse was but mere dissembling and hypocrisie, he lifted vp his hands, and caught hold on the halter: so that euerie one perceiued his faire outward shew, and his foule inward disfigured nature, also how loth he was and vnwilling to die. Whereby he shewed that he was not indued with the audacitie and stout resolution of the heathen, who for morall vertues sake cast themselues into dangers, manie times deadlie; holding opinion, that he beareth but a counterfeit shew of vertue that shrinketh at anie torment, at anie hazard, at anie death, & therefore said:

——virtus
Per scopulos durum fortis anhelat iter.

Robert Johnson being brought vp into the cart, maister shiriffe, according as he had before, both declared vnto him hir maiesties mercie if he would repent; and also willed him to be sorie for his offenses against hir: whereof he sæmed to make small estimation, denieng the treasons according as the others had done, and appealing likewise vpon his religion. Then was the * writer hereof called forth, who gaue him to vnderstand, how notablie he was approued guiltie at his arreignment, & euerie matter sufficientlie handled, how according as the rest were, he was confounded to his face. Wherevnto he would make no other answer, but said; Well well, (quoth he) calling the partie by his name, God forgiue the. Then were his answers read vnto him, as they had bæn before to the other two, he not yælding denisall, but said he spake them & would doo it againe. Then was Athanasius Creed moued to him, which he granted to be the catholike faith, whereof the pope was vicar, and that there was no other catholike faith, but onelie his. Whie (quoth the preacher) the pope is not named in it. I know not that (quoth he againe) I haue not read it. Then maister shiriffe desired him to saie his praiers in English, and he with all the companie would praie with him: which he refusing to doo, in his Latine praiers the cart was drawne awaie, and he committed to Gods mercie. And thus was iustice ministred, and that execution to Gods glorie, & the ease of the common wealths greefe dispatched.

On the wednesdaie following, which was the thirtith daie of Maie, in the same maner as I haue before expressed, Luke Kirbie, William Filbie, Thomas Cotcham, & Laurence Richardson, were committed from the tower of London, to the place of execution; and as the other were on the mondaie before associated and accompanied with diuerse learned and godlie preachers; euen so were these, as to saie, master Clarke, maister Herne, and diuerse others, who all the waie applied such godlie and christian persuasions vnto them (as had not the child of perdition so maruellouslie blinded them) were of force to haue wone them into grace and mercie. The speeches they vsed to them by the waie were needfull here to set downe, for that they did especiallie concerne causes to root out that wicked opinion in them, and to establish a sound and perfect faith in place thereof; but euen as it was in the other, so it did agree in them. But Luke Kirbie seemed to challenge hudling vp of praiers mangled and pecked together after the popiſh maner.

Execution of Luke Kirbie, William Filbie, Thomas Cotcham, and Laurence Richardſon prieſts of the popes order.

*who was an obſeruer (as he pretended) of all their doings.

lenge the * writer hereof as ſufficient to proue nothing againſt him, which he did bicauſe it was ſuppoſed he was not there preſent: but what paſſed betweene him & the ſaid writer, you ſhall heare hereafter. They being come to the place of execution, William Filbie was brought vp into the cart, where conforming himſelfe vnto the death, his wicked treſons were mooued vnto him, which obſtinatelie and impudentlie he denied. Then was he demanded if he would acknowledge the quéenes maieſtie his ſouereigne princeſſe, and ſupreme head vnder Chriſt of the church of England? No (quoth he) I will acknowledge no other head of the church than the pope onlie. Wherevpon his anſwers were read vnto him, and he not denieng them in anie point, euen as they were wicked and impious, euen ſo he remained in them, ſtill appealing that it was for his religion that he died, and not for anie treaſon. But the contrarie was proued vnto his face, as well by ſufficient proofes, as alſo by the traitorous anſwers, whereto he had ſubſcribed with his owne hand. At laſt, as he was deſired, he praied for the quéenes maieſtie, that God might bleſſe hir, and incline hir heart to mercie toward the catholikes, of which ſocietie he was one. Then they opening his boſome, found there two croſſes, which being taken from him were held vp, and ſhewed to all the people, beſide his crowne was ſhauen. So after a few ſilent Latine praiers to himſelfe, the cart was drawne awaie.

Hoſt manifeſted and vnwrapped to the eies of a reſolute votaries of the pope his natiuall.

The next was Luke Kirbie, who being brought vp into the cart, offered long circumſtance of ſpéech, as concerning that he was come thither to die, hoping to be ſaued in the bloud of Chriſt: and much matter, which were néedleſſe here to rehearſe. Afterward, he began to ſaie, that there were none could approue him to be a traitor: neither had he at anie time attempted anie thing preiudiciall to hir maieſtie, and that his aduerſaries, naming them by ſpeciall name, could not vpbraid him with anie thing. Wherevpon maſter ſhiriffe told him that one of them was there, and aſked him if he would haue him called to him. I ſée him (quoth he) yonder, and let him ſaie what he can againſt me. Then was the * partie bidden come ſomewhat nére him, to whom he began in vehement ſort to ſaie, Conſider with thy ſelfe how vntrulie thou haſt charged me, with that which I neuer ſaid nor thought. Beſides, thou knoweſt that when thou cameſt to the Tower to me, before maſter lieutenant, & an other who was there preſent then, thou waſt demanded what thou thoughteſt of me, and what thou couldeſt ſaie againſt me? When as thou madeſt anſwer, thou knewest no harme by me, neither couldeſt thou at anie time ſaie otherwiſe of me than well: wherevpon thou waſt aſked, wherefore thou reportedſt otherwiſe at my arreignement? Then the ſhiriffe ſaid vnto him; Who can beare thée witnes of this? Quoth he againe; He ſpake it before maſter lieutenant, and an other was by then. Then was he demanded what other he was that was preſent? Which (after long trifling) he ſaid was a keeper, & named him. Whereto the ſaid writer made anſwer as followeth. Maſter Kirbie, I wiſh and deſire you, in the feare of God, to remember your ſelfe: for this is not a place to report an vntruth, neither to ſlander anie man otherwiſe than you are able to proue. When as I came vnto the Tower, & made knowne to maſter lieutenant for what cauſe I was ſent to ſpeake with you, you were brought into a chamber by your keeper: and what I then mooued, your ſelfe verie well knoweth, as concerning my allowance being the popes ſcholer: where what anſwer you made, I haue trulie, and accordingly as you anſwered, alreadie ſet downe in print. Maſter lieutenant neither mooued anie ſuch words to me, as here you reported, and I call God to my witneſſe, that not a motion of anie ſuch matter was once offered to me by maſter lieutenant, or by your keeper. Your ſelfe then vttered, that at ſundrie times in the ſeminarie there were diuerſe lewd words ſpoken, which might better haue bene ſpared; and denied that you were not in my chamber, when as I lieng ſicke in my bed, the traitorous ſpeeches were mooued by them, which were then preſent, whereof your ſelfe was one; with diuerſe other matters which you ſpake vnto me, which maſter lieutenant himſelfe heard, and your keeper being preſent. But if this be true which you ſaie, that it may be proued there were either ſuch words mooued vnto me, or anie ſuch anſwer made by me, I offer to ſuſteine what puniſhment the law ſhall afford me. Then falling to an other matter, for that this redounded to his owne confuſion (as maſter lieutenant can well witneſſe) he began to talke of my being at Rome, what friendſhip he had ſhewed vnto me, and had done the like vnto a number of Engliſhmen, whome he well knew not to be of that religion, both by his owne purſe, as alſo by frending them to ſome of the popes chamber, he made conueiance for them thenſe ſometime going forth miles with them: when (quoth he) had my dealings bin knowne, I ſhould hardlie haue bin well thought of: and I knew well inough that you were neuer bent to that religion, albeit they thought the contrarie. Yea I knew well inough when you departed thenſe, that your diſpoſition was contrarie to ours, and concealed it to my ſelfe.

Repetitio beneficij eſt exprobratio.

*Prodigious writer of their plots and deuiſes, as he pretended.

O Kirbie (quoth maſter ſhiriffe) this is verie vnlike, that you could afford ſuch fauour to anie, who were contrarie to that religion that you profeſſed. No, no, if you knew anie ſuch there, you would rather helpe to perſecute them than pitie them, as it is the nature of you all. M. Kirbie (quoth this writer) it is verie vnlike that you had anie ſuch ſecret knowledge of me, either of my religion, or how I was ſecretlie bent as you ſéeme here to profeſſe: for had I béene ſuch a one as you would perſuade theſe here you knew me to be, would you haue deliuered me thoſe ſilken pictures hallowed by the pope which you did: and moreouer, make knowen vnto me ſundrie of your friends here in England, to whome I ſhould conueie them? O ſir (quoth he) I confeſſe indéed I deliuered to thée ſuch pictures, but thou knoweſt I gaue thée two Julies to go buy them with, I did it bicauſe I knew thée to be ſuch a one, and therfore I did miſdoubt thée, for I would not credit thée with my hallowed pictures. M. Kirbie (quoth the other) to denie your owne doings is maruellous impudencie: did not you in your chamber deliuer me certeine ſilken pictures, which you told me at Stukleis being there, were hallowed by the pope, and what indulgences were alowed them? One of them, which was a crucifix, you gaue me; the other you willed me deliuer to your frends at Rheimes and in England. And bicauſe they were to few (as in déed I thinke they were no more but fiue) you gaue me two Julies, to go into the citie to bute more, which I did: and hauing brought them to you, thée or foure of the faireſt you toke from me, promiſing to get them hallowed at the next benediction: the other in déed you gaue me, and I toke them with me. How ſaie you now Kirbie (quoth maſter ſhiriffe) would you haue credited him with ſuch matters, had you not ſuppoſed him to be one of your owne ſect? Maſter ſhiriffe (quoth he) what I haue ſaid, I know verie well. And after he was gone from Rome I ſent fiftéene ſhillings to Rheimes to be deliuered to him, but he was departed thenſe towards England, before it came.

Maſter ſhiriffes words vttered by the waie of interception.

This was great & verie mercifull forbearance to let all this talke paſſe to and fro at the place of execution.

Then maſter ſhiriffe ſaid to him againe; You ſtand vpon theſe points verie much, which there is none that

One of theſe two muſt nedes be in a fowle errour: for both holding contrarie, could not ſpeake truth.

When indéed vſe to repoſe their truſt in ſuch, whom they ſuppoſe to be like themſelues.

that are here, but will iudge to be vntrue: thou hearest what he hath said vnto thée, and we haue heard that thou deniedst euerie thing. What saiest thou to thy treasons, wherefore thou art come hither to die? Wilt thou be sorie for them? aske God and his maiestie forgiuenesse, for he is mercifull, and we will carrie thee backe againe if we shall perceiue in thée anie such motion, that thou wilt forsake thy former wickednesse, and become a good and faithfull subiect. At these words the people among themselues almost generallie said: O exceeding mercie and fauour! what a gratious princesse haue we, who affordeth such mercie vnto those that haue so ill deserued? Can there be a princesse of greater pitie, of more clemencie or tendernesse to be found in all the world? No.

Mercie offered to Kirbie notwithstanding his conuiction of treason.

Principe nil iſta mitius orbis habet.

Then Field the preacher in the booke read his answers to him, whereto he had subscribed with his owne hand: Whether the pope might lawfullie depose hir maiestie, or had anie authoritie to take the title of hir crowne and dignitie awaie from hir? Wherto Kirbie answered: This is a matter disputable in schooles, and therefore I may not iudge of it. I thinke this with my selfe, that if anie prince fall by infidelitie into turcisme, atheisme, paganisme, or anie such like, that the pope hath authoritie to depose such a prince. And being asked, if hir maiestie were in anie such? He said, he knew his owne conscience. An other preacher being by said vnto him, that the prince receiued his authoritie from God, and that he was to be suppressed by none, but onelie by God. Againe, that Salomon said: By me (meaning by God) kings reigne, and princes decrée iustice. By me princes rule, and the nobles and all the iudges of the earth. Againe, S. Paule saith: Let euerie soule be subiect to the higher powers, for there is no power but of God, and the powers that be, are ordeined of God. Whosoeuer therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God, & they that resist, shall receiue to themselues iudgement. For princes are not to be feared for good works but for euill. Wilt thou then be without feare of the power? do well, so shalt thou purchase praise of the same. For he is the minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou do euill, feare, for he beareth a sword not for naught, for he is the minister of God to take vengeance on him that doth euill. If then the pope be a soule, he is to be obedient to the higher powers. And being a subiect vnto God, as all other princes be, he must not take vpon him what belongeth to God. As for the authoritie that hir maiestie hath, she hath receiued it from God; neither is the pope, or anie earthlie prince to depriue hir thereof, but onelie God. Againe, when Iesus was brought before Pilat, Pilat said vnto him; Knowest thou not that I haue power to crucifie thée, and haue power to loose thée? To the which Iesus answered: Thou couldest haue no power at all against me, except it were giuen thée from aboue. Thus maie you sée, that what prince soeuer ruleth vpon earth, hath his power and authoritie onelie from God: and not that anie mortall man can vse the authoritie of a prince at his pleasure. How saie you to this? Wherto he would make no answer, but séemed to demand of them, if they would denie, that if a prince were in paganisme, atheisme, or gouerned by infidelitie: that such a prince might not lawfullie be deposed? Which the learned preachers answered in learned sort, approuing that as the power was of God, so princes were not to be deposed by anie, but onelie by God.

To such as are proditorioustie minded it is a matter disputable: but to a good subiect a matter determinable.

Prou. 8. 15, 16.

Rom. 13. 1, 2, 3, 4.

This counsell of the apostle they had not the grace to follow.

John. 19. 10, 11.

This demand implieth a kind of suspicion or secret charge that hir maiestie is such a one.

No (quoth Kirbie againe) hath it not béene disputed in schooles for these fiue hundred yeares, and will you denie it? O maister Crowleie, maister Crowleie; and there paused: as if that maister Crowleie had agreed with him in such a monstrous error. But maister Crowleie himselfe gaue one to vnderstand, that at such time as he conferred with the said Kirbie in the tower, about the same argument, that his answer was vnto him: If anie prince fell into anie such kind of error, that prince were corrigible, but of whome? Not of anie earthlie prince, but of that heauenlie prince, who gaue him his authoritie, and séeing him abuse it anie waie, correcteth him in his iustice. For by his attributing to the pope this authoritie, he witnessed him to be antichrist, in that he will depose princes at his pleasure, and exalt himselfe aboue all that is called God, and forgiue men their sinnes at his pleasure likewise. All this was not sufficient to mollifie the obstinate mind of Kirbie, but he would persist still in this diuelish imagination. Maister shirifte and the preachers, séeing him wauering, and not able to yeld anie reason for his arrogant opinion, laboured as much as in them laie to change it: when all would not serue, they desired him in hartie and humble maner to praie vnto God, to aske hir maiestie forgiuenesse, for the treasons wherein he had offended hir. Whereunto he answered, that he had not offended in anie treason, to his knowledge. Whereupon they shewed him his treasons, which were adiudged by the people worthie of greater punishment, than he was at that time to suffer; yet would not he acknowledge them, but praied to God for hir maiestie, that she might long rule in hir authoritie, to confound all hir enimies: and that his hart was free from anie treason to hir maiestie. When preparing himselfe vnto his praiers, the preachers desired him to praie in English with them, and to saie a praier after them; wherein, if he could find anie fault, he should be resolued thereof. O (quoth he againe) you and I were not one in faith, therefore I thinke I should offend God, if I should praie with you: at which words, the people began to crie, Awaie with him: so he saieng his Pater noster in Latine, ended his life.

Then was Laurence Richardson brought vp into the cart, & to him Thomas Cotebam to be executed togither. But Cotebam séemed to vtter such words as though there had béene hope he would haue forsaken his wickednesse, so that the halter was vntied, and he brought downe out of the cart againe. In which time Laurence Richardson prepared him to death, confessing himselfe a catholike, and that he would beléeue in all things as the catholike church of Rome did, vnto the pope he allowed the onelie supremasie. In which traitorous opinion, after certeine Latine praiers, he was committed to God. Then was Cotebam brought vp to the cart againe, & the good opinion had of him before changed into that obstinat nature that was in them all, saieng to maister shirifte, that before he came into England, he was armed for India, and thither if he might be suffered he would passe with as much conuenient spéd as might be. Then loking to the bodie of Laurence Richardson, whereon the executioner was vsing his office, he lifted vp his hands and said; O blessed Laurence praie for me, thy blessed soule Laurence praie for me: for which words both the preachers and the people rebuked him, telling him that he ought to praie to none, but to God onelie; all helpe of man was but in vaine. Whereto he answered, he was assured that he could praie for him. In bréefe, his treasons being moued to him, he denied all, albeit his owne hand writing was there to affirme it. He praied for hir maiestie, and said his Pater noster & Aue Maria: and as the cart was drawing away he said; In manus tuas Domine commendo ſpiritum meum, and then he died. Thus did the bromme of iustice sweepe awaie these noisome cobwebs, noisome both to church and common Philip Peter hanged in Fléetstreet for killing of a sergeant.

On the second daie of June, Philip Peise was hanged in Fléetstréet for killing one of the shiriffes sergeants that had arrested him. This man at his death, as in wardlie touched with sorrow for the offense which he had committed and died, gaue such apparant tokens and notes of a repentant mind; that partlie with his speéches which were pathetical, and partlie with his teares which were plentifull, as also with his vehement sighs and greéuous groans, ioined with diuerse other gestures (great signes of inward grace) he so moued the beholders, that manie which beheld him, pitied his wofull end, much lea in maner all (whereof some were such as a man would haue thought had neuer a teare to shed at such a sight, hauing viewed diuerse the like and more lamentable spectacles) with wet eies beheld him, and yet in heart reioised that he died reconciled to God. On the eight and twentith of June, Peregrine Bartie lord Willoughbie of Eresbie appointed ambassador to Frederike the second king of Denmarke with the garter, whereunto he had béene elected & chosen a long time before, toke his leaue of the quéenes maiestie at Gréenewich; with whome sir Gilbert Dethicke alias Garter principall king of armes was ioined in commission, for the inuesting of the said king into the order; and Robert Glouer alias Summerset herald was also present, and gaue his attendance in the same voiage, as likewise did a competent number of gentlemen and yeomen, in all to the number of six and fiftie persons, besides mariners, &c. The said lord ambassador prepared himselfe towards Kingstone vpon Hull, where he imbarked with his whole traine on the fourtéenth daie of Julie, and prosperouslie arriued at Elsemore in Denmarke on the one and twentith daie of the same moneth, where he was honorablie interteined.

Lord Willoughbie ambassador sent into Denmarke.

On the thirtéenth daie of August he présented himselfe before the king in his castell of Cronebourgh, and made his first spéech vnto him in Latine; which spéech being ended, the lord Willoughbie deliuered vnto the king hir maiesties letters, and withall the commission for the kings inuesture into that honorable order of the garter. Which letters the king opened, and deliuered them to Henrie Ranelis his chancellor for Germanie to read, whom he commanded to answer my lords former oration. From the king my lord was conueied to the quéenes présence, vnto whome also he deliuered hir maiesties letters with salutations. The next daie being thursdaie the fourtéenth of August, the king roiallie prepared, receiued the robes of the order with his owne hands, and with great contentment accepted and ware the garter, the collar, and the George, when as my lord concluded the whole dedication with sundrie welwishings. In the end whereof he put the king in mind of the oth and thankefull acceptation of the order to be testified by a publike instrument, as was before promised, whereunto the king answered by his chancellor Nicholas Kaas with manie effectuall words: and immediatlie in signe of ioie, a great volée was discharged of all the great shot in his castell, and the lord ambassador with all his traine was roiallie feasted & rewarded. On thursdaie the sixtéenth daie of August, the king toke my lord ambassador forth on hunting two leagues from Elsemore, and there in the dinner time vttered manie louing spéeches. And after, to wit, on the one and twentith of September the lord ambassador with all his traine imbarked at Emden, and arriued at Bronenelure in Norfolke on thursdaie the seauen and twentith daie of September.

Pitifull ruine by gunpowder.

On the nineténth daie of Julie certeine ferkins of gunpowder to the number of seauen, and as manie or more ferkins of sturgeon laden in a car vpon Galléie kéie néere vnto the Tower of London, some small portion of the same powder being shed on the ground, the horsse in the said carre stroke fire with his hot, and fired all togither, wherethrough the sturgeon was blowen awaie, some into the Thames, some elsewhere: one ferkin was driuen through a lome wall that was bowded ouer, but all was spoiled and lost, the carre on the wharfe with the houses next adioining shattered, manie men and horsses sore blasted; the three men and seauen horsses died thereof. On the twelfe daie of August there arose a great tempest of lightening, thunder, whirlewind, and raine, with hailestones fashioned like to the rowels of spurs two or three inches about in the countie of Norfolke, betweene the market townes of north Walsham and Worsted (the towne wherein the making of worsteds commonlie called Norwich worsted was first practised and toke their beginning) which tempest beat the corne that vnto the ground, rent vp manie great trees, and shiuered them in peeces, or wound them like withies. At Hening more than a mile from Worsted, the west doore of the church, weieng more than three hundred pound weight, was lifted off the hookes, and throwne ouer the font, within one yard of the chancell doore; the top of the church was riuen vp, and the lead as it were blowen awaie; fiue webs of lead were ruffled vp togither, like as they had béene cloths of linnen cloth, and blowen into the field without the churchyard. Also at east Ruscen were manie barnes blowen downe, and houses vncouered.

Strange tempest in Norfolke.

This yeare Michaelmasse terme was returned from the vtas thereof, vntill the fourth returne of the same called Mense Michaelis, and from the said returne vntill the returne commonlie called Crastino animarum next insuing, & then returned from Westminster to the castell of Hertford in Hertfordshire, there to begin in the said Crastino animarum, and to be continued till the end of the same terme, which was done accordinglie, where was plentie of good viands to be had for monie, but lodging hard and scant; besides the long and plaine waie that manie had vnto their hosts, and then peraduenture sléepe in the chimneie corner, or vpon the hard boords with a pillow vnder their heads. Was not this a good amends?

Terme kept at Hertford.

This yeare Peter Morris frée denison, hauing made an engine for that purpose, conueied Thames water in pipes of lead ouer the steéple of saint Magnus church, at the north end of London bridge, and so into diuerse mens houses in Thames stréet, new Fish stréet, and Gratious stréet, vp vnto the northwest corner of Leaden hall (the highest ground of the citie of London) where the waste of the first maine pipe ran first this yeare one thousand fiue hundred eightie and two on Christmasse éeuen: which maine pipe being since at the charges of the citie brought vp into a standard there made for that purpose, and diuided into foure seuerall spouts ran foure waies, plentifullie seruing to the vse of the inhabitants néere adioining that will fetch the same into their houses, and also cleansed the chanels of the stréets, north towards Bishopsgate, east towards Aldgate, south towards the Bridge, and west towards the Stocks market. No doubt a great commoditie to that part of the citie, and would be farre greater, if the said water were mainteined to run continuallie, or at the least, at euerie tide some reasonable quantitie, as at the first it did; but since is much slaked, through whose default I know not, sith the engine is sufficient to conueie water plentifullie: which being well considered by Barnard Randolph esquier, common sergeant of the citie of London: he being aliue, gaue and deliuered to the companie of the fishmongers in London a round sum to be imploied toward the conducting of Thames water for the good seruice of the commonwealth in conuenient order. Other legacies verie liberallie and bountifullie he gaue by his testament to be laid out in workes of charitie, as I haue noted more at large hereafter in due place, vpon occasion of recording the date of his death. The publication of whose acts, as also of diuerse others, if they may moue the rich of this world to part with some small portion of their store to the like christian vses, I shall be glad, and thinke my paines worth the printing: otherwise I saie with one that persuading this age to walke worthie of their calling, and doubting his words should be but wind, concluded with this interrogatine distichon:

Justice Randolph his charitie.

This yeare 1582 was there instituted, and first founded a publike lecture or lesson in surgerie, to begin to be read in the college of physicians in London, in Anno 1584, the first daie of Maie, against that time new edified in a part of the house that doctor Linacre gaue by testament to them, by John Lumleie lord Lumleie, and Richard Caldwell doctor in physicke, to the honour of God, the common profit of his maiesties subiects, and good fame, with increase of estimation and credit of all the surgians of this realme. The reader whereof to be a doctor of physicke, and of good practise and knowledge, and to haue an honest stipend, no lesse than those of the vniuersities erected by king Henrie the eight, namelie of law, diuinitie, and physicke, and lands assured to the said college for the maintenance of the publike lesson; whereunto such statutes be annexed as be for the great commoditie of those which shall giue and incline themselues to be diligent hearers for the obteining of knowledge in surgerie, as whether he be learned or vnlearned that shall become an auditor or hearer of the lecture, he may find himselfe not to repent the time so imploied. First twise a weeke thorough out the yeare; to wit, on wednesdaies and fridaies, at ten of the clocke till eleuen, shall the reader read three quarters of an houre in Latine, and the other quarter in English, wherein that shall be plainlie declared for those that vnderstand not Latine, what was said in Latine. And the first yeare to read Horatius Morus tables, an epitome or briefe handling of all the whole art of surgerie, that is, of swellings or apostems, wounds, vlcers, bonesetting, and healing of bones broken, termed commonlie fractions, and to read Dribasius of knots and Galen of bands, such workes as haue beene long hid, and are scarselie now a daies among the learned knowen, and yet are (as the anatomies) to the first enterers in surgerie and nouices in physicke; but amongst the ancient writers and Grecians well knowne. At the end of the yeare in winter to dissect openlie in the reading place all the bodie of man especiallie the inward parts for fiue daies togither, as well before as after dinner; if the bodies may so last without annoie.

Publike lecture of surgerie founded in London, & presentlie red (as also in the life of the founder) by doctor Frosler, to his high praise & credit.

What exercises are to be followed in the said colledge by the will of the founder.

The first yeares exercises.

The second yeare to read Tagaultius institutions of surgerie, and onelie of swellings or apostems, and in the winter to dissect the trunke onelie of the bodie, namelie from the head to the lowest part where the members are, and to handle the muscles especiallie. The third yeare to read of wounds onelie of Tagaultius, and in winter to make publike dissection of the head onelie. The fourth yeare to read of vlcers onlie the same author, and to anatomize or dissect a leg and an arme for the knowledge of muscles, sinewes, arteries, veines, grissles, ligaments, and tendons. The fift yeare to read the first booke of Paulus Ægineta, and in winter to make anatomie of a skeleton, & therwithall to shew & declare the vse of certeine instruments; as Scamnum Hippocratis, and other instruments for setting in of bones. The first yeare to read Holerius of the matter of surgerie; as of medicines for surgians to vse. And the seuenth yeare to begin againe, and continue still.

The second yeares exercises.

The third yeares, and fourth yeares exercises.

The fift and first yeares exercises, ioined to continue with Rosses principles.

A godlie and charitable erection doubtlesse, such as was the more needfull, as hitherto hath beene the want and lacke so hurtfull: sith that onelie in eth vniuersities by the foundation of the ordinarie and publike lessons, there is one of physicke, but none of surgerie; and this onelie of surgerie and not of physicke; I meane so as physicke is now taken separatelie from surgerie, and that part which onelie vseth the hand as it is seuered from the apothecarie. So that now England may reioise for those happie benefactors & singular welwillers to their countrie, who furnish her so in all respects, that now she may as compare for the knowledge of physicke so by means to come to it, with France, Italie, and Spaine, and in no case behind them but for a lecture in simples, which God at his pleasure may procure, in moouing some hereafter in like motion and instinct to be as carefull and beneficiall as these were to the helpe and furtherance of their countrie. ¶ At the publication of this foundation, which was celebrated with a goodlie assemblie of doctors collegiats and licentiats, as also some maisters of surgerie, with other students, some whereof had beene academicall; doctor Caldwell so aged that his number of yeeres with his white head adding double reuerence to his person (whereof I may well saie no lesse than is left written of a doctor of the same facultie verie famous while he liued, euen he, notwithstanding his age and impotencie, made an oration in Latine to the auditorie, the same by occasion of his manifold debilities vnfinished at the direction specialle of the president, who (after a few words, shortlie and sweetlie vttered) gaue occasion and opportunitie to D. Forster, then and yet the appointed lecturer, to deliuer his matter, which he discharged in such methodicall maner, that eth one present indued with iudgement, conceiued such hope of the doctor, touching the performance of all actions incident vnto him by that place, as some of them continues his auditors in all weathers, and still hold out; whose diligence he requiteth with the imparting of further knowledge than the said publike lecture doth afford. When the assemblie was dissolued, and the founder accompanied home, diligent care was taken for the due preferring of this established exercise: insomuch that D. Caldwell, and D. Forster, to furnish the auditors with such bookes as he was to read, caused to be printed the epitome of Horatius Morus first in Latine: then in English, which was translated by the said doctor Caldwell. But before it was halfe perfected, the good old doctor fell sicke, and as a candle goeth out of it selfe, or a ripe apple falling from the tree, so departed he out of this world at the doctors commons, where his vsuall lodging was; & was verie worshipfullie buried. But of his death hereafter, in the yeare 1584: where the date of his decease being mentioned, matter worth the reading shall be remembred.]

Doctor Gibbon president of the college of physicians.

Francis of Valois, duke of Louthier, Brabant, Limbourgh, Gelders, Anion, Alanson, &c: earle of Flanders, Holland, Zeland, &c: marquesse of the sacred empire, lord of Friseland, &c: hauing now indifferentlie well (with his his good successe had in the battelling, and remouing the seege of Cambreie and Lochem, and winning the townes of Alast and Endonan) gotten the harts of the people, and by that meanes placed his Frenchmen in Dunkirke, Wimerburgh, Dixmide, Dermond, Wilnord, and other places, thought now (vsing yong & euill counsell) to make himselfe a more absolute prince, as though it were too base a thing for his highnesse to rule with the aduise of the estates of the countries. Wherfore hauing come to him out of France the marshall Biron, with great troops of Swissers and Frenchmen, he now causeth them all at one time; to wit, on the seuenth of Januarie, to inuade so manie townes as they could make themselues maisters of; which with them tooke effect in the aboue named townes, but at Bruges they were put out. And at Antwerpe on the said seuenth daie, vnder the pretense to muster his armie without the towne, vpon the verie none time of the daie, when the citizens were at dinner, he causeth two gates (as vncertaine by which he would go) to be opened for him, and the chaines ouerthwart the streets to be vnchained, which (for some suspicion had of the Frenchmen without) were locked: then he issued out with all his court and a great number of gentlemen, verie braue, mounted on great horsses aboue two hundred, manie of them being secretlie armed vnder their garments, and comming to saint Iames gate. At the bridge without met him certeine of his companies of horssemen and footmen, who staied themselues on both sides the waie, making as it were a lane for the duke to passe by with a few of his: who being past them, made a token to them with his cap, to inuade the citie: whereupon his men killed the watch, with the coronell Vierendell, that stood bare headed to see their prince passe. Then entred the gate seuentæne ensignes of footmen, and foure coronels of horssemen, the Swissers following, & the duke crieng to them, March, march, La ville est gagnee, mais me pillon point. Being thus stronglie entred they cried, Ville gagnee viue la messe, and tooke in on both sides the bulworks, turned the ordinance towards the citie, & came by diuers streets almost to the midst of the citie. The citizens at dinner hearing the alarum, verie furiouslie issued out, with such weapons as first came to their hands, and set vpon them, first, by the bylanes, other some chained vp the streets, and so barred them from going anie further. They turne all against the soldiors that were entred the citie with most violent shot. In the meane space the citizens nere and about the gate with their harquebusiers bestow their small shot as thicke as haile out of windowes vpon the gate, where first they killed a horsse, and then diuers men entring, which troubled the other following, that a great number was euen in the verie gate killed, and so heaped one vpon another that the gate was stopped; wherby all that were entred within the citie, in lesse than in one houres space were killed or taken prisoners. Wherein the citizens behaued themselues so valiantlie, & so manlie, that manie for lacke of leaden pellets, tooke their monie out of their purses, bowed it with their teeth, and put it in stead of pellets in their harquebusiers:

Sic sese & sobolem charam, cum vxore mariti
Defendunt, Gallis ne præda voracibus essent.

In this skirmish of so litle space were slaine aboue 1530 Frenchmen horssemen and footmen, told at the burieng, and more than two thousand prisoners taken, amongst the which were the earle Fernangus, the bishop of Constance, and manie other notable personages. And amongst the dead were the earle of saint Agnan and his sonne, the earle of Chasteauroulse, the sonne of the marshall of France Biron; monsieur de Saisonall gouernor of Wilnord, the sonne of the lord Mirambeau, and others. A marueilous act of citizens in their defense without anie soldiors, against old soldiors and tried men of armes, and number of so great nobilitie. A maruellous continencie & clemencie of rough citizens against their enimies, in keeping their hands from the killing of prisoners whome they had in their power, and surelie a wonderfull worke of God.

The prince of Orange with others had refused to go forth, and his danger was not small; with other gentlemen more, and lords of the religion. The prince Dolphin, the earle Lamall and others were with the duke lokers on, and intercessors for their friends whom they reckoned dead. After that fact, the duke with his campe was forced for lacke of vittels and necessaries, to retire him with his armie toward Machlin, and from thense with great difficultie passing great waters, with losse of manie a man got to Dermond, where he was kept in by the generall Norris, with three and twentie ensignes Englishmen and Scots, so that he lacked vittels and necessaries, whereby he was forced, as also to haue his prisoners restored, to enter into a treatie with the estates, to surrender all the townes by his men possessed, and to retire him to Dunkirke: where further with the estates, by intercession of princes was hoped a reconcilement to be made. But he seeing the countrie vnwilling, and finding himselfe sicke (as it was thought) of melancholie, he retired from Dunkirke toward France. And so as he was retired, the prince of Parma for king Philip, caused Dunkirke to be besieged, few Frenchmen left within it. And as the states Generall and the prince of Orange would haue sent thither to rescue the towne, the marshall Biron with his Frenchmen and Swissers, the Flemings cheeflie they of Gaunt, partlie for hatred of the French, and partlie that manie now were become Spanish, whereby Dunkirke was forced to surrender: and this losse being imputed to the duke, increased his sickenesse, so that he died at Chasteau Thierie the tenth of Iulie 1583, & was royallie buried at saint Diones by Paris.

Francis duke of Anion and Alanson retireth.

Generall Norris with 23. ensignes.

Francis duke of Alanson and of Anion sickeneth.

¶ But before we passe the absolute cõmemoration of the monsieur, sith in some remembrances we haue atteined to a perfection, it shall not be amisse here to anner the manner of his sickenesse, as also the verie speeches which he vttered, as they are reported by James Berson Parisien, preacher to the French king, and to the said monsieur, in a discourse by him published, vnder the title of A funerall complaint, &c. Wherein whatsoeuer is spoken, deserueth the greater credit, for that the said Berson was vpon his owne certeine knowledge able to giue out the truth, and therfore intimateth to the readers of his treatise, that they are not to loke for either flatteries, or hautie, proud, and lieng arguments: he being the man who assuredlie was able to answer and beare witnes of the pietie, religion, and departure of monsieur, a sonne of France, and the kings onelie brother in the fauor of God, as the same vpon whome he reposed himselfe concerning his conscience, soule and saluation; and hauing from the beginning of his sickenes administred vnto him the holie sacrament, and did assist him to the end. You are therfore to vnderstand, that after * my said lords crosse haps and danger of life in the low countries, and his returne into his duchie of Castle Thierie, his naturall & brotherlie resolution taken to go alone to Paris, there to yeeld him selfe to his maiesties armes, a deed to be accounted and taken as a strong bulworke against whatsoeuer the popular and enuious slanders: after his returne home he conceiued an extreame contentation in dailie hearing of sermons, yea not satisfied with the onelie hearing of them, he greatlie delited to talke of the same, also to haue the same repeated vnto him. Thus did our Lord in conuenient time dispose his soule, which he purposed shortlie to dilit in his next sickenelle, and that was an ague that continued without equalitie vntill the thirteenth of March, and then he fell into so strange a iudgement, that all euen the physicians began to doubt of him. For a flux of blood issued so continuallie out of his nose and mouth, that they were still forced to hold him a basen, whereinto he voided the pure and cleere blood. When all men were as it were astonied thereat, himselfe began with a perfect mind and vnderstanding to saie; My friends, helpe me, will you suffer a christian prince thus to die? Now is the time come that God will call me to account: cause monsieur Werson to come hither.

The maner of the monsieurs sickenelle.

When I came, ha monsieur Werson (said this good prince) I am dead, I must acknowledge my God; my frend flatter me not, I will reconcile my selfe. Alas I am a great sinner, will not God haue mercie on me? Will not he forgiue me? I answered, There is no dout my lord but vpon humbling your selfe before his holie maiestie with contrition, you shall obteine remission of your sinnes. My lord, you are verie sicke, I will not flatter with you, but your whole life and your selfe resteth in the hands of God. Sickenes is naturall, or sent by God for a warning; if your disease be naturall there is hope: we will vse all means for remedie. On the one side the physicians are here readie, who shall implote themselues. On the other side, all the world is in praier & deuotion for your health. If it procedeth from God, it is a warning to you for the rest of your life, to the end to draw you neerer to him, either else to aduertise you of your naturall condition: that is, that you are mortall & must once paie this debt, and reskore your soule to God who lent it to you, at whatsoeuer time he shall call for it. Now my lord, sith we can not certeinlie discerne the one from the other, is it not best for you to conforme your will to Gods will. Also in case God granteth you to ouerliue this sickenelle, are you not resolued to better your life, and to line more in his feare than before? Againe, if he be determined to call you out of this world, are not you content to go into Abrahams bosome, and there to rest vnder the protection of his mercie? Resolue your selfe my lord, you haue a goodlie soule.

Werson his words of comfort to the monsieur, whether his disease were naturall, or proceeding from God.

I am (said this good prince) fullie resolued in the will of my God, let him do with me whatsoeuer shall please him: onelie that he will vouchsafe to haue mercie on me. I wold reconcile me but I shall hardlie speake: and in truth the bloud still belched out into the basen which * I held with one hand, whilest with a handkercher in the other I wiped from his face and brest a great cold sweat that euen smelt of death: as also I perceiued his nostrils to be closed vp, his eies sinke, and heard the rattling and bloud that stopped him vp. Euerie bodie being gone forth I said vnto him, My lord straine not your selfe to speake much, onelie begin with the chiefest matters, and those that most trouble your conscience, and for the rest I will instruct you. Then ioining his hands and lifting vp his eies vnto heauen, he began to sigh, mourne, and sob with extreame contrition and griefe, which when I perceiued, I still indeuored to assure him in talking to him of God and of the merits of the bloud of Iesus Christ, wherein the greater delight that he conceiued, the more did he detest himselfe as a most miserable sinner: then might you haue seene among much sweat which as pearles ran downe his haire and beard, the great teares trickeling downe his eies, whiles with great paine he accused himselfe.

The monsieur his resolute to die.

* Namelie Werson.

After this, diuerse speeches passed with certeine actions betweene the monsieur and Werson, which to omit is lesse offensiue than to publish. To proceed then, the monsieur lieng in his agonie, bethought him (amongest other things) of his familie, and said; Alas I mone none but my poore seruants, withall, that I shall die without celebration of mine Easter: will not the Lord grant me that grace? Then I promised him that God would heare so iust a petition, and therefore willed him a while to haue patience, it should not be the first miracle that euer our Lord had wrought. Hauing thus spoken, certeine ceremonies were solemnlie commensed and finished, not without manie speeches interchanged betweene the monsieur and Werson; insomuch that (saith he) I can not rehearse all that he said vnto me; but this I dare assure you, that if his health had continued, I was thereby in hope of most profitable effects to all christendome, and to the estate and quietnesse of our France. But we were not worthie, our sinnes crieng for vengeance to God, who as he punisheth nations by giuing them wicked princes, so doth he also chastise them by taking from them the good, euen at such time as they are readie to releeue vs, and afterward we haue cause to lament and mourne.

Werson who was then busie about certeine ceremonies incident to the time and his office.

Great hope conceiued of the monsieurs if he had not beene preuented with death.

His health after this first fit continued a while, but by reason of a crum of bread that sticke in the vuula, and thereby procured a violent cough with spitting of blood, he fell into it againe, and from thense forth kept his bed, sometimes well and sometimes ill, yet eating his meat reasonablie well, howbeit gathering no force to the substance of his bodie. Finallie, the same daie that the physicians (after the view of the operation of a medicine) had conceiued a better opinion of him than before; being saturdaie the ninth of June about eight of the clocke at night, he was taken with a marueilous shortnesse of wind, and a paine in one of his sides: and seeing himselfe so taken before ante man spake to him, he sent for me, saieng; Now is the time that I must die, you haue greatlie abused me; howbeit they vsed all diligence. But about midnight, when there was no further hope, they sent for me. When I was come I found the good prince laid in his estate, of whome trulie I had no other opinion but that death was at hand, and therefore was verie importunat to speake vnto him, fearing least he should haue died without the sacrament, which so greatlie he had longed for.

The monsieur falleth into an extremitie of his maladie, and past hope of recouerie.

One commendable matter I noted in the noble men there present, which was; that there was not one but did importunatlie vrge to speake vnto him of God: for mine owne part I was verie impatient, & euerie one was in feare to speake first. One there was that willed me to change mine apparell, & to put on a blacke garment, least he should conceiue anie mistrust. How (said I) can I so do? He hath sent for me, and knoweth my clothing: if by my speech he should know me, and then find my clothing changed, he will enter a greater apprehension of death than before: therefore consider of it, if anie thing fall out amisse, it will be a perpetuall reproch to vs all. In the end monsieur Fougier his steward a verie wise man so ordered the matter, and with such discretion, that he brake with him of it. At that time was he ouercome with a drowsie sleepe, and still holden with a short wind, accompanied with continuall sweats, and sometime would aske; Do men die thus? On the tenth daie of June which was sundaie, after diuers ceremoniall actions dispatched, and speaches to and fro vttered, with pitifull sighs on all sides of inward setled sorow; the monsieur desired that he might sleepe a while: but his sleepe was not long yer he awaked, when betwixt him and Werson (all the rest being gone) something was said and done, which which (belike) was not for euerie eare ꝫ eie to heare or see. In the end, Berson perceiuing by manifest indications, that death preased vpon him, vsed these words to the monsieur, Louis (as I take it) being then within the hearing. My lord, in the beginning of your sickenesse, you ꝫ I made a ioint promise vnto God, wherwith I am burdened: now therefore I desire vnburden my selfe thereof, vnlesse you will helpe to burden me againe. We are witnesses that you haue loued God: now is the time that you must acknowledge him, you are verie sicke, but your soule is sound in your bodie. If it please God to grant you life, he graunteth it to the end you should amend; so should your selfe be happie, and we content that you should liue. If he vouchsafe to call you vnto paradise, how blessed shall you be? where may you be better? So that whatsoeuer happen, be it life, be it death, still shall you be content and happie. Resolue your selfe therefore wholie in the will of God. All we here are your faithfull seruants, and those who euermore haue desired to be so fortunate as to be honored with your commandements; whose eies and eares haue alwaies beene open to heare and obeie you, and to fulfill your will; neuer did you command anie thing, but you were immediatlie obeied. Now know you, that your selfe are Gods seruant; him you must obeie, and to his will must you wholie resolue your selfe: whether it be his will you should liue, or is his pleasure you should die, still saie: His will be done.

Then with a forced speech this good prince said: His will be done. Take no care my lord said I, for anie worldlie matters. Greatnesse, riches, and renowme do perish, Paradise is to be found and possessed. It is a great matter to be a kings sonne, but it is much greater to be the child of God. You are now as a child new borne, you want nothing but the food of the children of God: you haue no more to do, but to communicat in the pretious bodie of our Lord: it is here readie, would you not gladlie haue it? I will cause you easilie to vse it. He answered yes. Then taking the holie sacrament I began to saie vnto him: My Lord Jesus the heauenlie word and euerlasting sonne of God, in old time inuisible, did in the end visiblie manifest himselfe to the world in humane flesh, by taking vpon him our visible and passible nature: but because he was not perpetuallie to remaine in this humane vale, reuiuing and ascending into heauen, we had him no longer to touch and handle carnallie and visiblie. And therefore to the end not to faile of his promise, that he would be still with vs vntill the consummation of the world; he hath giuen vs inuisiblie his pretious bodie ꝫ bloud vnder these holie signes and sacraments, that by the communion in such and so pretious a gift, we might be strengthened in his loue, ꝫ through his grace be defended against all temptations ꝫ stumbling blocks of our saluation: like as Elias, who in the strength of the food for him miraculoulie ordeined, after his sleepe trauelled long iournies, euen vntill he did see God. Receiue therefore this signe and testimonie of the remission of your sinnes, and when you shall be presented before the maiestie of God, it shall be vnto you a badge and token that you belong vnto him.

Then lifting vp his eies and loking all about him, this good prince opened his mouth, which presentlie I moistened with his drinke, ꝫ so gaue him the holie sacrament, and againe powred in some of his drinke to swallow it withall, which he did both deuoutlie and couragioustie; insomuch that afterward he did eat ꝫ speake better than he had done all the night ꝫ morning before, to the great contentation of all the companie: in whose presence I did againe exhort him saieng: Now my lord, behold you are armed with the chase of all your desire, I beseech you comfort your selfe in the Lord. It is a great fauour that he hath shewed you, in making you (as it appeareth) inheritor vnto the faith, pietie, and christianitie of the kings of France, whose faith and descent you do hold.

Let your soule now reioise, yea although you should now die. Thinke what a contentation vnto you it shall be, to be discharged from so manie worldlie affaires, what a pleasure to exchange this mortall life for an immortall, glorious and perdurable life; feare no lets: the waie is alreadie beaten, alreadie are they passed the same, whose greatnesse of faith you do imbrace. The patriarchs do tarie for you, the prophets do call you: the apostles do stretch forth their armes vnto you: the martyrs do inuite you: the confessors do solicit you: the virgins do giue you place: all the saincts do waite for you. We haue discharged all the duties of faithfull seruants, and such as loue you hartilie: And hauing this speech, with a demand or two made, and their answers added: Berson, being the mouth of the residue, said of the monsieur drawing on; that they (meaning himselfe and the companie present) waited but for the houre of his death: yet had he one houre and a halfe to liue. So soone as we were gone, he desired to haue his head laid lower: his chamberleine immediatlie called to vs for helpe, ꝫ suddenlie he gaue vp the ghost: my selfe James Berson, at the dissolution of his sweet soule from his louelie bodie, vsing these words: Go and passe on christian soule, and returne to him that hath created thee, &c.

He went awaie so sweetlie that it could hardlie be perceiued, insomuch that some who could not be persuaded that he was dead (for his eies were open and cleere, and his countenance no whit changed) held a loking glasse to his mouth, but there was no signe of life: others feeling his pulses, imagined they did beat, but that was because they were strained euen to the nailes ends. At this word, He is gone, oh what pitie! oh God what tears! what sighes! what sobs! all was dissolued into howling and cries: those that in armor were forward, were now readiest in teares, sundrie swooned in the chamber, at the sound hereof the towne quaked, the castell sounded most lamentable voices: yea my selfe hauing lost all courage was forced to open the poole of my head, and to vnstop the gate of my hart, to the end with teares and lamentations to discharge that affection which I bare vnto him.

About foure of the clocke, when all were departed I toke the linnen wherein he was lapped from about the bodie of this good prince, then did I laie and order it honestlie and with reuerence handled it, some of vs also had so good hap as to kisse his hands ꝫ head. Oh my good lord and maister, neuer durst I haue beene so bold, had it not beene for the confidence you reposed in me: alas why was it so late before I did know you, to serue you so small a time? Infinitlie am I forced to print you in my remembrance, ingraue you in my soule, and to burie you in my hart, for that you vouchsafed to make mine eares gardians of that which rested in your conscience. Mourne, mourne with me my masters, and all ye the officers of his house: we haue lost the best master in the world, for euer shall the tenth date of June beare witnesse of our mishap: hereafter shall we neuer vpon that date haue occasion to hold merie feast betweene twelue and one of the clocke, the houre of the decease of so desired a prince. The yeare 1584 is indeed a yeare of reuolution. France, France, quarter thine armes, ꝫ in lieu of lions sow in teares: for the Lord taketh from vs all our noble ꝫ honorable,

Ground remoued.

The thirteenth daie of Januarie, in the parish of Ermitage in a place called Blacke moze in Dorsetshire, a peece of ground conteining three acres remoued from the place where it was first planted, and was carted cleane ouer an other close, where alder and willow trees grew, the space of fortie goad (euerie goad conteining fifteene foot) and hath stopped vp an high waie that directed towards the market towne of Cerne; and yet notwithstanding the hedges wherewith it was inclosed, inuiron it still, and the trees stand thereon bolt vpright, sauing one oke tree, that is well nigh twentie goads remoued: the place whereas the ground had his being at the first is left like vnto a great hollow pit. The same thirteenth daie of Januarie, being sundaie, about foure of the clocke in the afternoone, the old and vnderpropped scaffolds round about the beare garden, commonlie called Paris garden, on the southside the Thames, ouer against the citie of London, ouercharged with people fell suddenlie downe, whereby to the number of eight persons men and women were slaine, and manie other sore hurt and bruised. A friendlie warning to all such as more delight themselues in the crueltie of beasts, to see them rent one an other, than in the works of mercie, which are the fruits of a true professed faith, and ought to be the sabboth daies exercise: and not onelie a warning to works of mercie, but a watchword to put vs in mind how we violate the sabboth daie, the Lords owne daie, which he sanctified himselfe, that we by his example might sanctifie the same, and not prophane it with such gentilisme as we do, as though God would not call vs to a reckoning for abusing his holie ordinances, and falsifieng the glorious title of christians in our odious actions: for the which God will seuerelie expostulat with vs, and with indignation demand of vs why we take his lawes in our mouths, & renounce them in our minds; why we let them swim in our lips, and slip from our liues, as the vaine Iewes did, vnto whome God said in displeasure as followeth:

Eight persons killed by the fall of a scaffold at the beare garden, a warning to prophaners of the sabboth daie.

William Bruster and Marie Breame smothered to death.

On the third of Februarie being sundaie, William Brustar habardasher (a man of more than threescore yeares old) being lodged ouer the southwest porch of saint Brides church in Fleetstreet, with a woman named Marie Breame (whome the same Brustar had bailed out of Bridewell) were both found smothered to death, in maner following. On the same sundaie in the morning, a marriage being solemnized in that church, a strong sauour was felt, which was thought to haue beene the burning of old shoes or such like, in some gentlemans chamber there about, thereby to suppresse the infection of the plague. But in the afternoone before euening prayer, the parishioners espied a smoke to issue out of Brustars chamber, and there vpon made hast to the doore, which they found fast locked, and were forced to breake it open, but could not enter, till they had tipped vp the lead and rose of the chamber to let out the smothering stench: which being done, they found Brustar dead, sitting on a settle by his beds side (in his apparell, and close trussed) his right thigh & right arme vp to the elbow burnt or scorched with the fire of a small mas of coales that stood before him, but now being cleane quenched with the dampe or lacke of aire. The woman also laie dead ouer the pan, so that hir armes were likewise burnt, with the nether part of hir bodie before to hir breast, and behind to the shoulders, and nothing else in the chamber burnt, but the bottome of the settle whereon Brustar sat. Of this lamentable accident people talked diuerslie, and pamphlets were published to make the same more knowne: howbeit, to leaue the certeine meanes of the event to his knowledge that vnderstandeth and seeth all things, let it be a warning to all ages so to liue, as that an honest report may attend their death, & shame flie from them as a cloud before the wind:

Sic sapient, sic non insipientes erunt.

A man and a woman hanged at Shoe lane end.

On the sixteenth of Aprill about six of the clocke in the morning, Thomas Wroth & Alice Shepheard, were hanged on a gibbet at Shoelane end in Fleetstreet, for killing of a prentice in the same Shoelane. Also on the same daie about eight of the clocke in the morning, a gunpowder house, called the signe of the gun in Fetterlane neere vnto Fléetstréet, and diuerse other houses neere adioining, were blowne vp, with the spoile of fiftie hundred weight of powder: two men and one woman were slaine, & diuerse other persons, as well men as women and children were sore hurt, some blasted with the flame, some bruised with the fall of timber vpon them, &c.

Palatine of Stradia in Poland came into England.

Albertus Alasco, sr̃ baron of Lasco, Vaiuode, or palatine of Stradia in Poland, arriued at Harwich in Essex, and on the last of Aprill came by water to Winchester house in Southwarke, where he remained for the most part of his abode here: of whome more hereafter at his returne into his owne countrie. Elias Thacker tailor was hanged at saint Edmunds burie in Suffolke on the fourth of June, and John Coping shoomaker on the first of the same moneth, for spreading and maintening certeine bookes seditiouslie penned by one Robert Brawne against the received booke of English common praier, established by the lawes of this realme their bookes (so manie as could be found) were burned before them. This yeare on the ninth of June deceased Thomas Ratclife earle of Sussex, lord chamberleine to hir maiestie, and knight of the garter, at Barmundsey in the borough of Southwarke besides London, and was on the eight of Julie next following conueied through the same citie of London toward Newhall in Essex, there to be buried in forme following. First went on foot before him fortie and fiue poore men in blacke gownes, then an horsebacke one hundred and twentie seruingmen in blacke coats, then ninetie and fiue gentlemen in blacke gownes or cloakes, besides the heralds at armes and other, which bare his helme, creast, sword, coat of armes, and banners of armes, &c. Then the deceased earle, couered with a pall of blacke veluet, in a chariot likewise couered with blacke veluet, drawne with foure goodlie geldings; next after was led the earles steed couered with blacke veluet, then sir Henrie Ratclife the succeeding erle chiefe mourner, and eight other lords all in blacke, then the lord maior and his brethren the aldermen of London riding in murrate gownes, then on foot the gentlemen of Greis in, and last of all the worshipfull companie of the merchant tailors of London in their liueries, uerties, for that the said earle was a brother of their companie, as manie noble men, and famous princes, kings of this realme before him had béene; as more at large is declared in * the summarie of the chronicles of England, in the eighteenth yeare of king Henrie the seuenth. The maior and aldermen, the gentlemen of Greis in, and the merchant tailors accompanied the corps to the barres without Aldgate, and returned. This was the end of that noble man, who (whiles he liued) aduentured him and life against the enimies of the English commonwelth, and therefore in respect of his excellent seruices, deserued no lesse remembrance than is alreadie extant of him in print, whereof this following is a parcell:

Edmund Grindall doctor of diuinitie archbishop of Canturie deceassed at Croidon in Surrie on the first daie of Julie, & was there buried. This good man in his life time was so studious, that his booke was his bride, and his studie his bridechamber, wherupon he spent both his eiesight, his strength, and his health, and therefore might verie well be actuelie but passiuelie be named as (he was) Grindall: for he grond himselfe euen to his graue by mortification. Of whome much might be spoken for others imitation (sith the vse of the historie, is to instruct succéeding ages) but this shall suffice, that as his learning & vertue were inseparable companions; so the reward of both is the good name which he hath left behind him as a monument perpetuall, because vertue was the founder of the same: according to the true saieng of the late poet importing no lesse:

Mr Martin R.L.

Barnard Randolfe esquier, common sargeant to the citie of London, deceassed on the seauenth of August. This man in his life time, somewhat before his death, gaue and deliuered to the companie of the Fishmongers in London the summe of nine hundred pounds, of good and lawfull monie of England to be imploied towards the conducting of Thames water, cesterning the same in lead, and casselling with stone in the parishes of saint Marie Magdalene, and saint Nicholas cold abbeie, néere vnto old Fishstréet, seauen hundred pounds. The other two hundred pounds, to paie for euer yearelie the summe of ten pounds, that is, towards the maintenance of a poore scholar in the vniuersitie of Oxenford yearelie foure pounds. Towards the mending of the high waies in the parish of Tisehurst, in the countie of Sussex, where the said Barnard was borne, euerie yeare foure pounds. And to the poore people of the parishes of saint Nicholas Olaue in Wedstréet and saint Marie Magdalene néere to old Fishstréet fortie shillings, to wit, twentie shillings to either parish for euer. More he willed and bequeathed by his last will and testament to be bestowed in land or annuities, to the releefe of the poore inhabiting in the wards of Queenehithe, and castell Bainard in the citie of London, and in the aforesaid parish of Tisehurst in the countie of Sussex, the summe of one thousand pounds.

Justice Wanlesse his chance of one thousand nine hundred pounds.

This yeare in the moneth of June, were sent to the seas, a ship called the barke Talbot, and a small barke, both manned with a hundred men, vnder the charge of William Borough esquier, clerke of hir maiesties nauie, for the apprehending of certeine outragious searouers, who for that they were manie in number, and well appointed (contemning the small strength that was set out against them) so boldlie behaued themselues, as that shortlie after it was confidentlie bruted, that they had vanquished in fight the said ship and barke. But within few daies after, beyond all expectation, they were by the said William Borough and his companie discomfited and taken, to the number of ten saile (whereof three were pates) & some of the chiefe pirats, namelie Thomas Walton alias Purser, Clinton Atkinson, William Ellis, William Valentine alias Bagh, Thomas Beuen and foure more, on the thirtith of August were hanged at Wapping in the ooze beside London. Walton as he went to the gallowes rent his venetian breeches of crimsin taffata, and distributed the same péecemeale, to such his old acquaintance as stood neere about him: but Atkinson had before giuen his murrie veluet dublet with great gold buttons, and the like coloured veluet venetians laid with great gold lace (apparell too sumptuous for searouers) which he had worne at the seas, & wherein he was brought vp prisoner from Cosse castell in the Ile of Wosbeke to London, vnto such his frends as pleased him, before he went to Wapping.

Seamen repriued but executed.

A briefe description of Clinton Atkinson and his parentage.

¶ This Clinton Atkinson (a personable fellow, tall of stature and well proportioned, of acceptable behauiour when he kept shop for himselfe, being a free man of London, and like enough to doo well if he had taken good waies) had his name of the late earle of Lincolne now deceassed, who christened him being an infant, & by whose speciall meanes (being growne a proper man) he was not long before saued from the like death, and yet thorough want of grace making relapse, fell within danger of law. He descended of honest parents, his father specially being a man of verie honest name, one that loued the truth, for the testimonie whereof he forsooke his owne native countrie, leading a hard life with his familie beyond the seas in quæne Maries daies: & returning to England at the inthronization of our gratious quæne Elisabeth in the seat royall, was made minister, in which vocation he died in Gods fauour, and the good opinion of his neighbors, leuing behind him (among other sonnes) this his eldest, sorted (as you see) to the shame, which malefactors of that qualitie, and so conuinced, can not auoid. This anoweth he that knew the man as well as the right hand from the left. Where (to conclude) we are to marke that it is not alwaies true, that good parents haue good children: for here is an example of degeneration, procured not by euill education (for this Clinton wanted no good bringing vp) but by bad companie and libertie, the verie spoile of many a one that otherwise might liue & thriue. Wherin by the way we are to wonder at the counsels of God, who suffreth children so much to varie from their parents in qualitie, as if they had not receiued their birthright, but were bastards & changlings: but to end with the prophet Dauids saieng:

Companie & libertie bring manie to miserie.

On the eighteenth daie of September, John Lewes, who named himselfe Abdoit, an obstinate heretike, denieng the godhead of Christ, and holding diuers other detestable heresies (much like to his predecessor Matthew Hamont) was burned at Norwich. amisse to touch some necessarie circumstances of remembrance.

A description of Albertus his person, apparell, &c.

This Albertus in the eies of the most, whereof some knew him, that might hardlie commend him, esteemed him a man for making well proportioned, of an indifferent tall stature, of countenance amiable, and complexion English like, having a white beard of such length and breadth, as that lieng in his bed, and parting it with his hands, the same ouerspred all his brest and shoulders, himselfe greatlie delighting therein, and reputing it an ornament: as for his qualities (apparant vnto the world) they were generous, his vtterance swæt, his wit plausible, in the knowledge of tongs well seene: his ordinarie attire scarlet, but when he presented himselfe to hir maiestie, a robe or gowne of purple velvet, with other habiliments and furniture agreeable; his shoes of a strange fashion, supposed of some not altogither vnlike Chaucers. Finallie, a gallant fellow he was, & (as might be gathered by some words spoken by him in *open audience) more Martiall than Mercuriall; verie active in respect of his age, and also studious in diverse faculties, &c.

* At Oxenford, where he termed the Latine that he spake Militare Latium, that is, souldiers Latine.

Touching the interteinement which he had at Oxenford, and how the vniversitie did congratulate his comming, it is somewhat worth the noting. In the moneth of June, the said Albertus de Lasco, comming from the marriage of the lord Morris his daughter, with sir A. Paulets eldest sonne at Ricot,

The lord Morris his daughter maried to sir A. Paulet his eldest sonne.

he put himselfe on the waie to Oxenford, whereof the vniversitie (doctor Houenden then vicechancellor, & maister Leison with maister Edes proctors) hauing intelligence, prouided for his conuenient receiuing: insomuch that in the waie to Oxenford, there met him doctor Westfailing, who greeted him with a pithie salutation. In like sort did the maior and his brethren, in whose behalfe for the whole citie, the towne clerke a worshipfull maister of art, pronounced his short and sententious speech in Latine, not without some gratulatorie gift from that corporation. On the east gate wherat he entered, stood a consort of musicians, who for a long space made verie swæt harmonie, which could not but moue & delight:

Inscia plebs populiſque arrectis auribus astat,
Dulciferumque rudi suscipit aure melos.

All vp the high street vnto saint Maries church, on either side the waie, were decentlie marshalled scholers in their gownes & caps, batchelors and maisters in their habits and hoods. At saint Maries the orator of the vniversitie (notable in his facultie) presented him a boke, in which were closelie couched verie rich and gorgeous gloues. From thense he marched to Christs church, where he was whilest he abode in the vniversitie most honourablie interteined. And the first night being vacant, as in which he sought rather rest in his lodging than recreation in anie academicall passimes, strange fire works were shewed, in the great quadrangle, besides rockets and a number such maner of deuises. On the second daie, his first dinner was made him at Alsoules college, where (besides dutifull receiuing of him) he was solemnelie satisfied with scholerlie exercises and courtlie fare. This night & the night insuing, after sumptuous suppers in his lodging, he personaly was present with his traine in the hall, first at the plaieng of a pleasant comedie intituled Riuales; then at the setting out of a verie statelie tragedie named Dido, wherein the quænes banket (with Eneas narration of the destruction of Troie) was liuelie described in a marchpaine patterne, there was also a goodlie sight of hunters with full crie of a kennell of hounds, Mercurie and Iris descending and ascending from and to an high place, the tempest wherein it hailed small confects, rained rosewater, and sneu an artificiall kind of snow, all strange, marvellous, & abundant.

The welcomming of Albertus to the vniversitie of Oxenford, with a partile description of his interteinment.

Rosine of rosewater, and baile of sugar confects, &c.

Most of the actors were of the same house, sir or seauen of them were of saint Johns, & three or foure of other colleges & hals. His second dinner the third daie was at Magdalen college, with oratorie welcomming & bountifull feasting. His third dinner the fourth daie at New college. The eloquent speech in Greeke Latine and Dutch with his owne vnstudied answer thervnto, & all other before rehersed, are not to be omitted; nor the publike philosophie, physike, and diuinitie disputations, in all which those learned opponents, respondents, & moderators, quited themselues like themselues, sharplie and soundlie, besides all other solemne sermons & lectures. At afternoone the fourth & last daie, he went towards Woodstocke manour, and without the north gate by the waie he was inuited vnto a banket at saint Johns college, where the gates & outward wals ouercouered with thousands of verses, & other emblematicall poetries then offered him, argued their hartie goodwils: but his hasting to his iournies end caused him not to tarie the delicat banket; yet onelie staieng the deliuerie of a swæt oration and his owne quicke wittie replie there vnto, he departed immediatlie, accompanied for a mile or two with the most of those reuerend doctors and heads of houses all on horsebacke, where the orator againe gaue him an orators fare well. And this is the summe of his interteinement; not deliuered in such sort as the dignitie of the same requireth; howbeit sufficient for a sudden remembrance.

On the three & twentith daie of September, John Whitegift doctor of diuinitie, sometimes maister of Trinitie colledge in Cambridge, and afterwards bishop of Worcester, was at Lambhith translated to the archbishoprike of Canturburie, where he at his comming to Lambehith (as also elsewhere he alwaies did) gaue euident testimonies both of mindfulnesse and thankefulnesse for his aduancements: as by the three tables hanging at the vpper end of his great chamber appeareth: their position in this sort. In the midst hir maiesties armes rotall artificiallie wrought, with as much cunning as the painter by his pencill could describe them: and vnder them this distichon of thankesgiuing, and welwishing:

Doctor Whitegift archbishop of Canturburie.

Nestoreos fælix regat Elisabetha per annos,
*Quæ mihi munificè * Candida dona dedit.*

Allusio, ad D. archiep. nomen.

On the right side, the armes of the see of Canturburie of azure, a pall siluer garnished with crosses forme fiche sable ouer a crosse portatile gold: to the lower end whereof this distichon is fairelie fixed:

En leue multiplici premeretur cuspide corpus,
Ni baculus Christi grande leuaret onus.

Ab Hart. quondam Cant. & Trinitarius.

On the left side are placed the ancient armes of the see of Worcester, from the which he was translated, which are of siluer, ten torteaux, foure, three, two, one: with this distichon thervnto annexed:

Qui crucis ærumnas patitur, post fata triumphat,
Lilia sic spondent fulua coniuncta talentis.]

Ouer & aboue the arms of both the said sees is his graces posie, Vincit qui patitur: a deserued posie, and iustified by his actions. The tenth of October at Easter, a towne in Norfolke neere the sea coast, about two miles from Yarmouth, there was a fish of wonderfull length, by force of the wind (being then easterlie) driuen a shore, the length whereof was from the necke vnto the taile seuentæne yards and one foote, hauing a big head; for the chap of the iaw was three yards and a quarter in length, with teeth of three quarters of a yard compas, great eies, and two great holes ouer them to spout out water, hir taile was fourtæne foot broad, &c: she laie in the sands, and was sonken therein a yard and a halfe déepe, and yet was the aboue the sands so high, that a lather of fourtéene staues would but reach to the top of hir backe; so that in thicknesse from the backe to the bellie, the was foure yards and a halfe. John Slade, sometime a scholemaister, and John Bodie a maister of art of Oxford, being both indicted and condemned of high treason, were drawne, hanged, and quartered: Slade at Winchester on the thirtith daie of October, and Bodie at Andouar on the second daie of Nouember.

Slade and Bodie executed.

About this time, one named Ditch a notable horsestealer, was apprehended at the sessions holden for the goale deliuerie at Newgat, on the fourth of December, ninetéene times indicted, whereof he confessed eightéene: who also betwéene the time of his apprehension and the said sessions, appeached manie for stealing of horses, whereof (diuerse being apprehended) ten of them were condemned, and hanged in Smithfield on the first daie of December, being Fridaie, and horse market there. He also holpe diuerse more to their horses againe which had béene stolne from them, taking of euerie one of them ten shillings the péece or more that so recouered their horses: wherby he made fiftéene pounds of currant monie towards his charges. James earle of Desmond in Ireland, secretlie wandering without anie succour as a miserable begger, being taken in his cabbin by one of the Irishrie, his head was cut off, and sent into England, where the same (as the head of an archrebell) was set vpon London bridge on the thirtéenth daie of December. Looke for the manner of his rebellion and his death more at large set downe in the histories of Ireland.

The tenth daie of December, through negligence of vndiscréet persons, brewing in the towne of Nantwich, in a place called Waterlode; the fire being carelesse left, toke hold (as should séeme) vpon some straw, or such light matter, & so burst forth to the roofes of the house, and in short time so increased, that from the west end of the towne (the wind at southwest) the flame was dispersed so furiouslie into the towne on the southside, that in short space a great part of the said southside and some of the eastside was burned downe to the ground. Which fire beginning at six of the clocke in the euening, and continuing till six of the clocke in the morning following, neuer ceased burning, till it had consumed aboue the number of two hundred houses, besides brew houses, barnes, stables, &c: in all about six hundred houses, so that by estimation of manie, the losse of houses and goods amounted to aboue thirtie thousand pounds, as more at large appeared by a particular booke printed of that matter. About this time, John Someruile a furious yong man of Edstow in Warwikeshire, of late discouered and taken in his waie comming with full intent to kill the quéenes maiestie (whom God long prosper to reigne ouer vs) confessed the treason, and that he was moued therevnto in his wicked spirit, by certeine traitorous persons his kinsmen and allies, and also by often reading of certeine seditious bookes latelie published, for the which the said Someruile, Edward Arden a squire of Parkehall in Warwikeshire, Marie Arden his wife (father and mother in law to the said Someruile) and Hugh Hall priest, being with other before indicted at Warwike, were on the sixtéenth of December arreigned in the Guildhall of London, where they were found guiltie and condemned of high treason. On the nintéenth of December, John Someruile, and Edward Arden, being brought from the tower of London to Newgate of the same citie, and there shut vp in seuerall places: within two houres after, Someruile was found (desperatlie) to haue strangled himselfe. And on the morrow being the twentith of December, Edward Arden was drawne from Newgate into Smithfield, and there hanged, bowelled, and quartered: whose head with Somerviles was set on London bridge, and his quarters on the gates of the citie; but the bodie of Somerville was buried in the Moorefields, néere vnto the windmils without Moregate. A dreadfull example of Gods heauie iudgement vpon those two offendors; but spectallie against the last, whome God deliuered to a reprobat mind, in somuch that his owne hands became his hangman, preuenting the office of the common executioner, who should haue performed that last action vpon him: whereof the iustice of God in vengeance made himselfe the finisher and fulfiller. Thus much by the waie of terror, that the remembrance hereof, by the reading & reporting of the same, maie make men euill minded, amazed at the rigorous reuenge-ment which God taketh (when he séeth his due time) vpon the wicked: after his long sufferance and patience most wickedlie abused; wherof the poet saith:

Nantwich in Cheshire burnt.

Somerville, Arden, and others arreigned.

Arden executed.

This booke for the time that it was in request, set peoples tongues on worke, and filled their minds with strange conceipts.

In this yeare 1583 (which should haue béene noted in the fore part of the yeare) by the meanes of a certeine astrologicall discourse, vpon the great and notable coniunction of the two superior planets, Saturne and Jupiter, prognosticated to be the eight and twentith of April; the common sort of people, yea and no small multitude of such as thinke scorne to be called fooles, or counted beggers, whilest they were in expectation of this coniunction, were in no small imaginations, supposing that no lesse would haue béene effectuated, than by the said discourse was prophesied. Into these fansies not void of feare and mistrust they were drawne with the more facilitie, for that they had read, and heard, & pondered, and suspected, and in part beléeued the predictions of such euents as should insue by influence of that coniunction. For it was termed the great and notable coniunction, which should be manifested to the ignorant sort, by manie fierce and boisterous winds then suddenlie breaking out. It was called the greatest and most soueregne coniunction among the seuen planets: why so? Because lawes, and empires, and regions are ruled by the same: which foretelleth the comming of a prophet, & the destruction of certeine climats and parts of the earth, and new found heresies, and a new founded kingdome, and damages through the pestilence, and abundant showers: which doth prognosticat the destinie of a great and mightie king, much sorrow & heauinesse to men, losses to rich and noble men, yea and those to which are accounted and reputed like to prophets, and a multitude of locusts: which doth foreshew, that weightie and wonderfull things shall come into the world: which doth threaten continuall ouerflowes of waters, and particular deluges in some countries: finallie, which menaceth much mischiefe. The publication, off reading, and talking of this coniunction, with the remembrance of the instant wherin it should be, made manie (when the date foretold was come) to looke for some strange apparition or vision in the aire; and withall, put them in mind of an old and common prophesie, touching the yeare 1588, which is now so rife in euerie mans mouth. That yeare was manie hundred yeares ago foretold and much spoken of amongst astrologers, who haue as it were, vnanimi consensu, prognosticated, that either a maruellous fearfull & horrible alteration of empires, kingdoms, segniories and estates, togither likewise with other most wonderfull, and verie extraordinarie accidents,

Why it was called the great coniunction.

Touching the yeare of wonders, gathered to be 1588.

dents,

dents, as extreame hunger and pestilence, desperat treasons and commotions shall then fall out, to the miserable affliction and oppression of huge multitudes: or else, that an vtter and finall ouerthrowe and destruction of the whole world shall insue: which prophesie is conteined in these verses following:

Leouitius Regiomontanus.

Post mille expletos à partu Virginis annos,
Et post quingentos rursus ab orbe datos:
Octogesimus octauus mirabilis annus
Ingruet, is secum tristia fata feret.
Si non hoc anno totus malus occidet orbis,
Si non in nihilum terra, fretúmque ruet:
Cuncta tamen mundi sursum ibunt atque retrorsum,
Imperia, & luctus vndique grandis erit.

So that by this prophesie, either a finall dissolution, or a wonderfull horrible alteration of the world is then to be expected. All these considerations laid togither, as well the prediction of the coniunction in expectation, as also the dreadfull euents, which were to insue therevpon: and vpon the necke of these, the great yeare of 1588 in euerie mans mouth, the more frequent and common by occasion of a booke extant vnder the title of the end of the world, and the second comming of Christ, made diuerse diuerslie affected; insomuch that some conuersing and conferring, looked for no lesse than was prophesied; and talking verie religiouslie, seemed as though they would become sanctified people: howbeit, the day of the coniunction being past, with a certeine counterchecke against the said astrologicall discourse in some points defectiue, and no such euents palpablie perceiued as were prognosticated; people fell to their former securitie, and condemned the discourser of extreame madnesse and follie: whereof no more but this, Scientia nullum habet sibi inimicum præter ignorantem.

The great yeare of 1588 is more talked of than feared.

When people saw nothing in the aire (as they looked for) they fell to derision.

1584

On the tenth of Januarie in the yeare 1584 at a sessions holden in the iustice hall in the old bailie of London for goale deliuerie of Newgate, William Cartar of the citie of London was there indicted, arreigned, and condemned of high treason, for printing a seditious and traitorous booke in English, intituled A treatise of schisme: and was for the same (according to sentence pronounced against him) on the nert morrow, which was the eleuenth of Januarie, drawne from Newgate to Tiborne, and there hanged, bowelled, and quartered. And forthwith against slanderous reports, spread abroad in seditious bookes, letters and libels, thereby to inflame the hearts of our countriemen, and hir maiesties subiects: a booke was published, intituled, A declaration of the fauorable dealing of hir maiesties commissioners, &c. Which booke I haue thought good in this place to set downe (for the better instruction of the reader) euen as the same was printed and published, and thus it followeth.

Tartar executed for printing a traitorous booke.

A declaration of the fauorable dealing of hir maiesties commissioners, for the examining of traitors.

A declaration of the fauourable dealing of hir maiesties commissioners appointed for the examination of certeine traitors, and of tortures vniustlie reported to be done vpon them for matters of religion.

To the reader.

GOod reader, although hir maiesties most mild and gratious gouernement be sufficient to defend it selfe against those most slanderous reports of heathenish and vnnaturall tyrannie and cruell tortures, pretended to haue beene executed vpon certeine traitors, who latelie suffered for their treason, and others, as well spread abroad by rungates, Iesuits, and seminarie men in their seditious bookes, letters, and libels, in forren countries and princes courts, as also insinuated into the hearts of some of our owne countriemen and hir maiesties subiects: yet for thy better satisfaction I haue conferred with a verie honest gentleman, whom I knew to haue good and sufficient meanes to deliuer the truth against such forgers of lies and shameless slanders in that behalfe, which he and other that do know and haue affirmed the same will at all times iustifie. And for thy further assurance and satisfaction herein, he hath set downe to the vew of all men these necessarie notes following.

Touching the racke and torments vsed to such traitors as pretended themselues to be catholikes, vpon whom the same haue beene exercised, it is affirmed for truth, and is offered vpon due examination so to be proued, to be as followeth. First, that the formes of torture in their seueritie or rigour of execution, haue not beene such and in such maner performed, as the slanderers and seditious libellers haue slanderouslie & maliciouslie published. And that euen the principall offendor Campion himselfe, who was sent & came from Rome, and continued here in sundrie corners of the realme, hauing secretlie wandered in the greatest part of the shires of England in a disguised sort, to the intent to make speciall preparation of treasons; and to that end and for furtherance of those his labours, sent ouer for more helpe and assistance, and cunninglie and traitorouslie at Rome before he came from thense, procured toleration for such prepared rebels to keepe themselues couert vnder pretense of temporarie and permissiue obedience to hir maiestie the state standing as it doth; but so soone as there were sufficient force thereby the bull of hir maiesties deprivation might be publikelie executed, they should then ioine all togither with that force vpon paine of curse and damnation: that verie Campion, I saie, before the conference had with him by learned men in the Tower, wherin he was charitablie vsed, was neuer so racked, but that he was presentlie able to walke, and to write, and did presentlie write and subscribe all his confessions, as by the originals thereof may euidentlie appeare.

The slanderous report concerning the extreame vse of racke conuicted.

Campion and Bziant were fauourablie vsed: and far vnder the proportion of their treasonable offenses.

A horrible matter is also made of the starning of one Alexander Bziant, how he should eat clate out of the wals, gathered water to drinke from the droppings of houses, with such other false ostentations of immanitie: where the truth is this, that what soeuer Bziant suffered in want of food, he suffered the same wilfullie & of extreame impudent obstinacie, against the mind and liking of those that dealt with him. For certeine traitorous writings being found about him, it was thought conuenient by conference of hands to vnderstand whose writing they were, and therevpon he being in hir maiesties name commanded to write, which he could verie well do, and being permitted to him to write what he would himselfe, in these termes, that if he liked not to write one thing, he might write another, or what he listed (which to do being charged in hir maiesties name was his dutie, and to refuse was disloiall and vndutifull) yet the man would by no meanes be induced to write anie thing at all. Then was it commanded to his keeper to giue vnto him such meat, drinke, and other conuenient necessaries as he would write for, and to forbeare to giue him anie thing for which he would not write.

But Bziant being thereof aduertised and oft mooued to write, persisting so in his errit heart by almost two daies and two nights, made choise rather to lacke food, than to write for the sustenance which he might readilie haue had for writing, & which he had indeed readilie and plentifullie so soone as he wrote. And as it is said of these two, so is it to be said of other; with this, that there was a perpetuall care had, & the quēnes seruants the warders, whose office and act it is to handle the racke, were euer by those that attended the examinations specially charged, to vse it in as charitable maner as such a thing might be.

Secondlie it is said, and likewise offered to be iustified, that neuer anie of these seminaries, or such other pretended catholikes, which at anie time in hir maiesties reigne haue bēne put to the racke, were vpon the racke or in other torture demanded anie question of their supposed conscience; as what they beleeued in anie point of doctrine or faith, as the masse, transubstantiation, or such like: but onelie with what persons at home, or abroad, and touching what plats, practises and conferences they had dealt about attempts against hir maiesties estate or person, or to alter the lawes of the realme for matters of religion, by treason or by force, and how they were persuaded themselues, and did persuade other touching the popes bull and pretense of authoritie, to depose kings and princes; and namelie, for deprivation of hir maiestie, and to discharge subiects from their allegiance, expressing herein alwaie the kinglie powers and estates, and the subiects allegiance ciuilie, without mentioning or meaning therein anie right that the quēne as in right of the crowne hath ouer persons ecclesiasticall being hir subiects. In all which cases, Campion and the rest neuer answered plainelie, but sophisticallie, deceitfullie and traitorouslie, restraining their confession of allegiance onelie to the permissiue forme of the popes toleration. As for example, if they were asked, whether they did acknowledge themselues the quēnes subiects and would obeie hir, they would saie, Yea: for so they had leaue for a time to do. But adding more to the question, and they being asked, if they would so acknowledge & obeie hir anie longer than the pope would so permit them; or notwithstanding such commandement as the pope would or might giue to the contrarie: then they either refused so to obeie, or denied to answer; or said, that they could not answer to those questions without danger. Which verie answer without more saieng, was a plaine answer to all reasonable vnderstanding, that they would no longer be subiects, nor persuade other to be subiects, than the pope gaue licence. And at their verie arreignement, when they laboured to leaue in the minds of the people and standers by, an opinion that they were to die, not for treason, but for matter of faith and conscience in doctrine, touching the seruice of God, without anie attempt or purpose against hir maiestie, they cried out that they were true subiects, and did and would obeie and serue hir maiestie. Immediatlie, to proue whether that hypocriticall and sophisticall speach extended to a perpetuitie of their obedience, or to so long time as the pope so permitted, or no; they were openlie in place of iudgement asked by the quēnes learned councell, whether they would so obeie and be true subiects, if the pope commanded the contrarie: They plainlie disclosed themselues in answer, saieng by the mouth of Campion: This place (meaning the court of hir maiesties Bench) hath no power to inquire or iudge of the holie fathers authoritie: and other answer they would not make.

Thirdlie, that none of them haue bēne put to the racke or torture, no not for the matters of treason, or partnership of treason or such like, but where it was first knowen and euidentlie probable by former detections, confessions, and otherwise, that the partie so racked, or tortured, was giltie, and did know, and could deliuer truth of the things wherewith he was charged: so as it was first assured, that no innocent was at anie time tormented, and the racke was neuer vsed to wring out confessions at aduenture vpon vncertenties, in which doing it might be possible that an innocent in that case might haue bin racked.

Fourthlie, that none of them hath bēne racked or tortured, vnlesse he had first said expressie, or amounting to almuch, that he will not tell the truth, though the quēne command him. And if anie of them being examined did saie he could not tell, or did not remember, if he would so affirme in such maner as christians among christians are beleeued; such his answer was accepted, if there were not apparant euidence to proue that he wilfullie said vntrulie. But if he said that his answer in deliuering truth, should hurt a catholike, & so be an offense against the charitie, which they said to be sinne, & that the quēne could not command them to sin, & therfore how soeuer the quēne commanded, they would not tell the truth, which they were knowen to know, or to such effect; they were then put to the torture, or else not.

Fiftlie, that the proceeding to torture was alwaie so slowlie, so vnwillinglie, & with so manie preparations of persuasions to spare themselues, and so manie meanes to let them know that the truth was by them to be vttered, both in dutie to hir maiestie, and in wisedome for themselues, as whosoeuer was present at those actions, must needes acknowledge in hir maiesties ministers, a full purpose to follow the example of hir owne most gratious disposition; whome God long preserue.

Thus it appeareth, that albeit by the more generall lawes of nations torture hath bēne, and is lawfullie iudged to be vsed in lesser cases, and in that per maner for inquisition of truth in crimes not so nere extending to publike danger, as these vngratious persons haue committed, whose conspiracies and the particularities thereof it did so much import and behoue to haue disclosed: yet euen in that necessarie vse of such proceeding, inforced by the offendors notorious obstinacie, is neuertheless to be acknowledged the sweet temperature of hir maiesties mild and gratious clemencie, and their slanderous lewdnesse to be the more condemned, that haue in fauour of hainous malefactors, and stubborne traitors, spred vntrue rumors and slanders, to make hir mercifull gouernement disliked, vnder false pretense and rumors of sharpenesse and crueltie to those, against whom nothing can be cruell, and yet vpon whom nothing hath bēne done but gentle and mercifull.

Ergo it is false which the infamous libeller hath said abrode, Religio crimen non mala vita fuit.

This is consonant to the report set downe before in the discourse of Campion. pag. 1325.

What allegiance these fellows meant to hir maiestie may appeere by their words of Campion, being the mouth of the rest.

The execution of iustice in England for maintenance of publike and christian peace, against certeine stirrers of sedition, and adherents to the traitors and enimies of the realme, without anie persecution of them for questions of religion, as is falslie reported and published by the fautors and fosterers of their treasons.

All offendors couer their faults with contrarie causes.

IT hath bēne in all ages and in all countries a common vsage of all offendors, for the most part, both great and small, to make defense of their lewd and vnlawfull facts by vntruths, and by colouring and couering their deeds (were they neuer so vile) with pretenses of some other causes of contrarie operations or effects: to the intent not onelie to auoid punishment or shame, but to continue, vphold, and prosecute their wicked attempts, to the full satisfaction of their disordered and malicious appetites. And though such hath bēne the vse of all offendors, yet of none with more danger than of rebels and traitors to their lawfull princes, kings, and countries. Of which sort of late yeares are specially to be noted certeine persons naturallie borne subiects in the realme of England and Ireland, who hauing for some good time

Rebels do most dangerouslie couer their faults.

profes-

professed outwardlie their obedience to their soueraigne ladie quéene Elisabeth, haue neuertheless afterward bæne stirred vp and seduced by wicked spirits, first in England sundrie yeares past, and secondlie and of later time in Ireland, to enter into open rebellion, taking armes and comming into the field against hir maiestie and hir lieutenants, with their forces vnder banners displaied, inducing by notable vntruths manie simple people to follow and assist them in their traitorous actions.

Rebellion in England and Ireland.

And though it is verie well knowen, that both their intentions and manifest actions were bent to haue deposed the quéenes maiestie from hir crowne, and to haue traitorouslie set in hir place some other whome they liked, whereby if they had not bæne spedilie resisted, they would haue committed great bloudsheds and slaughters of hir maiesties faithfull subiects, and ruined their natiue countrie: yet by Gods power giuen vnto hir maiestie, they were so spedilie vanquished, as some few of them

The rebels vanquished by the quéens power.

Some of the rebels fled into forreine countries.

suffered by order of law according to their deserts, manie & the greatest part vpon confession of their faults were pardoned, the rest (but they not manie) of the principall escaped into forren countries, & there, bicause in none or few places rebels and traitors to their naturall princes and countries dare for their treasons challenge at their first muster open comfort or succour, these notable traitors and rebels haue fallelie informed manie kings, princes and states, and specially the bishop of Rome, commonlie called the pope (from whom they all had secretlie their first comfort to rebell), that the cause of their fleing from their countries was for the religion of Rome, and for maintenance of the said popes authoritie: whereas diuerse of them before their rebellion liued so notoriouslie, the most part of their lines, out of all good rule, either for honest maners, or for anie sense in religion, as they might haue bæne rather familiar with Catiline, or fauourers to Sardanapalus, than accounted good subiects vnder anie christian princes. As for some examples of the heads of these rebellions, out of England fled Charles Neuill earle of Westmerland, a person vtterlie wasted by lasciuiousnesse of life, and by Gods punishment euen in the time of his rebellion bereaued of his children that should haue succéeded him in the earledome, and his bodie now eaten with vlcers of leiud causes (as his companions do saie), that no surgion he hath can with him a viler punishment: a pitifull losse to the realme of so noble a house, neuer before in anie age attainted for disloialtie. And out of Ireland ran awaie one Thomas Stukelele, a defamed person almost thorough all christendome, and a faithlesse beast rather than a man, fleeing first out of England for notable pirasies, and out of Ireland for trecheries not pardonable, which two were the first ringleaders of the rest of the rebels, the one for England, the other for Ireland.

Ringleaders of rebels. Charles Neuill earle of Westmerland, and Thomas Stukelele.

But notwithstanding the notorious euill and wicked liues of these & others their confederats, void of all christian religion, it liked the bishop of Rome, as in fauour of their treasons, not to colour their offenses, as themselues openlie pretend to do, for auoiding of common shame of the world: but flatlie to animate them to continue their former wicked purposes, that is, to take armes against their lawfull quéene, to inuade hir realme with forren forces, to pursue all hir good subiects & their natiue countries with fire and sword: for maintenance whereof there had some yeares before, at sundrie times, proceéded in a thundering sort, buls, excommunications, and other publike writings, denouncing hir maiestie being the lawfull quéene, and Gods anointed seruant not to be the quéene of the realme, charging and vp-on paines of excommunication commanding all hir subiects to depart from their naturall allegiances, whereto by birth and by oth they were bound: pronouncing also and authorizing all persons of all degrees within both the realmes to rebell. And vpon this antichristian warrant, being contrarie to all the lawes of God and man, & nothing agreeable to a pastorall officer, not onelie all the rable of the foresaid traitors that were before fled; but also all other persons that had forsaken their natiue countries, being of diuerse conditions and qualities, some not able to liue at home but in beggerie, some discontented for lacke of preferments, which they gaped for vnworthilie in vniuersities and other places, some bankerupt merchants, some in a sort learned to contentions, being not contented to learne to obeie the laws of the land, haue manie yeares running vp and downe, from countrie to countrie, practised some in one corner, some in an other, some with seeking to gather forces and monie for forces, some with instigation of princes by vntruths, to make warre vpon their naturall countrie, some with inward practises to murther the greatest, some with seditious writings, and verie manie of late with publike infamous libels, full of despitefull vile termes and poisoned lies, altogither to vphold the foresaid antichristian and tyrannous warrant of the popes bull.

The practises of the traitors rebels, and their gifts to execute the bull.

And yet also by some other meanes, to further these inuentions, bicause they could not readilie preuaile by waie of force, finding forren princes of better consideration & not readilie inclined to their wicked purposes, it was deuised to erect vp certeine schooles which they called seminaries, to nourish and bring vp persons disposed naturallie to sedition, to continue their race & trade, and to become séedmen in their tillage of sedition, and them to send secretlie into these the quéenes maiesties realmes of England & Ireland vnder secret maskes, some of priesthood, some of other inferiour orders, with titles of seminaries for some of the meaner sort, and of Iesuits for the stagers and ranker sort and such like, but yet so warilie they crept into the land, as none brought the markes of their priesthood with them. But in diuers corners of hir maiesties dominions these seminaries or séedmen and Iesuits, bringing with them certeine Romish trash, as of their hallowed wax, their Agnus Dei, their graines, and manie kind of beads, and such like, haue as tillagemen laboured secretlie to persuade the people to allow of the popes foresaid buls and warrants, & of his absolute authoritie ouer all princes and countries, and striking manie with pricks of conscience to obeie the same; whereby in proceesse of small time, if this wicked and dangerous, traitorous, & craftie course had not bæne by Gods goodnesse espied and staied, there had followed imminent danger of horrible vproes in the realmes, and a manifest bloudie destruction of great multitudes of christians.

Seminaries erected to nurse sedicious fugitiues.

The seminarie fugitiues come secretlie into the realme to intrude the people to obeie the popes bull.

For it can not be denied but that so manie as should haue bæne induced & thoroughlie persuaded to haue obeied that wicked warrant of the popes, and the contents thereof, should haue bæne forthwith in their harts and consciences secret traitors, and for to be in déed errant and open traitors: there should haue wanted nothing but opportunitie to féele their strength & to assemble themselues in such numbers with armour and weapons, as they might haue presumed to haue bæne the greater part, and so by open ciuill warre to haue come to their wicked purposes. But Gods goodnesse, by whome kings do rule, and by whose blast traitors are commonlie wasted and confounded, hath otherwise giuen to hir maiestie as to his handmaid and deare seruant, ruling vnder him, the spirit of wisedome and power, where-

by

by the hath caused some of these seditious seedmen and sowers of rebellion, to be discouered for all their secret lurkings, and to be taken and charged with these former points of high treason, not being dealt withall vpon questions of religion, but suffrie by order of lawes, openlie condemned as traitors.

Sowers of treason taken, commanded, & executed after. Anno.

At which times, notwithstanding all maner gentle waies of persuasions vsed, to moue them to desist from such manifest traitorous courses and opinions with offer of mercie; yet was the canker of their rebellious humors so deepelie entered and grauen into the harts of manie of them, as they would not be remoued from their traitorous determinations. And therefore as manifest traitors in mainteining and adhering to the capitall enimie of hir maiestie & hir crowne (who hath not onelie beene the cause of two rebellions alreadie pasted in England and Ireland, but in that of Ireland did manifestlie wage and mainteine his owne people, capteins, and souldiers vnder the banner of Rome, against hir maiestie, so as no enimie could do more) these I saie haue iustlie suffered death not by force or forme of anie new lawes established, either for religion or against the popes supremasie, as the slanderous libellers would haue it seene to be; but by the ancient temporall lawes of the realme, and namelie by the laws of parlement made in king Edward the third his time, about the yeare of our Lord 1330, which is aboue two hundred yeares and more past, when the bishops of Rome and popes were suffered to haue their authoritie ecclesiasticall in this realme, as they had in manie other countries. But yet of this kind of offendors, as manie of them, as after their condemnations were contented to renounce their former traitorous assertions; so manie were spared from execution, & do liue still at this date: such was the vnwillingnes in hir maiestie to haue anie bloud spilt, without this verie vrgent, iust, and necessarie cause proceeding from themselues.

The practises of the traitors rebels, and fugitiues to execute the bull.

The seditious traitors condemned by the ancient lawes of the realme, made two hundred yeres past.

Seminaries erected to nurtle seditious fugitiues.

Persons condemned, spared from execution, vpon reuocall of their treasonable opinions.

And yet neuertheles, such of the rest of the traitors as remaine in forren parts, continuing still their rebellious minds, and craftilie keeping themselues aloofe off from dangers, ceasse not to prouoke sundrie other inferiour seditious persons, newlie to steale secretlie into the realme, to vrsue the former seditious practises, to the execution of the popes foresaid bull against hir maiestie and the realme, pretending when they are apprehended, that they came onelie into the realme by the commandement of their superiors, the heads of the Iesuits, to whome they are bound (as they saie) by oth against either king or countrie, and here to informe or reforme mens consciences from errors in some points of religion, as they thinke meet. But yet in verie truth, the whole scope of their secret labours is manifestlie proued, to be secretlie to win all people, with whom they dare deale; so to allow of the popes said buls, and of his authoritie without exception, as in obeieng thereof, they take themselues fullie discharged of their allegiance and obedience to their lawfull prince and countrie: yea, and to be well warranted to take armes to rebell against hir maiestie, when they shall be thereunto called; and to be readie secretlie to ioine with any forren force that can be procured to inuade the realme, whereof also they haue a long time giuen, and yet do for their aduantage, no small comfort of successe. And so consequentlie the effect of their labours is to bring the realme not onelie into a dangerous warre against the forces of strangers (from which it hath beene free aboue three and twentie or foure and twentie yeares, a case verie memorable and hard to be matched with an example of the like) but into a warre domesticall and ciuill, wherein no bloud is vsuallie spared, nor mercie yeelded, and wherein neither the vanquished nor the vanquished can haue iust cause of triumph.

The forren natiues commaunde sending ouer persons to moue sedition in the realme.

The seminarie fugitiues come secretlie into the realme to intrance the people to obeie the popes bull.

The seditious fugitiues labour to bring the realme into a warre externall and domesticall.

And forsomuch as these are the most euident perils that necessarilie should follow, if these kind of vermine were suffered to creepe by stealth into the realme, and to spred their poison within the same, howsoeuer when they are taken, like hypocrits, they colour and counterfeit the same with profession of deuotion in religion: it is of all persons to be yeelded in reason, that hir maiestie and all hir gouernours and magistrats of iustice, hauing care to mainteine the peace of the realme (which God hath giuen in hir time, to continue longer than euer in anie time of hir progenitors) ought of dutie to almightie God the author of peace, and according to the naturall loue and charge due to their countrie, and for auoiding of the flouds of bloud, which in ciuill warres are seene to run and flow, by all lawfull meanes possible, as well by the sword as by law, in their seuerall seasons to impeach and repell these so manifest and dangerous colourable practises, and workes of sedition and rebellion.

The dutie of the queene and all hir gouernors to God and their countrie, is to repell practises of rebellion.

And though there are manie subiects knowne in the realme, that differ in some opinions of religion from the church of England and that do also not forbeare to profesle the same: yet in that they do also profesle loialtie and obedience to hir maiestie, and offer readilie to hir maiesties defense, to impugne & resist anie forreine force, though it should come or be procured from the pope himselfe: none of these sort are for their contrarie opinions in religion prosecuted or charged with anie crimes or paines of treason, nor yet willinglie searched in their consciences for their contrarie opinions, that sauour not of treason. And of these sorts, there haue beene and are a number of persons, not of such base and vulgar note as those which of late haue beene executed, as in particular, some by name are well knowne, and not vnfit to be remembred. The first and chiefest by office was doctor Heth, that was archbishop of Yorke, and lord chancellor of England in queene Maries time; who at the first comming of hir maiestie to the crowne, shewing himselfe a faithfull and quiet subiect, continued in both the said offices, though in religion then manifestlie differing; and yet was he not restreined of his libertie, nor deprined of his proper lands and goods, but leauing willinglie both his offices, liued in his owne house verie discreetlie, and inioied all his purchased lands during all his naturall life, vntill by verie age he departed this world, and then left his house and liuing to his friends. An example of gentlenesse neuer matched in queene Maries time.

None charged with capitall crimes, being of a contrarie religion, and profesling to withstand forreine forces.

The like did one doctor Pole that had beene bishop of Peterborough, an ancient graue person, and a verie quiet subiect. There were also others that had beene bishops and in great estimation, as doctor Tunstall bishop of Duresme, a person of great reputation, and also whilest he liued of verie quiet behauiour. There were also other, as doctor White & doctor Ozlethorpe, the one of Winchester, the other of Carlill, bishops, persons of courteous natures, and he of Carlill so inclined to dutifulnes to the queenes maiestie, as he did the office at the consecration and coronation of hir maiestie in the church of Westminster: and doctor Thurlebie, & doctor Watson yet liuing, one of Elie, the other of Lincolne, bishops: the one of nature affable, the other altogither sowre, and yet liuing. Whereto may be added the bishop then of Exceter, Turberuile, an honest gentleman, but a simple bishop, who liued at his owne libertie to the end of his life: and none of all these prelled with anie capitall paine, though they mainteined the popes authoritie against the lawes of the realme. And some abbats, as maister Feckenam yet liuing, Names of diuerse ecclesiasticall persons profesling contrarie religion, neuer charged with capitall crimes.

a person also of quiet and courteous behauiour, for a great time. Some also were deanes, as doctor Worall deane of Windsore, a person of great modestie, learning and knowledge: doctor Cole deane of Paules, a person more earnest than discréet: doctor Reinolds deane of Excester, not vnlearned, and manie such others, hauing borne office & dignities in the church, & that had made profession against the pope, which they onelie began in quéene Maries time to change: yet were these neuer to this daie burdened with capitall peanes, nor yet deprined of anie their goods or proper liuelods; but onelie remoued from their ecclesiasticall offices, which they would not exercise according to the lawes. And most of them, & manie other of their sort for a great time were deteined in bishops houses in verie ciuill and courteous maner, without charge to themselues or their friends, vntill the time that the pope began by his buls & messages, to offer trouble to the realme by stirring of rebellion. About which time onlie, some of these aforenamed, being found busier in matters of state tending to stir troubles, than was méete for the common quiet of the realme, were remoued to other more priuat places, where such other wanderers as were men knowne to moue sedition, might be restreined from common resorting to them to increase trouble, as the popes bull gaue manifest occasion to doubt: and yet without charging them in their consciences or otherwise, by anie inquisition to bring them into danger of anie capitall law: so as no one was called to anie capitall or bloudie question vpon matters of religion, but haue all inioied their life as the course of nature would: and such of them as yet remaine, may (if they will not be authors or instruments of rebellion or sedition) inioie the time that God and nature shall yeld them without danger of life or member.

The late fauorers of the popes authoritie were the chiefe aduersaries of the same, by their doctrines and writings.

And yet it is worthie to be well marked, that the chiefest of all these and the most of them, had in time of king Henrie the eight, and king Edward the first, either by preaching, writing, reading, or arguing, taught all people to condemne, yea to abhorre the authoritie of the pope: for which purpose they had many times giuen their othes publikelie, against the popes authoritie, and had also yéelded to both the said kings the title of supreame hed of the church of England next vnder Christ, which title the aduersaries do most falselie write and affirme, that the quéenes maiestie now vseth: a manifest lie & vntruth, to be séene by the verie acts of parlement, and at the beginning of hir reigne omitted in hir stile. And for proofe that these foresaid bishops and learned men had so long time disauowed the popes authoritie, manie of their books and sermons against the popes authoritie remaine printed both in English and Latin to be séene in these times, to their great shame and reproofe to change so often, but specially in persecuting such as themselues had taught and stablished to hold the contrarie. A sin, nere the sin against the holie ghost.

A great number of late persons of liuelod being of a contrarie religion, neuer charged with capitall crime.

There were also and yet be a great number of others, being late men of good possessions and lands, men of good credit in their countries, manifestlie of late time seduced to hold contrarie opinions in religion for the popes authoritie: and yet none of them haue béene sought hitherto to be impeached in anie point or quarell of treason, or of losse of life, member or inheritance. So as it may plainelie appeare, that it is not, nor hath béene for contrarious opinions in religion, or for the popes authoritie alone, as the aduersaries do boldlie and falslie publish, that anie persons haue suffered death since hir maiesties reigne. And yet some of these sort are well knowne to hold opinon, that the pope ought by authoritie of Gods word to be supreame and onelie head of the catholike church through the whole world, and onelie to rule in all causes ecclesiasticall, and that the quéenes maiestie ought not to be the gouernour ouer anie hir subiects in hir realme being persons ecclesiasticall: which opinions are neuertheless in some part by the lawes of the realme punishable in their degrées. And yet for none of these points haue anie persons béene prosecuted with the charge of treason, or in danger of life.

No person charged with capitall crime for the onelie maintenance of the popes supremasie.

And if then it be inquired, for what cause these others haue of late suffered death, it is trulie to be answered as afore is often remembred, that none at all were impeached for treason to the danger of their life, but such as did obstinatlie mainteine the contents of the popes bull afore mentioned; which do import, that hir maiestie is not the lawfull quéene of England, the first and highest point of treason: and that all hir subiects are discharged of their oths and obedience; a second high point of treason: and all warranted to disobeie hir and hir lawes; a third and a verie large point of treason. And thereto is to be added a fourth point most manifest, in that they would not disallow the popes hostile procéedings in open warres against hir maiestie in hir realme of Ireland, where one of their companie doctor Sanders, a lewd scholer and subiect of England, a fugitiue and a principall companion and conspirator with the traitors and rebels at Rome, was by the popes speciall cõmission a commander, as in forme of a legat, and sometime a burser or paimaster for those wars. Which doctor Sanders in his booke of his church monarchie, did afore his passing into Ireland openlie by writing, gloriouslie auow the foresaid bull of Pius Quintus against hir maiestie, to be lawfull; and affirmeth that by vertue thereof one doctor Morton, an old English fugitiue and conspirator, was sent from Rome into the north parts of England, which was true, to stirre vp the first rebellion there, whereof Charles Neuill the late earle of Westmerland was a head capteine.

Foure points of treason. Such cõdemned onelie for treason, as mainteine the effects of the popes bull against hir maiestie and the realme.

Doctor Sanders maintenance of the popes bull.

And thereby it may manifestlie appéere to all men, how this bull was the ground of the rebellions both in England and Ireland, and how for maintenance thereof, and for sowing of sedition by warrant and allowance of the same, these persons were iustlie condemned of treason, and lawfullie executed by the ancient lawes temporall of the realme, without charging them for anie other matter than for their practises and conspiracies both abroad and at home against the quéene and the realme; and for the mainteining of the popes foresaid authoritie and bull, published to depriue hir maiestie of hir crowne, and for withdrawing and reconciling of hir subiects from their naturall allegiance due to hir maiestie and to their countrie, and for moouing them to sedition: and for no other causes or questions of religion were these persons condemned; although true it is, that when they were charged & conuinced of these points of conspiracies and treasons, they would still in their answers colourablie pretend their actions to haue béene for religion: but in déed and truth they were manifested to be for the procurement and maintenance of the rebellions and wars against hir maiestie and hir realme.

The persons that suffered death, were condemned for treason & not for religion.

The diuersitie betwixt truth and falshod.

And herein is now the manifest diuersitie to be séene and well considered betwixt the truth of hir maiesties actions, & the falshod of the blasphemous aduersaries: that where the factious partie of the pope the principall author of the inuasions of hir maiesties dominions, do falselie allege that a number of persons, whom they terme as martyrs, haue died for defense of the catholike religion; the same in verie truth may manifestlie appere to haue died (if they so will haue it) as martyrs for the pope, but yet as traitors tors against their soueraigne and quéene in adhering to him, being the notable and onelie open hostile enimie in all actions of warre against hir maiestie, hir kingdomes and people: and that this is the meaning of all these that haue so obstinatlie mainteined the authoritie and contents of this bull, the verie words of the bull do declare in this sort, as doctor Sanders reporteth them.

A bull prooue that the maintainers of the bull are guiltie of treason.

Pius Quintus pontifex maximus, de apostolicæ potestatis plenitudine, declarauit Elisabetham prætenso regni iure, necnon omne & quocunque dominio, dignitate, priuilegióque priuatam: itémque proceres, subditos & populos dicti regni, ac cæteros omnes qui illi quomodocunque iurauerunt, à iuramento huiusmodi ac omni fidelitatis debito, perpetuò absolutos: That is to saie, Pius Quintus the greatest bishop, of the fulnesse of the apostolike power, declared Elisabeth to be bereaued or depriued of hir pretended right of hir kingdome, and also of all and whatsoeuer dominion, dignitie and priuilege: and also the nobles, subiects and people of the said kingdome, and all others which had sworne to hir anie maner of waies, to be absolued for euer from such oth, and from all debt or dutie of fealtie, &c: with manie threatning cursings, to all that durst obeie hir or hir lawes. As for execution hereof, to proue, that the effect of the popes bull and message was a flat rebellion, it is not amisse to heare what the same doctor Sanders the popes firebrand in Ireland also writeth in his visible church monarchie, which is thus.

No person charged with capitall crime for the onelie maintenance of the popes supremasie.

Foure points of treason.

Such condemned onelie for treason, as mainteine the effects of the popes bulla against hir maiestie and the realme.

Persons and Campion are offendors as doctor Sanders is, for allowance of the bull.

Doctor Morton's secret ambassage from Rome to stir the rebellion in the north.

Pius Quintus pontifex maximus, Anno Domini 1569 reuerendum presbyterum Nicolaum Mortonum Anglum in Angliam misit, vt certis illustribus viris authoritate apostolica denuntiaret, Elisabetham quæ tunc rerum potiebatur, hæreticam esse: ob eámque causam, omni dominio & potestate excidisse, impunéque ab illis velut ethnicam haberi posse, nec eos illius legibus aut mandatis deinceps obedire cogi: That is to saie, Pius Quintus the greatest bishop, in the yeare of our Lord 1569, sent the reuerend priest Nicholas Morton an Englishman into England, that he should denounce or declare by the apostolike authoritie to certeine noblemen, Elisabeth, who then was in possession, to be an heretike: & for that cause, to haue fallen from all dominion and power, and that she may be had or reputed of them as an ethnike, and that they are not to be compelled to obeie hir lawes or commandements, &c. Thus you see an ambassage of rebellion from the popes holinesse, the ambassador an old doting English priest, a fugitiue and conspirator, sent (as he saith) to some noble men, and these were the two earles of Northumberland and Westmerland, heads of the rebellion. And after this, he followeth to declare the successe therof, which I dare saie he was sorie it was so euill, with these words.

Doctor Sanders maintenance of the popes bull.

The persons that suffered death, were condemned for treason & not for religion.

Qua denuntiatione multi nobiles viri adducti sunt, vt de fratribus liberandis cogitare auderent, ac sperabant illi quidem catholicos omnes summis viribus affuturos esse: verùm etsi aliter quàm illi expectabant res euenit, quia catholici omnes nondum probè cognouerant, Elisabetham hæreticam esse declaratam, tamen laudanda illorum nobilium consilia erant: That is: By which denuntiation, manie noblemen were induced or led, that they were boldened to thinke of the freeing of their brethren, and they hoped certeinlie that all the catholikes would haue assisted them with all their strength: but although the matter happened otherwise than they hoped for, because all the catholikes knew not that Elisabeth was declared to be an heretike, yet the counsels and intents of those noblemen were to be praised. A rebellion and a vanquishing of rebels verie smoothlie described.

The diuersitie betwixt truth and falshood.

This noble fact here mentioned was the rebellion in the north: the noblemen were the earles of Northumberland and Westmerland: the lacke of the euent or successe was, that the traitors were vanquished, and the quenes maiestie and hir subiects had by Gods ordinance the victorie: and the cause why the rebels preuailed not, was because all the catholikes had not béene dulie informed that the quenes maiestie was declared to be (as they terme it) an heretike: which want of information, to the intent to make the rebels mightier in number and power, was diligentlie and cunninglie supplied by the sending into the realme of a great multitude of the seminaries and Iesuits, whose speciall charge was to informe the people thereof, as by their actions hath manifestlie appéered. A supplement to amend the former errour.

And though doctor Sanders hath thus written, yet it may be said by such as fauoured the two notable Iesuits, one named Robert Persons (who yet hideth himselfe in corners to continue his traitorous practise) the other named Edmund Campion (who was found out being disguised like a roister and suffered for his treasons) that doctor Sanders treason is his proper treason in allowing of the said bull, and not to be imputed to Persons and Campion. Therefore to make it plaine that these two by speciall authoritie had charge to execute the sentence of this bull, these acts in writing following shall make manifest, which are not fained or imagined, but are the verie writings taken about one of their complices, euen immediatlie after Campions death: although Campion before his death would not be knowen of anie such matter. Whereby may appéere what trust is to be giuen to the words of such pseudomartyrs.

Facultates concessæ pp. Roberto Personio & Edmundo Campiano, pro Anglia, die 14 Aprilis, 1580.

PEtatur à summo domino nostro explicatio bullæ declaratoriæ per Pium Quintum contra Elisabetham & ei adhærentes, quam catholici cupiunt intelligi hoc modo; vt obliget semper illam & hæreticos, catholicos verò nullo modo obliget rebus sic stantibus, sed tum demum quando publicæ eiusdem bullæ executio fieri poterit. Then followed manie other petitions of faculties for their further authorities, which are not needfull for this purpose to be recited: but in the end followeth this sentence as an answer of the popes. Has prædictas gratias concessit summus pontifex patri Roberto Personio, & Edmundo Campiano in Angliam profecturis, die 14 Aprilis, 1580. Præsente patre Oliuerio Manarco assistente. The English of which Latine sentences is as followeth.

Faculties granted to the two fathers Robert Persons and Edmund Campion, for England, the fourteenth daie of Aprill, 1580.

Faculties granted to Persons and Campion by pope Gregorie the thirteenth Anno 1580.

LEt it be asked or required of our most holie lord, the explication or meaning of the bull declaratorie made by Pius the fift against Elisabeth, & such as do adhere or obeie hir, which bull the catholikes desire to be vnderstood in this maner: that the same bull shall alwaies bind hir and the heretikes; but the catholikes it shall by no meanes bind, as matters or things do now stand or be: but hereafter, when the publike execution of that bull maie be had or made. Then in the end the conclusion was thus added. The highest pontife or bishop granted these foresaid graces to father Robert Persons & Edmund Campion, who are now to take their iournies into England, the 14 daie of Aprill, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred and eightie. Being present the father Oliuerius Manarke assistant.

By what authoritie Campion came into England.

Hereby it is manifest, what authoritie Campion had to impart the contents of the bull against the queens maiestie, howsoeuer he himselfe denied the same: for this was his errand.

And though it be manifest that these two Iesuits, Parsons and Campion, not onelie required to haue the popes mind declared for the bull; but also in their owne petitions shewed how they and other catholikes did desire to haue the said bull to be vnderstood against the queene of England: yet to make the matter more plaine how all other Iesuits and seminaries; yea how all papists naming themselues catholikes, do or are warranted to interpret the said bull against hir maiestie and hir good subiects, howsoeuer they will disguise it, you shall see what one of their fellowes, named Hart, who was condemned with Campion and yet liueth, did amongst manie other things declare his knowledge thereof the last date of December in the same yeare one thousand fiue hundred and eightie, in these words following. The bull of Pius Quintus (for so much as it is against the queene) is holden amongest the English catholikes for a lawfull sentence, and a sufficient discharge of hir subiects fidelitie, and so remaineth in force: but in some points touching the subiects, it is altered by the present pope. For where in that bull all hir subiects are commanded not to obeie hir, and she being excommunicate and deposed, all that do obeie hir are likewise innodate and accursed, which point is perillous to the catholikes: for if they obeie hir, they be in the popes curse, and if they disobeie hir, they are in the queenes danger: therefore the present pope to releeue them hath altered that part of the bull, and dispensed with them to obeie and serue hir, without perill of excommunication: which dispensation is to indure but till it please the pope otherwise to determine.

Harts confession of the interpretation of the bull of Pius Quintus.

Wherefore to make some conclusion of the matters before mentioned, all persons both within the realme and abroad, maie plainelie perceiue that all the infamous libels latelie published abroad in sundrie languages, and the slanderous reports made in other princes courts of a multitude of persons, to haue beene of late put to torments and death onelie for profession of the catholike religion, and not for matters of state against the queenes maiestie, are false and shamelesse, and published to the maintenance of traitors and rebels. And to make the matter seeme more horrible or lamentable, they recite the particular names of all the persons, which by their owne catalog exceed not for these fiue and twentie yeares space, aboue the number of three score, forgetting or rather with their shonie and senseleslie harts not regarding, in what cruell sort in the time of queene Marie, which little exceeded the space of fiue yeares, the queenes maiesties reigne being fiue times as manie, there were by imprisonment, torments, famine, and fire, of men, women, maidens, and children, almost the number of foure hundred, besides such as were secretlie murthered in prisons: and of that number, aboue twentie that had beene archbishops, bishops, and principall prelats or officers in the church lamentablie destroied; and of women aboue three score, and of children aboue fortie, and amongest the women, some great with child, and one, out of whose bodie the child by fire was expelled aliue, and yet also cruellie burned: examples beyond all heathen crueltie.

A conclusion that all the infamous books against the queene and the realme, are false.

Difference of the small numbers that haue beene executed in the space of fiue and twentie yeares, from the great numbers in fiue yeares of queene Maries reigne.

And most of the youth that then suffered cruell death, both men, women, and children (which is to be noted) were such, as had neuer by the sacrament of baptisme, or by confirmation, professed, or was euer taught or instructed, or euer had heard of anie other kind of religion, but onelie of that which by their blood and death in the fire they did as true martyrs testifie. A matter of an other sort to be lamented in a christian charitie with simplicitie of words, and not with puffed eloquence, than the execution in this time of a verie few traitors; who also in their time, if they exceeded thirtie yeares of age, had in their baptisme professed, and in their youth had learned the same religion which they now so bitterlie oppugned. And besides that, in their opinions they differ much from the martyrs of queene Maries time: for though they which suffered in queene Maries time continued in the profession of the religion wherein they were christened, and as they were perpetuallie taught; yet they neuer at their death denied their lawfull queene, nor mainteined anie of hir open and forren enimies, nor anie procured rebellion or ciuill warre, nor did sow anie sedition in secret corners, nor withdrew anie subiects from their obedience, as these sworne seruants of the pope haue continuallie done.

And therefore all these things well considered, there is no doubt, but all good subiects within the realme do manifestlie see, and all wauering persons (not being led cleane out of the waie by the seditious) will hereafter perceiue, how they haue beene abused to go astraie. And all strangers, but specially all christian potentats, as emperours, kings, princes, and such like, hauing their souereigne estates, either in succession hereditarie, or by consent of their people, being acquainted with the verie truth of these hir maiesties late iust and necessarie actions, onelie for defense of hir selfe, hir crowne, and people, against open inuadours, and for eschewing of ciuill warres, stirred vp by rebellion, will allow in their owne like cases, for a truth and rule (as it is not to be doubted but they will) that it belongeth not vnto a bishop of Rome as successour of saint Peter, and therein a pastour spirituall, or if he were the bishop of all christendome, as by the name of pope he claimeth, first by his bulles or excommunications, in this sort at his will in fauour of traitors and rebels, to depose anie souereigne princes, being lawfullie inuested in their crownes by succession in bloud, or by lawfull election; and then to arme subiects against their naturall lords, to make warres, and to dispense with them for their oths in so doing, or to excommunicat faithfull subiects for obeieng of their naturall princes, & lastlie himselfe to make open warre, with his owne souldiers, against princes mouing no force against him.

An admonishment vnto all princes of countries abroad.

Pope Hildebrand the first that made warre against the emperor.

For if these high tragicall powers should be permitted to him to exercise, then should no empire, no kingdome, no countrie, no citie or towne be possessed by anie lawfull title, longer than one such onelie an earthlie man, sitting (as he saieth) in saint Peters chaire at Rome, should for his will and appetite (without warrant from God or man) thinke meet and determine: an authoritie neuer chalenged by the Lord of lords the sonne of God, Iesus Christ our onelie Lord and sauiour, and the onelie head of his church, whilest he was in his humanitie vpon the earth; nor yet deliuered by anie writing or certeine tradition from saint Peter, from whome the pope pretendeth to deriue all his authoritie; nor yet from saint Paule the apostle of the gentils: but contrariwise by all preachings, precepts and writings, conteined in the gospell and other scriptures of the apostles, obedience is expresselie commanded vnto all earthlie princes; yea, euen vnto kings by especiall name, and that so generallie, as no person is excepted from such duties

dutie of obedience, as by the sentence of saint Paule euen to the Romans, appeareth, Omnis anima sublimioribus potestatibus sit subdita, that is, Let euerie soule be subiect to the higher powers: within the compasse of which law or precept, saint Chrysostome being bishop of Constantinople, writeth, that euen apostles, prophets, euangelists, and monks are comprehended.

And for proofe of saint Peters mind herein, from whome these popes claime their authoritie, it can not be plainelier expressed, than when he writeth thus, Proinde subiecti estote cuiuis humanæ ordinationi, propter Dominum, siue regi, vt qui superemineat, siue præsidibus ab eo missis, that is, Therefore be you subiect to euerie humane ordinance or creature for the Lord, whether it be to the king, as to him that is supereminent, or aboue the rest, or to his presidents sent by him. By which two principall apostles of Christ, these popes the pretensed successors, but chiefelie by that which Christ the sonne of God the onelie maister of truth said to Peter and his fellow apostles, Reges gentium dominantur, vos autem non sic, that is, The kings of the gentils haue rule ouer them, but you not so, maie learne to forsake their arrogant and tyrannous authorities in earthlie and temporall causes ouer kings and princes, and exercise their pastorall office: as saint Peter was charged thrise at one time by his Lord and maister, Pasce oues meas, Fed my sheepe, and peremptorilie forbidden to vse a sword, in saieng to him, Conuerte gladium tuum in locum suum, or Mitte gladium tuum in vaginam, that is, Turne thy sword into his place: or, Put thy sword into the scabbard.

An aduertisement vnto all princes of countries abroad.

All which precepts of Christ and his apostles were dulie followed and obserued manie hundred yeares after their death, by the faithfull and godlie bishops of Rome, that dulie followed the doctrine and humilitie of the apostles, and the doctrine of Christ, and were holie martyrs, and thereby dilated the limits of Christs church and the faith more in the compasse of an hundred yeares, than the latter popes haue done with their swords and cursses these fiue hundred yeares, and so continued vntill the time of one pope Hildebrand, otherwise called Gregorie the seuenth, about the yeare of our Lord, one thousand three score and fourteene; who first began to vsurpe that kind of tyrannie, which of late the late pope called Pius Quintus, and since that time Gregorie now the thirteenth hath followed, for some example as it seemeth: that is, where Gregorie the seuenth, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand three score and fourteene, or thereabout, presumed to depose Henrie the fourth, a noble emperor then being; Gregorie the thirteenth now at this time, would attempt the like against king Henrie the eights daughter and heire queene Elisabeth, a souereigne, and a maiden queene, holding hir crowne immediatlie of God.

Pope Hildebrand the first that made warre against the emperor.

And to the end it may appeare to princes, or to their good councellors in one example, what was the fortunat successe that God gaue to this good christian emperor Henrie, against the proud pope Hildebrand, it is to be noted, that when the pope Gregorie attempted to depose this noble emperor Henrie, there was one Rodulph a noble man, by some named the count of Rœnfield, that by the popes procurement vsurped the name of the emperor, who was ouercome by the said Henrie the lawfull emperor, and in fight hauing lost his right hand, he, the said Rodulph, lamented his case to certeine bishops, who in the popes name had erected him vp, and to them he said, that the selfe same right hand which he had lost, was the same hand wherewith he had before sworne obedience to his lord and maister the emperor Henrie: and that in following their vngodlie counsels, he had brought vpon him Gods heauie and iust iudgements. And so Henrie the emperor prevailing by Gods power, caused Gregorie the pope by a synod in Italie to be deposed, as in like times before him his predecessor Otho the emperor had deposed one pope John for manie heinous crimes: & so were also within a short time three other popes, namelie, Syluester, Bennet, and Gregorie the first, vsed by the emperor Henrie the third, about the yeare of our Lord, one thousand fortie and seuen, for their like presumptuous attempts in temporall actions against the said emperors.

The authoritie proclamed by the pope not warranted by Christ, or by the two apostles Peter and Paul.

An. Do. 1074. The iudgement of God against the popes falle erected emperor.

Pope Gregorie the seuenth deposed by Henrie the fourth.

Manie other examples might be shewed to the emperors maiestie, and the princes of the holie empire now being, after the time of Henrie the fourth: as of Henrie the fift, and Frederike the first, and Frederike the second, and then of Lewes of Bauar, all emperors, cruellie and tyrannouslie persecuted by the popes, and by their buls, cursses, and by open wars, and likewise to manie other the great kings and monarchs of christendome, of their noble progenitors, kings of their seuerall dominions. Whereby they may see how this kind of tyrannous authoritie in popes to make warres vpon emperors & kings, and to command them to be deprived, toke hold at the first by pope Hildebrand, though the same neuer had anie lawfull example or warrant from the lawes of God of the old or new testament: but yet the successes of their tyrannies were by Gods goodnesse for the most part made frustrat, as by Gods goodnesse there is no doubt, but the like will followe to their confusions at all times to come.

Henrie the fift. Frederike the first. Frederike the second. Lewes of Bauar, emperors.

And therefore, as there is no doubt, but the like violent tyrannous proceedings by anie pope in maintenance of traitors and rebels, would be withstood by euerie souereigne prince in christendome in defense of their persons and crownes, and maintenance of their subiects in peace: so is there at this present a like iust cause that the emperors maiestie, with the princes of the holie empire, and all other souereigne kings & princes in christendome, should iudge the same to be lawfull for hir maiestie being a queene, and holding the verie place of a king and a prince souereigne ouer diuers kingdoms and nations; she being also most lawfullie inuested in hir crowne: and as for good gouerning of hir people, with such applause and generall allowance, loued, and obeied of them; saning a few ragged traitors, or rebels, or persons discontented, whereof no other realme is free, as continuallie for these fiue & twentie yeares past hath beene notablie seene, and so publikelie marked, euen by strangers repairing into this realme, as it were no cause of disgrace to anie monarch and king in christendome, to haue hir maiesties felicitie compared with anie of theirs whatsoeuer: and it maie be, there are manie kings and princes could be well contented with the fruition of some proportion of hir felicitie.

whatsoeuer is lawfull for other princes souereignes, is lawfull for the queene and crowne of England.

And though the popes be now suffered by the emperor, in the lands of his owne peculiar patrimonie, and by the two great monarchs, the French king and the king of Spaine, in their dominions and territories (although by manie other kings not so allowed) to continue his authoritie in sundrie cases, and his glorious title to be the vniuersall bishop of the world, which title Gregorie the great aboue nine hundred yeares past, called a prophane title, full of sacrilege, and a preamble of antichrist: yet in all their dominions & kingdoms, as also in the realme of England, most notablie by manie ancient lawes it is well knowne, how manie waies the tyrannous power of this his excessiue authoritie hath beene, and still is restreined, checked and limited by lawes and pragmatikes, both ancient and new, both in France and Spaine and other dominions: a verie large field for the lawyers of those countries to walke in and discourse.

The title of vniuersall bishop is a preamble of antichrist.

And howsoeuer the popes canonists, being as his bombarders, do make his excommunications and curses appeare fearefull to the multitude and simple people: yet all great emperors and kings a-foretime, in their owne cases, of their rights and roiall preeminences, though the same concerned but a citie or a poore towne, and sometime but the not allowance of some vnworthie person to a bishoprike or to an abbeie, neuer refrained to despise all popes curses or forces; but attempted alwaies, either by their swords to compell them to desist from their furious actions, or without anie feare of themselues, in bodie, soule, or conscience, stoutlie to withstand their curses, and that sometime by force, sometime by ordinances and lawes: the ancient histories whereof are too manie to be repeated, and of none more frequent and effectuall than of the kings of France. And in the records of England doth appeare, how stoutlie the kings & the baronadie of England from age to age, by extreame penall laws haue so repelled the popes vsurpations, as with the verie name of præmunires his proctors haue béene terrified, and his cleargie haue quaked, as of late cardinall Wolsele did proue.

But leauing those that are ancient, we may remember how in this our owne present or late age, it hath béene manifestlie seene, how the armie of the late noble emperour Charles the fift, father to king Philip that now reigneth, was not afraid of his curses, when in the yeares of our Lord 1527, Rome it selfe was besieged and sacked, and the pope then called Clement, and his cardinals, to the number of about thirtie and three, in his mount Adrian or castell S. Angelo, taken prisoners and deteined seauen moneths or more, and after ransomed by Don Vgo di Moncada a Spaniard, and the marquesse of Guasto, at aboue foure hundred thousand duckets, besides the ransomes of the cardinals which was much greater; hauing not long before time béene also (notwithstanding his curses) besieged in the same castell by the familie of the Colonies and their fautors his next neighbours being then imperialists, and forced to yeeld to all their demands. Neither did king Henrie the second of France, father to Henrie now king of France, about the yeare 1550, feare or regard the pope or his court of Rome, when he made seuerall strict edicts against manie parts of the popes claimes in prejudice of the crowne and cleargie of France, retracting the authoritie of the court of Rome greatlie to the hinderance of the popes former profits. Neither was the armie of king Philip now of Spaine, whereof the duke of Alua was generall, striken with anie feare of cursing, when it was brought afore Rome against the pope, in the yeare of our Lord 1555, where great destruction was made by the said armie, and all the delicat buildings, gardens, and orchards, next to Rome walles ouerthrowne, wherewith his holinesse was more terrified than he was able to remoue with anie his curses. Neither was queene Marie the queenes maiesties noble late sister, a person not a little deuoted to the Romane religion, so afraid of the popes cursings; but that both shee and hir whole councell, and that with the assent of all the iudges of the realme, according to the ancient lawes, in fauour of cardinall Pole hir kinsman, did most strictlie forbid the entrie of his bulles, and of a cardinals hat at Calis, that was sent from the pope for one frier Peito, an obseruant pleasant frier, whom the pope had assigned to be a cardinall in disgrace of cardinall Pole: neither did cardinall Pole himselfe at the same time obeie the popes commandements, nor shewed himselfe afraid, being assisted by the queene, when the pope did threaten him with paine of curses and excommunications; but did still oppose himselfe against the popes commandement, for the said pretended cardinall Peito: who notwithstanding all the threatenings of the pope, was forced to go vp and downe in the streets of London like a begging frier, without his red hat: a stout resistance in a queene for a poore cardinals hat, wherin she followed the example of hir grandfather king Henrie the seuenth, for a matter of Allum, wherein the king vsed verie great seueritie against the pope.

So as howsoeuer the christian kings for some respects in policie can indure the pope to command where no harme nor disaduantage groweth to themselues, yet sure it is, and the popes are not ignorant, but where they shall in anie sort attempt to take from christian princes anie part of their dominions, or shall giue aid to their enimies, or to anie other their rebels, in those cases, their bulles, their curses, their excommunications, their sentences and most solemne anathematicals, no nor their crosse keies, or double edged sword, will serue their turnes to compasse their intentions. And now, where the pope hath manifestlie by his bulles and excommunications attempted asmuch as he could, to depriue hir maiestie of hir kingdomes, to withdraw from hir the obedience of hir subiects, to procure rebellions in hir realms, yea to make both rebellions and open warres with his owne capteines, souldiers, banners, enlignes, and all other things belonging to warre: shall this pope Gregorie or anie other pope after him, thinke that a souereigne queene, possessed of the two realmes of England and Ireland, stablished so manie yeares in hir kingdomes as three or foure popes haue sit in their chaire at Rome, fortified with so much dutie, loue and strength of hir subiects, acknowledging no superiour ouer hir realms, but the mightie hand of God: shall she forbeare, or feare to withstand and make frustrate his vnlawfull attempts, either by hir sword or by hir lawes; or to put his soldiers inuadors of hir realme to the sword martiallie, or to execute hir lawes vpon hir owne rebellious subiects ciuillie, that are proued to be his chiefe instruments for rebellion, & for his open warre? This is sure, that howsoeuer either he sitting in his chaire with a triple crowne at Rome, or anie other his proctors in anie part of christendome, shall renew these vnlawfull attempts: almightie God the king of kings whom hir maiestie onlie honoreth and acknowledgeth to be hir onlie souereigne Lord and protector, & whose lawes and gospell of his son Jesus Christ she seeketh to defend, will no doubt but deliuer sufficient power into his maidens hand his seruant queene Elisabeth, to withstand and confound them all.

And where the seditious trumpetors of infamies & lies haue sounded forth and intituled certeine that haue suffered for treason, to be martyrs for religion: so may they also at this time (if they list) ad to their forged catalog the headlesse bodie of the late miserable earle of Desmond, the head of the Irish rebellion: who of late, secretlie wandering without succour, as a miserable begger, was taken by one of the Irishrie in his caben, and in an Irish sort, after his owne accustomed sauage maner, his head cut off from his bodie: an end due to such an archrebell. And herewith to remember the end of his chiefe confederats, may be noted for example to others, the strange manner of the death of doctor Sanders the popes Irish legat, who also wandering in the mountains in Ireland without succor, died raging in a frensie. And before him, one James Fitzmorris the

the firſt traitour of Ireland next to Stukeleie the rakehell, a man not vnknowen in the popes palace for a wicked craftie traitor, was ſlaine at one blow by an Iriſh noble yong gentleman, in defenſe of his fathers countrie which the traitor ſought to burne.

Iohn of Deſmond. A fourth man of ſingular note was Iohn of Deſmond, brother to the earle, a verie bloudie faithleſſe traitor, & a notable murderer of his familiar friends, who alſo wandring to ſeeke ſome prete like a woolfe in the woods, was taken & beheaded after his owne vſage, being (as he thought) ſufficientlie armed with the popes buls and certeine Agnus Dei, & one notable ring with a pretious ſtone about his necke ſent from the popes finger (as it was ſaid) but theſe be ſaw ſaued not his life. And ſuch were the fatall ends of all theſe, being the principall heads of the Iriſh warre and rebellion, ſo as no one perſon remaineth at this daie in Ireland a knowen traitor: a worke of God and not of man.

To this number they may (if they ſeeke number) alſo ad a furious yong man of Warwikeſhire, by name Somervile, to increaſe their kalendar of the popes martyrs, who of late was diſcouered and taken in his waie, comming with a full intent to haue killed hir maieſtie, whoſe life God alwaies haue in his cuſtodie. The attempt not denied by the traitor himſelfe, but confeſſed, and that he was moued therto in his wicked ſpirit, by inticements of certeine ſeditious and traitorous perſons his kinſmen and allies, & alſo by often reading of ſundrie ſeditious vile bookes latelie publiſhed againſt hir maieſtie, and his end was in deſperation to ſtrangle himſelfe to death: an example of Gods ſeueritie againſt ſuch as preſume to offer violence to his anointed. But as God of his goodneſſe hath of long time hitherto preſerued hir maieſtie from theſe and the like treacheries: ſo hath ſhe no cauſe to feare, being vnder his protection, ſaieng with king Dauid in the pſalme: My God is my helper and I will truſt in him, he is my protection, and the ſtrength or the power of my ſaluation. And for the more comfort of all good ſubiects againſt the ſhadowes of the popes bulles, it is manifeſt to the world, that from the beginning of hir maieſties reigne, by Gods ſingular goodneſſe, hir kingdome hath inioied more vniuerſall peace, hir people increaſed in more numbers, in more ſtrength, and with greater riches, & with leſſe ſickeneſſe, the earth of hir kingdomes hath yelded more fruits, and generallie all kind of worldlie felicitie hath more abounded ſince and during the time of the popes thunders, bulles, curſſes and maledictions, than in anie other long times before, when the popes pardons and bleſſings came yearelie into the realme: ſo as his curſſes and maledictions haue turned backe to himſelfe and his ſautors, that it may be ſaid to the bleſſed quene Eliſabeth of England and of hir people, as was ſaid in Deuteronomie of Balaam: The Lord thy God would not heare Balaam, but did turne his maledictions or curſſes into benedictions or bleſſings: the reaſon is, for bicauſe thy God loued thee.

Although theſe former reaſons are ſufficient to perſuade all kind of reaſonable perſons to allow of hir maieſties actions, to be good, reaſonable, lawfull and neceſſarie: yet bicauſe it may be, that ſuch as haue by frequent reading of falſe artificiall libels; and by giuing credit to them, vpon a preiudice or foreiudgement afore grounded, by their rooted opinions in fauour of the pope, will reſt vnſatiſfied: therfore as much as may be, to ſatiſfie all perſons as farre forth as common reaſon may warrant, that hir maieſties late action in executing certeine ſeditious traitors, hath not proceeded for the holding of opinions, either for the popes ſupremaſie, or againſt hir maieſties regalitie; but for the verie crimes of ſedition and treaſon: it ſhall ſuffice briefflie, in manner of a repetition of the former reaſons, to remember theſe things following.

Reaſons to perſuade by reaſon the fauourers of the pope, that none hath beene executed for religion but for treaſon.

Firſt, it cannot be denied, but that hir maieſtie did for manie yeares ſuffer quietlie the popes bulles and excommunications without puniſhment of the fautors thereof, accounting of them but as of words or wind, or of writings in parchment waied downe with lead, or as of water bubbles, commonlie called in Latine Bullæ, & ſuch like: but yet after ſome proofe that courage was taken therof by ſome bold and bad ſubiects, ſhe could not but then eſteeme them to be verie preambles, or as forerunners of greater danger: and therefore, with what reaſon could anie miſlike, that hir maieſtie did for a bare defenſe againſt them, without other action or force, vſe the helpe of reuiuing of former lawes, to prohibit the publication or execution of ſuch kind of bulles within hir realme?

The firſt reaſon.

Secondlie, when notwithſtanding the prohibition by hir lawes, the ſame bulles were plentifullie (but in ſecret ſort) brought into the realme, and at length arrogantlie ſet vpon the gates of the biſhop of Londons palace neere to the cathedrall church of Paules the principall citie of the realme, by a lewd perſon, vſing the ſame like a herald ſent from the pope: who can in anie common reaſon miſlike, that hir maieſtie finding this kind of denunciation of warre, as a defiance to be made in hir principall citie by one of hir ſubiects, anowing and obſtinatlie mainteining the ſame, ſhould according to iuſtice cauſe the offendor to haue the reward due to ſuch a fact? And this was the firſt action of anie capitall puniſhment inflicted for matter ſent from Rome to moue rebellion, which was after hir maieſtie had reigned about the ſpace of twelue yeares or more: a time ſufficient to proue hir maieſties patience.

The ſecond reaſon.

The bull of Pius Quintus ſet vp at Paules.

The firſt puniſhment for the bull.

Thirdlie, when the pope had riſen vp out of his chaire in his wrath, from words and writings to actions, and had contrarie to the aduiſe giuen by ſaint Barnard to one of his predeceſſors, that is, when by his meſſages he left Verbum, and toke Ferrum, that is, left to feed by the word, which was his office, and began to ſtrike with the ſword which was forbidden him, and ſtirred hir noblemen and people directlie to diſobedience and to open rebellion, which was the office of Dathan and Abiram, and that hir lewd ſubiects by his commandement had executed the ſame with all the forces which they could make or bring in to the field: who with common reaſon can diſallow that hir maieſtie vſed hir roiall lawfull authoritie, and by hir forces lawfull ſubdued rebels forces vnlawfull, and puniſhed the authors thereof no otherwiſe than the pope himſelfe vſeth to dow with his owne rebellious ſubiects, in the patrimonie of his church, as not manie moneths paſſed he had beene forced to intend? And if anie prince of people in the world would otherwiſe neglect his office, and ſuffer his rebels to haue their wils; none ought to pitie him, if for want of reſiſtance and courage he loſt both his crowne, his head, his life, and his kingdome.

The third reaſon.

Rebellion in the north.

Fourthlie, when hir maieſtie beheld a further increaſe of the popes malice, notwithſtanding that the firſt rebellion was in hir north parts vanquiſhed, in that he interteined abroad out of this realme, the traitors and rebels that fled for the rebellion, and all the rable of other the fugitiues of the realme, & that he ſent a number of the ſame in ſorts diſguiſed into both the realmes of England and Ireland, who there ſecretlie allured hir people to new rebellions, and at the ſame time ſpared not his charges to ſend alſo out of Italie by ſea, certeine ſhips with captaines of his owne, with their bands of ſouldiers, furniſhed with treaſure, munition, victels, enſignes, banners, and

and all other things requisite to the warre, into hir realme of Ireland, where the same forces with other auxiliar companies out of Spaine landed, and fortified themselues verie stronglie on the sea side, and proclamed open warre, erecting the popes banner against hir maiestie: may it be now asked of these persons, fauourers of the Romish authoritie, what in reason should haue béene done by hir maiestie otherwise, than first to apprehend all such fugitiues so stolen into the realme, and dispersed in disguising habits to sow sedition, as some priests in their secret profession, but all in their apparell as rotters or ruffians, some scholers, like to the basest common people, and them to commit to prisons, and vpon their examinations of their trades and hants, to conuince them of their conspiracies abroad, by testimonie of their owne companions, and of sowing sedition secretlie at home in the realme? What may be reasonablie thought was meet to be done with such seditious persons, but by the lawes of the realme to trie, condemne and execute them? And speciallie hauing regard to the dangerous time, when the popes forces were in the realme of Ireland, and more in preparation to follow as well into England as into Ireland, to the resistance whereof hir maiestie and hir realme was forced to be at greater charges, than euer she had béene since she was quéene thereof. And so by Gods power, which he gaue to hir on the one part, she did by hir lawes suppresse the seditious stirrers of rebellion in hir realme of England, and by hir sword vanquished all the popes forces in hir realme of Ireland, excepting certeine capteines of marke that were saued from the sword, as persons that did renounce their quarrell, and seemed to curse or to blame such as sent them to so vnfortunate and desperate a voiage.

The popes forces vanquished in Ireland.

The politike aduersaries satisfied.

But though these reasons, grounded vpon rules of naturall reason, shall satisfie a great number of the aduersaries (who will yeld that by good order of ciuill and christian policie and gouernement, hir maiestie could nor can do no lesse than she hath done, first to subdue with hir forces hir rebels and traitors, and next by order of hir lawes to correct the aiders & abettors, & lastlie to put also to the sword such forces as the pope sent into hir dominions) yet there are certeine other persons, more nicelie addicted to the pope, that will yet séeme to be vnsatisfied: for that, as they will tearme the matter, a number of sillie poore wretches were put to death as traitors, being but in profession scholers or priests, by the names of seminaries, Iesuits, or simple scholemaisters, that came not into the realme with anie armour or weapon, by force to aid the rebels and traitors, either in England or in Ireland in their rebellions or wars; of which sort of wretches the commiseration is made, as though for their contrarie opinions in religion, or for teaching of the people to disobeie the lawes of the realme, they might haue bene otherwise punished and corrected, but yet not with capitall paine. These kinds of defenses tend onelie to find fault rather with the seueritie of their punishments, than to acquit them as innocents or quiet subiects.

Obiection of the papists, that the persons executed, are but scholers and vnarmed.

But for answer to the better satisfaction of these nice and scrupulous fauourers of traitors, it must be with reason demanded of them (if at least they will open their eares to reason) whether they thinke that when a king being stablished in his realme, hath a rebellion first secretlie practised, and afterward openlie raised in his realme by his owne seditious subiects; and when by a forren potentate or enimie the same rebellion is maintained, and the rebels by messages and promises comforted to continue, and their treasons against their naturall prince auowed; and consequentlie when the same potentat and enimie, being author of the said rebellion, shall with his owne proper forces inuade the realme and subiects of the prince that is so lawfullie and peaceablie possessed: in these cases, shall no subiect fauouring these rebels, and yelding obedience to the enimie the inuador, be committed or punished as a traitor; but onelie such of them, as shall be found openlie to carrie armour and weapon? Shall no subiect, that is a spiall and an explorer for the rebell or enimie against his naturall prince, be taken and punished as a traitor, bicause he is not found with armour or weapon; but yet is taken in his disguised apparell, with scrolles and writings, or other manifest tokens, to proue him a spie for traitors, after he hath wandered secretlie in his soueraignes campe, region, court, or citie? Shall no subiect be counted a traitor, that will secretlie giue earnest and prest monie to persons to be rebels or enimies, or that will attempt to poison the vittels, or the founteins; or secretlie set on fire the ships or munition, or that will secretlie search and sound the hauens and creeks for landing, or measure the depth of ditches, or height of bulwarks and walles, bicause these offendors are not found with armor or weapon? The answer I thinke must néeds be yelded (if reason and experience shall haue rule with these aduersaries) that all these and such like are to be punished as traitors: and the principall reason is, bicause it can not be denied, but that the factions of all these are necessarie accessaries, and adherents proper to further and continue all rebellions and warres. But if they will denie, that none are traitors that are not armed, they will make Iudas no traitor, that came to Christ without armour, colouring his treason with a kisse.

Sir questions to trie traitors from scholers.

Shame on traitors thoughts, that haue power in weapon.

Now therefore it resteth to applie the facts of these late malefactors that are pretended to haue offended but as scholers, or bookemen; or at the most but as persons that onelie in words and doctrine, and not with armour did fauour and helpe the rebels and the enimies. For which purpose let these persons be termed as they list, scholers, scholemaisters, bookemen, seminaries, priests, Iesuits, friers, beadmen, Romanists, pardoners, or what else you will; neither their titles, nor their apparell hath made them traitors, but their traitorous secret motions & practises: their persons haue not made the warre, but their directions and counsels haue set vp the rebellions. It is truelie to be pondered, that the verie causes finall of these rebellions and warres, haue béene to depose hir maiestie from hir crowne: the popes bull hath roared it so to be. The causes instrumentall are these kind of seminaries and séedmen of sedition: their secret teachings and reconciliations haue confirmed it. The fruits and effects thereof are by rebellion to shed the blood of all hir faithfull subiects: the rewards of the inuadors (if they could preuaile) should be the disinheriting of all the nobilitie, the clergie, and the whole communaltie, that would (as they are bound by the lawes of God, by their birth, and othes) defend their naturall gratious quéene, their native countrie, their wiues, their children, their familie, and their houses.

The application of the scholasticall traitors, to others, that are traitors without armor.

The offendors executed for treason, not for religion.

And now examine these which you call vnarmed scholers and priests, wherefore they first fled out of the realme, why they liued and were conuersant in companie of the principall rebels and traitors at Rome, and in their places, where it is proued that they were partakers of their conspiracies? Let it be answered why they came thus by stealth into the realme? Why they haue wandered vp & downe in corners in disguised sort, changing their titles, names and maner of apparell? Why they haue intised and sought to persuade by their secret false reasons, the people to allow and beléeue all the actions and

and attempts whatsoeuer the pope hath done, or shall doo, to be lawfull? Why they haue reconciled and withdrawne so manie people in corners from the lawes of the realme to the obedience of the pope, a forreine potentate and open enimie, whome they know to haue alreadie declared the queene to be no lawfull queene, to haue mainteined the knowne rebels and traitors, to haue inuaded hir maiesties dominions with open warre? Examine further, how these vagarant disguised vnarmed spies haue answered, when they were taken and demanded what they thought of the bull of pope Pius Quintus, which was published to depriue the queenes maiestie, and to warrant hir subiects to disobeie hir: whether they thought that all subiects ought to obeie the same bull, and so to rebell? Secondlie, whether they thought hir maiestie to be lawfull queene of the realme, notwithstanding the said bull or anie other bull of the pope? Thirdlie, whether the pope might giue such licence as he did to the earls of Northumberland and Westmerland, and other hir maiesties subiects to rebell as they did? Or giue power to doctor Sanders a naturall borne subiect, but an vnnaturall worne priest, to take armes and moue warres as he did in Ireland? Fourthlie, whether the pope may discharge the subiects of hir maiestie, or of anie other princes christened, of their oths of obedience? Fiftlie, whether the said traitorous priest doctor Sanders or one Bristow a rebellious fugitiue, did in their bookes write trulie or falslie, in approuing the said bull of Pius Quintus, and the contents thereof? Lastlie, what were to be done, if the pope or anie other assigned by him, would inuade the realme of England, and what part they would take, or what part anie faithfull subiect of hir maiesties ought to take? To these few questions verie apt to trie the truth or falshod of any such seditious persons, being iustlie before condemned for their disloialtie, these lewd vnarmed traitors I say would in no wise answer directlie herto, as all other faith full subiects to anie christian prince ought to doo.

The grossenes of trie traitors from others.

The offendors executed for treason, not for religion.

And as they by refusall to answer directlie to these questions onelie, might haue beene iustlie conuinced as guiltie of treason: so yet were they not therevpon condemned, but vpon all their other former actions committed both abroad & in the relme, which were no lesse traitorous than the actions of all other the spies and traitors, and of Judas himselfe afore remembred, which had no armor nor weapon, and yet at all times ought to be adiudged traitors. For these disguised persons (called scholers or priests) hauing beene first conuersant of long time with the traitors beyond the sea in all their conspiracies, came hither by stealth in time of war and rebellion by commandement of the capitall enimie the pope or his legats, to be secret espials and explorers in the realme for the pope, to deliuer by secret, Romish tokens, as it were an earnest or prest, to them that should be in readines to ioine with rebels or open enimies, and in like sort with their hallowed baggages from Rome to poison the senses of the subiects, powring into their hearts malicious and pestilent opinions against hir maiestie and the lawes of the realme; and also to kindle and set on fire the hearts of discontented subiects with the flames of rebellion, & to search & sound the depths and secrets of all mens inward intentions, either against hir maiestie, or for hir: and finallie, to bring into a beadroll, or as it were into a muster roll, the names and powers with the dwellings of all them that should be readie to rebell, and to aid the forreine inuasion.

The apprehension of the scholasticall traitors, to others, that are traitors without armor.

These kinds of seditious actions for the seruice of the pope and the traitors and rebels abroad, haue made them traitors: not their bookes, nor their beads, no nor their cakes of ware which they call Agnus Dei, nor other their relikes, no nor yet their opinions for the ceremonies or rites of the church of Rome: and therefore it is to be certeinelie concluded, that these did iustlie deserue their capitall punishments as traitors, though they were not apprehended with open armour or weapon. Now if this latter repetition, as it were of all the former causes and reasons afore recited, may not serue to stop the boisterous mouthes, and the pestiferous tongs, and venemous breaths of those that are infected with so grosse errors, as to defend seditious subiects, stirrers of rebellion against their naturall prince and countrie; then are they to be left without anie further argument of the almightie God, as persons that haue couered their eies against the sunnes light, stopped their eares against the sound of iustice, and oppressed their hearts against the force of reason, and as the psalmist saith: They speake lies, they are as venemous as the poison of a serpent, euen like the deafe adder that stoppeth his eares.

Wherefore with christian charitie to conclude, if these rebels and traitors, and their fautors would yet take some remorse and compassion of their naturall countrie, and would consider how vaine their attempts haue béene so manie yeares; and how manie of their confederats are wasted by miseries and calamities, and how none of all their attempts or plats haue prospered, and therefore would desist from their vnnaturall practises abroad: and if these seminaries, secret wanderers, and explorators in the darke, would imploie their trauels in the works of light and doctrine according to the vsage of their schooles, and content themselues with their profession and deuotion: and that the remnant of the wicked flocke of the sedmen of sedition would cease from their rebellious, false and infamous railings and libellings, altogether contrarie to christian charitie: there is no doubt by Gods grace (hir maiestie being so much giuen to mercie and deuoted to peace) but all colour and occasion of shedding the bloud of anie more of hir naturall subiects of this land, yea all further bodilie punishment should vtterlie cease. Against whose malices, if they shall not desist, almightie God continue hir maiestie with his spirit and power long to reigne and liue in his feare, and to be able to vanquish them all, being Gods enimies, and especiallie hir rebels and traitors both at home & abroad, & to mainteine & preserue all hir naturall good louing subiects, to the true seruice of the same almightie God, according to his holie word & will. Manie other things might be remembred for defense of other hir maiesties princelie, honorable, and godlie actions in sundrie other things, wherein also these and the like seditious railors haue of late time without all shame, by fained and false libels sought to discredit hir maiestie & hir gouernement: but at this time, these former causes and reasons aleaged by waie of aduertisements, onelie for maintenance of truth, are sufficient to iustifie hir maiesties actions to the whole world in the cases remembred. Magna est veritas, & præualet: Great is truth, and the ouercommeth. 2. Bishop of winchester deceased.

On the two and twentith of Januarie, John Watson bishop of Winchester deceased at Wolsey, and was buried at Winchester on the sixteenth daie of Februarie; a man he was well taught by the art which he professed and practised, to esteeme this life as it is, euen transitorie & verie vaine; wherin as men are the further stept in age, so should they be the lesse desirous to liue, and take death comming timelie (which is, when as naturall heate and the moisture radicall are decaied) in such good part, as nothing thing more acceptable. But who thinkes his death to come timelie; but the godlie wise, who haue learned, that as men haue daies of life decreed, so they haue daies of death determined; according to the tetrastichon, which that famous man Ioachimus Camerarius (an excellent man and of singular note) made a little before his departing out of this world:

Morte nihil tempestiua esse optatius aiunt,
Sed tempestiuam quis putat esse suam?
Qui putat ille sapit; quoniam vt solatia vitæ,
Sic & quisque suæ tempora mortis habet.

On the seuenth of Februarie were arreigned at Westminster, James Fenne, George Haddocks, John Munden, John Nutter, and Thomas Homerford: all fiue were found guiltie of high treason, and had iudgement to be drawne, hanged, bowelled, and quartered, and were executed at Tiborne on the twelfedaie of Februarie. ¶ In this yeare, 1584, euen at the prime of the yeare, namelie in Aprill, maister Walter Raleigh esquier, a gentleman from his infancie brought vp and trained in martiall discipline, both by land and sea, and well inclined to all vertuous and honorable aduentures, hauing built a ship and a pinesse, set them to the sea, furnished with all prouisions necessarie for a long viage, and committed the charge of them to two gentlemen (his owne seruants) the one called Philip Amadis, the other Arthur Barlow, with direction to discouer that land which lieth betweene Norembega and Florida in the west Indies; who according to their commission, made as sufficient a discouerie thereof as so short a time would permit: for they returned in August next following, and brought with them two sauage men of that countrie, with sundrie other things, that did assure their maister of the goodnesse of the soile, and of great commodities that would arise to the realme of England, by traffique, if that the English had anie habitation, and were planted to liue there. Whereupon, he immediatlie prepared for a second viage, which with all expedition (nothing at all regarding the charges that it would amount vnto) did presentlie set in hand.

Maister Walter Raleigh prepareth for a second viage to the said land late discouered.

This countrie of Norembega aforesaid (and the land on this side of it) sir Humfrie Gilbert, brother to sir Walter Raleigh, a man both valiant and well experienced in martiall affaires, did attempt to discouer, with intention to settle an English colonie there, in the yeare 1578: hauing in his companie his two brethren, Walter and Carew Raleighs, Henrie Knolles, George Carew, William Careie, Edward Dennie, Henrie Nowell, Miles Morgan, Francis Knolles, Henrie North, and diuerse other gentlemen of good calling, and ten sailes of all sorts of shipping, well and sufficientlie furnished for such an enterprise, weighed anchor in the west countrie, & set to the sea. But God not fauoring his attempt, the iournie toke no good successe: for all his ships inforced by some occasion or mischance, made their present returne againe; that onelie excepted, wherein his brother Walter Raleigh was captaine, who being desirous to do somewhat worthie honor, toke his course for the west Indies, but for want of vittels and other necessaries (needfull in so long a viage) when he had sailed as far as the Ilands of Cape de Verde vpon the coast of Affrica, was inforced to set saile and returne for England. In this his viage he passed manie dangerous aduentures, as well by tempests as fights on the sea; but lastlie he arriued safelie at Plimouth in the west countrie in Maie next following. Sir Humfreie Gilbert notwithstanding this vnfortunate successe of his first attempt, enterprised the said viage the second time, and set to the sea with three ships and pinesses, in the yeare 1584, in the which iournie he lost his life; but in what sort no man can witnesse. For being by force of foule weather separated from his companie, he was neuer heard of afterwards.]

¶ In this yeare, and the twentith daie of Maie departed out of this life that famous father of physicke and surgerie, the English Hippocrates and Galen, I meane doctor Caldwell, and was buried on the first of June immediatlie following at S. Benets church by Paules wharfe, at the vpper end of the chancell: his bodie was verie solemnelie accompanied to the church with a traine of learned and graue doctors, besides others of that facultie, the heralds of armes doing him such honour at his funerall as to him of dutie apperteined. Of this mans rare loue to his countrie hath béene spoken before, where mention is made of the institution of a surgerie lecture perpetuallie to be continued for the common benefit of London, and consequentlie of all England: the like whereof is not established nor vsed in anie vniuersitie of christendome (Bononie and Padua excepted) and therefore the more to be esteemed. Indéed the like institution was in towardnesse, whiles Francis the French of that name the first liued: but when he died, as the court that he kept in his time was counted a vniuersitie, but after his death made an exchange thereof with another name: so likewise discontinued or rather vtterlie brake off that purposed institution of a surgerie lecture at Paris: so that in this point London hath a preroga-tiue excelling the vniuersities.

This D. Caldwell in his last will and testament gaue manie great legacies to a great number of his poore kinsfolkes, as also vnto others nothing alied vnto him. He gaue in his life time two hundred pounds to be lent gratis forener to the Clothiers in Burton, whereby clothing might be maintained, the poore artificers set on worke, and the poore citizens in Lichfield also benefited: the corporation of the said towne being bound for the receiuing and deliuering thereof euerie fiue yeares to the youngest and poorest occupiers. He gaue great summes of monie to the poore townships in Staffordshire where he was borne, both towards the releeuing of their priuat estate, as also to the reparing of their bridges and amending of their high waies, for the commoditie of all the countrie. He left large sums of monie to be employed by his executors at their discretion, where charitie moued; as also to the publishing of such learned bookes of physicke and surgerie (with sundrie chargeable formes grauen in copper and finished in his life) as he meant (if he had liued) to set vp.

Diuerse good works in his daies he had done, and hath left order to be done after his death: which was verie mild and still, not vnlike the decease of a babe in the cradle; hauing béene assailed with no extremitie of sickenesse (his * ordinarie infirmitie excepted which was intermissiue) that either might wring him or wearie him to make him impatient. So that he died as sleeping, hauing left behind him both credit of lerning, cunning, & other good ornaments, the very beautie of his age, which was exactlie found by true computation to be threescore and foure téene, in which yeare he died; as may be gathered by his counterfet so naturallie conueied into colours, with his white beard, the hollownesse of his cheekes, the wrinkels of his browes, the liuelie sight of his eies, and other accessaries; and all within a module, the circumference whereof excéedeth not six inches, if it amount to so much in exact measure, as a man beholding the said representation, would sweare that it were not possible for art to draw more nére in limitation to nature. The distribution of D. Caldwell in his life time and his bequests after his death.

His commentaries vpon some part of Paulus Aegineta, and other bookes.

His ordinarie infirmitie was the colicke, which tormented him excéedingly.

His age and counterfet which seemed to be made 1571, and in the yeare of his age 59.

In this yeare of our Lord 1584, on the one and twentith daie of Maie, Francis Throckemorton esquier, was arreigned in the Guildhall of the citie of London, where being found guiltie of high treason, he was condemned and had iudgement accordinglie, to be drawne, hanged, boweled, and quartered. A discouerie of whose treasons, practised and attempted against the quéens maiestie and the realme, were afterward; to wit, in the moneth of June, published as followeth.

Francis Throckmorton arreigned and condemned of high treason.

A true and perfect declaration of the treasons practised and attempted by Francis Throckemorton, late of London, against the queenes maiestie and the realme.

WHereas there haue béene verie lewd and slanderous bruits and reports giuen out, of the due and orderlie proceedings held with Francis Throckemorton latelie arreigned & condemned of high treason at the Guildhall in London, the one and twentith daie of Maie last, whereby such as are euill affected toward hir maiestie, and the present gouernement, haue indeuoured falselie and iniuriouslie to charge hir maiestie and hir faithfull ministers with crueltie and iniustice vsed against the said Throckemorton, by extorting from him by torture, such confessions as he hath made against himselfe, & by inforsing the same to make them lawfull euidence to conuict him of the treasons therein specified: albeit hir maiesties subiects in generall, calling to mind the mild and temperate course she hath held all the time of hir most happie reigne, might rather impute hir clemencie and lenitie vsed towards all sorts of offendors to a kind of fault, than tax hir with the contrarie: yet such as allow of practises and treasons against hir maiestie, do alwaies interpret both of the one and of the other, according to the particular affections that do possesse them, that is, to the worst. And for somuch as the case of Throckemorton at this time hath béene subiect to their sinister constructions; and considering that lies and false bruits cast abroad are most commonlie beléeued, vntill they be controlled by the truth: it hath béene thought expedient in this short discourse to deliuer vnto your view and consideration, a true and perfect declaration of the treasons practised and attempted by the said Throckemorton against hir maiestie and the realme, by him confessed before his arreignement, whereby hir maiestie was iustlie and in reason persuaded to put him to his triall.

But how can their interpretations be found, whose iudgements are corrupt?

You shall likewise perceiue what course hath béene held with him by hir commissioners to bring him to confesse the truth: with what impudencie and how falselie he hath denied his saiengs and confessions: and lastlie, how by a new submission and confession of his said treasons since his condemnation, he endeuoureth to satisfie hir maiestie, and to shew the reasons that moued him to denie the first, which he affirmeth and confirmeth by the last: which may in reason satisfie, though not all; yet such as are not forestalled, or rather forepoisoned and infected with the lies and vntruths alreadie spred and deliuered in fauour of the traitor & his treasons. You shall therefore vnderstand, that the cause of his apprehension grew first vpon secret intelligence giuen to the quænes maiestie, that he was a priuie conueier and receiuer of letters to and from the Scotish quéne: vpon which information neuertheless diuerse moneths were suffered to passe on, before he was called to answer the matter, to the end there might some proofe more apparant be had to charge him therewith directlie: which shortlie after fell out, and thereupon there were sent vnto his houses in London, and at Leusham in Kent, to search and apprehend him, certeine gentlemen of no meane credit and reputation: of whome, two were sent to his house by Paules wharfe, where he was apprehended, & so by one of them conueied presentlie awaie; the other remaining in the chamber to make search for papers, writings, &c. which might giue proofe of his suspected practises.

The premisses being all sufficient cannot but answer anie circumstance touching this traitor.

In that search, there were found the two papers conteining the names of certeine catholike noblemen and gentlemen, expressing the hauens for landing of forren forces, with other particularities in the said papers mentioned, the one written in the secretarie hand (which he at the barre confessed to be his owne handwriting) and the other in the Roman hand, which he denied to be his, and would not shew how the same came vnto his hands: howbeit in his examinations he hath confessed them both to be his owne handwriting: and so they are in truth. There were also found among other of his papers, twelue petidegrées of the descent of the crowne of England, printed and published by the bishop of Rosse, in the defense of the pretended title of the Scotish quéne his mistresse: with certeine infamous libels against hir maiestie printed and published beyond the seas: which being found in the hands of a man so euill affected, comparing the same with his doings and practises against hir maiestie, you will iudge the purpose wherefore he kept them.

The bishop of Rosse an enimie to the English state.

Shortlie after his apprehension, he was examined by some of hir maiesties priuie councell, how he came by the said two papers of the hauens: and he most

most impudentlie denied with manie protestations that he neuer saw them, affirming they were none of his, but were foisted in (as he termed it) among his papers by the gentlemen that searched his house. Notwithstanding being more earnestlie pressed to confesse the truth, he said they had beene left (he knew not how) in his chamber by a man of his, who not long before was departed out of the realme, named Edward Rogers, alias Nuttebie, by whome they were written. And to make this deuise to carie some colour of truth, after his committing vnto the Tower, he found the meanes to get three cards, on the backeside of which cards he wrote to his brother George Throckemorton to this effect. I haue beene examined by whome the two papers, conteining the names of certeine noblemen and gentlemen, and of hauens, &c: were written; & I haue alleged them to haue beene written by Edward Nuttebie my man, of whose handwriting you know them to be: meaning by this deuise to haue had his brother confirme his falshood.

A colour of truth to countenance a manifest lie.

These cards were intercepted, and thereby the suspicion before conceiued of his practises increased. Whereupon, as vpon other iust cause and matter against him, hauing beene sundrie times brought before some of the principall personages of hir maiesties most honourable priuie councell; and by them with all industrie examined, and persuaded in verie mild and charitable maner, to confesse the truth, promising to procure pardon for him, in case he would bewraie the depth of his practises: but no persuasion preuailing, hir maiestie thought it agreeable with good policie, and the safetie of hir royall person and state, to commit him ouer to the hands of some of hir learned councell and others hir faithfull seruants and ministers, with commission to them, to assaie by torture to draw from him the truth of the matters appearing so weightie as to concerne the inuading of the realme, &c. These men by vertue of that commission, proceeded with him, first as the councell had formerlie done by waie of persuasion, to induce him to confesse: but finding that course not to preuaile, they were constreined to commit him to such as are vsuallie appointed in the Tower to handle the racke, by whome he was laied vpon the same, and somewhat pinched, although not much: for at the end of three daies following, he had recouered himselfe, and was in as good plight as before the time of his racking: which if it had then or anie other time beene ministred vnto him with that violence that he and his fauourers haue indeuoured slanderouslie to giue out, the signes thereof would haue appeared vpon his lims for manie yeares.

The maner of proceeding against Throckemorton by commission.

At this first time of torture he would confesse nothing, but continued in his former obstinacie and deniall of the truth. The second time that he was put to the racke, before he was strained vp to anie purpose, he yeelded to confesse anie thing he knew, in the matters obiected against him: whereupon he was losed. And then the commissioners proceeded with him according to such interrogatories as had beene deliuered vnto them: which for the more breuitie shall here be omitted, the intent of this declaration tending onelie to discouer vnto you the treasons and treacherous dealings of the said Francis Throckemorton as well before as since his imprisonment, for your better knowledge of the man, and manifestation of the due and iust proceedings held with him by hir maiesties commissioners appointed vnto that seruice. And here you are to note, that when he was first pressed to discouer by whome the plots of the hauens were set downe, and to what purpose; he began (without anie further interrogation ministred) by waie of an historicall narration, to declare that at his being at Spaw in the countrie of Liege certeine yeares past, he entered into conference with one Jennie a notorious knowne traitor, touching the altering of the state of the realme here, and how the same might be attempted by forren inuasion, and to the like effect had sundrie conferences with sir Francis Englefield in the low countries, who dailie solicited the Spanish king in Spaine, and his gouernors in the said countries, to attempt the inuading of the realme, continued a course of practising against hir maiestie & the state, by letters betweene sir Francis Englefield & himselfe, till within these two yeares last past, and that he did from time to time acquaint sir John Throckemorton his late father with his traitorous practises, who (as he said) seeing no probabilitie of successe in them, dissuaded him from anie further meddling with those practises.

Jennie a notorious knowne traitor, & confer with Throckmorton.

The intent of this declaration what it is.

He hath further confessed, that he vsed his fathers aduise & opinion in setting downe the names of the catholike noblemen & gentlemen, and did acquaint him with the description of the hauens for the landing of forces, which he conceiued and put in writing onelie by view of the map, & not by particular sight or surueie of the said hauens.

Item, he hath also confessed, that vpon the intermission of writing of letters, and the accustomed intelligences passed betweene sir Francis Englefield and him, he was made acquainted by his brother Thomas Throckemorton, by letters and conference, and by Thomas Morgan by letters (two of the principall confederats and workers of these treasons residing in France) with a resolute determination agreed on by the Scotish queene and hir confederats in France and in other forren parts, and also in England, for the inuading of the realme.

Sir Francis Englefield, Thomas Throckemorton, and Thomas Morgan.

That the duke of Guise should be the principall leader and executor of that inuasion.

That the pretention (which should be publikelie notified) should be to deliuer the Scotish queene to libertie, & to procure euen by force from the queenes maiestie a tolerance in religion for the pretended catholikes. But the intention (the bottome whereof should not at the first be made knowne to all men) should be vpon the queenes maiesties resistance, to remoue hir maiestie from hir crowne and state.

A pretention of an inuasion into England.

That the duke of Guise had prepared the forces, but there wanted two things, monie, and the assistance of a conuenient partie in England, to ioine with the forren forces; and a third thing, how to set the Scotish queene at libertie without perill of hir person.

The speciall meanes wanting.

For the first thing wanting, that is, monie; messengers were sent from forren parts both to Rome and Spaine, & their returne dailie expected to their liking. And the Spanish ambassadour to incourage the English to ioine both in purse & person, did giue out, that the king his maister would not onlie make some notable attempt against England, but also would beare halfe the charge of the enterprise. For the second thing, that is, the preparing of a sufficient partie in England, to receiue and to ioine with the forren forces, one especiall messenger was sent ouer into England in August last, vnder a counterfeit name from the confederats in France, to signifie the plat and preparation there, and to solicit the same here.

The Spanish ambassadours words tending to this inuasion.

Throckemorton wrote diuerse letters to Marie the Scotish queene.

That Thomas Throckemorton his brother made him priuie to his negotiation at his last being here in England; and that thereupon Francis Throckemorton toke vpon him to be a follower and meane for the effectuating thereof among the confederats in England, with the helpe of the Spanish ambassadour, whome he instructed how and with whome to deale for the preparing of a conuenient partie here within Landing places for forren forces about Trondell in Sussex.

Charles Dauger vnder the name of Hope alias Syping a confederat in this action.

This would be feared and therefore alwaies by policie preuented.

within the realme, for that himselfe would not be seene to be a sounder of men, least he might be discouered, and so endanger himselfe and the enterprise, knowing that the ambassadour being a publike person, might safelie deale therein without perill.

Landing places for forren forces about Arundell in Sussex.

That the duke of Guise and other heads of the enterprise had refused some landing places, and made speciall choise of Sussex, and about Arundell in Sussex, both for the neere cut from the parts of France, where the duke did or best could assemble his force, and for the opportunitie of assured persons to giue assistance, &c.

That he, taking vpon him the pursute of this course, shewed the whole plot and deuise of the hauens for landing to the Spanish ambassadour, who did incourage him therin; he promising, that if he might haue respit vntill the next spring, the same should be done more readie.

That at the time of Thomas Throckemortons being here, least the negotiation of the enterprise, by some casualtie, might faile in the onelie hand of one man Thomas Throckemorton, there was also from the confederats sent ouer into Sussex, Charles Paget, vnder the name of Pope alias Spring, and therof an aduertisement couertlie sent vnto Thomas Throckemorton, both that Thomas might vnderstand it, and not be offended that an other was ioined with him in his labour.

Charles Paget vnder the name of Pope alias Spring a confederat in this action.

That the Spanish ambassador, by aduertisements from the confederats, was made priuie to this coming of Charles Paget vnder the name of Pope, and yet knowne to him to be Charles Paget.

That the said ambassador did, according to his said aduertisements, know & affirme that Charles Paget was come ouer to view the hauens and countrie for landing of such forren forces about Arundell, and specially to sound and conferre with certeine principall persons for assistance.

The same ambassadour also knew and affirmed, that Charles Paget had accordinglie done his message, and had spoken with some principall persons here according vnto his commission, and was returned.

This would be feared and therefore diuises by policie practised.

He moreouer confessed that there was a deuise betweene the Spanish ambassadour and him, how such principall recusants here within the realme, as were in the commission of the peace in sundrie counties, might vpon the first brute of the landing of forren forces, vnder colour and pretext of their authoritie and the defense of his maiestie, leuie men, whome they might after ioine to the forren forces, and conuert them against his maiestie.

In these few articles is briefly compiled the whole effect of his confession made at large, without anie interrogatorie particularlie ministred, other than vpon the two papers before mentioned, conteining the names of men and hauens. And here you are to note, that at the time of his apprehension, there was no knowledge or doubt had of these treasons, or of his priuitie vnto them; but onelie an information and suspicion deliuered and conceiued of some practise betweene him and the Scotish queene, as is before mentioned. For the discouering whereof, after he had beene sundrie times vpon his allegiance commanded to declare his doings in conueieng and receiuing of letters to and from hir; he did voluntarilie confesse that he had written diuerse letters vnto hir, and had conueied manie to and fro, betweene hir and Thomas Morgan in France, by whose meanes he was first made knowne to hir, and that he had receiued as manie letters from hir. He also declared the effect of his letters to hir, & of hirs to him: which letters betweene them were alwaies written in cipher, and the cipher with the nullities and marks for names of princes and councellors he sent vnto the queenes maiestie written with his owne hand. He also deliuered the names of some, by whome he conueied his letters vnto the Scotish queene, as by one Godfrie Fulgeam, who fled the realme immediatlie vpon Throckemortons apprehension; and one other person, whome he described by his stature, shape, and apparell, and the man since apprehended and examined, hath confessed the same: the mans name is William Ardington.

Godfrie Fulgeam was glad to cris Fugiam.

The summe and effect of the most part of these confessions, although they were at the time of his arreignement opened and dilated by hir maiesties sergeant, atturnie, and solicitor generall at the bar, and therefore seeme not needfull to be repeated here; yet because the purpose of this discourse is to shew sufficient proofe, that the matters conteined in his said confessions, are neither false nor feigned (as Francis Throckmorton most impudentlie affirmed at his triall, alledging that they were meere inuentions of himselfe by policie to auoid the torture) they haue beene here inserted, to the end you may the better iudge of the proofes, presumptions, and circumstances following, by comparing the matters with their accidents, and consequentlie see the falshood of the traitor, the iust and honorable proceedings of hir maiestie, and the honest and loiall indeuors of hir ministers imploied in the discouering of the treasons.

The cause why Throckmortons confessions are here mentioned.

Throckemorton was at Spaw, and elswhere, &c.

First, it is true and not denied by himselfe, that he was at Spaw about the time by him mentioned, and had conference with Jenneie in that place, and with sir Francis Englefield in Flanders, and that he hath written letters to sir Francis, and receiued letters from him: for if he should denie the same, he were to be conuinced by good proofe: for it hath beene noted in him by manie of his countriemen, English subiects, that both in those parts and in France, he did continuallie associat himselfe with English rebels and fugitiues. If then you consider with whome he hath conuersed beyond the seas, and compare his religion with theirs, you will iudge of his conuersation accordinglie. And it is to be supposed, that those men, knowne to be continuall practisers against the queenes maiestie and this realme, from whense for their treasons and vnnaturall demeanours they are worthilie banished, will not in their conuenticles and meetings forget to bethinke them of their banishment, and how they might be restored to their countrie, wherevnto no desert in hir maiesties like time (which God long continue) can well (without hir maiesties great mercie) restore them.

This is a principall marke where at they shoot, and therefore they cannot but meditat vpon the meanes.

Then I praie you, what conferences might passe Throckemorton haue with sir Francis Englefield, with Jenneie, with Liggons, with Owen, and with suchlike, who were his dailie companions in France and in the low countries? He hath written letters to sir Francis Englefield. To what purposes? He haunted continuallie two ambassadors in London, by whose meanes he sent and receiued letters to and from beyond the seas dailie. To whome, and from whome? Euen to and from Thomas Morgan, and Thomas Throckemorton at Paris, men knowne to hir maiestie and hir councell to be notorious practisers, deepe inward with the duke of Guise, and contriuers of the treasons and deuises for the inuasion intended. And for deepe certeine knowledge thereof, we need not be beholding to Francis Throckemorton onelie (although he hath said much of them) but to others of better credit than himselfe.

The duke of Guise his enterprise to inuade the realme.

That the duke of Guise did vndertake the enterprise to inuade the realme with a forren power, to be defraied by the pope and king of Spaine (a part of maister Throckemortons confession) and he in truth the first discouerer thereof to his maiestie: if he will say that it was but inuention, it will approue false. For since he discouered the same, there haue béene diuerse aduertisements thereof sent to his maiestie from forren princes his highnesse louing neighbors and allies; as also by other good meanes and intelligences from his ambassadors and seruants residing in other countries. If he denie (as he hath done) that he neuer had knowledge of anie such matter when he confessed the same, it hath no likelihood of truth: for Throckemorton was neuer knowne to be a prophet to foretell things De futuro.

The Spanish ambassador and Throckemorton did often times conuerse and conferre.

He resorted often to the Spanish ambassador, at the least twise a weeke when he was in London: this often repaire could not be to conferre with the ambassador for the exchange of monie for his brother, as he pretended at his arreignement: there was some other cause. When he was apprehended, he had a casket couered with greene veluet, verie cunninglie conueied out of his chamber by a maidseruant of the house, taken vp vnder a beds side in his chamber (one of the gentlemen who were sent to apprehend him then being in the chamber, & vnknowing thereof) which casket not long after his apprehension, was by one John Meredith a follower of Throckemorton, conueied to the hands of the Spanish ambassador. And why to him? If the matters therein might well haue abidden the light, why should not the casket haue béene kept still at home? And if not there, why not sent to some other place of safetie, as well as to the Spanish ambassador? It is to be coniectured, that this casket was not conueied thither without the direction of Francis Throckemorton, though caried by Meredith, who did well know of what moment the matters were that were within the casket, & of what danger to Throckemorton if they had béene disclosed; & therefore meant to bestowe them in a safe place where they could not readilie be had (as he thought) and with a person not vnacquainted with the qualitie of them. After the deliuerie of the casket, Meredith fled: for in truth he was priuie to the treasons, and a fellow practiser in them. To whome Francis Throckemorton, being taken short at the time of his apprehension, and forced to run vp a staire to deface a letter, which he was then in writing to the Scotish quéene in cipher (as he hath confessed) being suddenlie apprehended, and so forced to depart awaie presentlie out of his house, deliuered priuilie into the hands of Meredith, either the cipher by the which he was writing his letter to the Scotish quéene, or a letter in cipher by him written vnto hir: therefore he trusted Meredith as a man priuie to his doings.

Throckemorton surprised and put to a narrow shift.

Feare is an ordinarie tormentor of a guiltie conscience.

You are also to vnderstand, that Throckemorton was in verie great feare of the discouering of this casket after his apprehension. For remaining two or three daies prisoner in the house of one of the gentlemen that were sent to apprehend him, before he was committed to the Tower, he was permitted to talke with a solicitor of his law causes, who brought him certeine bookes drawne, or other like papers written, which he made shew to perusse. But that was not the matter why he sent for his solicitor: for in perusing the bookes, he conueied into them a little peece of paper, vpon the which he had written with a cole; I would faine know whether my casket be safe: or to the like effect. The solicitor departing from him, and resorting to Throckemortons house, not far distant from the place where he remained prisoner, opening his papers, did shake out this peece of paper, which he tooke vp and deliuered to one of Francis Throckemortons men; but the casket was alreadie conueied to the Spanish ambassador. Wherby you will perceiue what care he had of the casket, & how much it might import him to haue the writings or matters within the same concealed. He being examined touching the casket, and what was in the same, he denied at the first that euer he had anie such casket; but finding afterwards that the casket was discouered, he confessed the casket, and said there were certeine letters therein that came to his hands for the Scotish quéene from Thomas Morgan at Paris, and other letters and papers, but confessed not all, as it is supposed. That Charles Paget came ouer into the realme to euill purposes, as Throckemorton doth declare in his confession, could not be inuented: for euen at the same time that he mentioneth, Paget came ouer, in secret and suspicious maner, staied not aboue fiftéene daies, indeuored in a sort to find the disposition of William Shellie esquier, how he might stand affected to giue assistance to the treasons, although Paget discouered not directlie his traitorous intents to Shellie: therefore all Throckemortons confessions were not forged or inuented.

The clouds of lies cannot so darken the truth but it will appeare.

How William Shellie stood affectioned to these treasonable plots.

But because the two papers produced at his arreignement, conteining the description of the hauens for the commodious landing of forces, do most apparantlie condemne him, and are a manifest argument of his priuitie to the whole treason; you may not forget that he acknowledged one of the papers written in the secretarie hand, to haue béene of his owne doing, but denied the other written in the Romane hand. In the which, vnder the title of Cheshire, &c: is said, Vpon the landing of forren supplies, Chester shall be taken. But what in your opinions might be vnderstood by that sentence, Chester shall be taken, when you shall compare the paper in the secretarie hand with the other written in the Romane hand, intituled; The names of noblemen and gentlemen in euerie countie fit to be dealt with all in this matter (which in truth were both one, although the Romane were somewhat more inlarged) the question is to be asked, What matter? The answer followeth necessarilie, To assist the forren forces that shall come to inuade the realme: for that there is an other title in that paper ouer the names of the hauens, &c: Hauens in euerie coast fit for the landing of forces. Now iudge you, to what end these names of men and descriptions of hauens, their entries, capacities, what winds bring vnto them from Spaine, France, and Flanders, were written and set downe by Throckemorton: the papers are both of his owne handwriting, and the secretarie but a proiect or copie of the Romane.

Certeine words and clauses of letters treasonable.

Is it not likelie (thinke you) that he would acquaint the Spanish ambassador with these papers (as he hath confessed) when he made him partaker of the rest of his traitorous practises & deuises, as you haue heard, and thought his casket of treasons to be most safelie committed to his hands? It may be thought that there is no man of so simple vnderstanding, that will iudge to the contrarie, vnlesse he be parciallie affected to excuse the treasons. And now to shew vnto you what mind this man hath caried towards his maiestie; you are to be informed that Francis Throckemorton, after he had discouered to his maiestie his course of practising, repenting himselfe of his plaine dealing in the bewraieng thereof, said to some of the commissioners vpon occasion of speach; I would I had béene hanged when I first opened my mouth to declare anie of the matters by me confessed. And being at other times sent vnto by his maiestie with offer of pardon, if he would disclose the whole packe and complices of the treasons; he vsed this argument to persuade his maiestie, that he had confessed all, saieng that Sith he had alreadie brought himselfe by his confessions what mind Throckemorton hath caried towards his maiestie.

within

within the danger of the lawes, to the vtter ruine of his house and familie, he wondered why there should be anie conceit in hir maiestie, that he had not declared all. But to persuade such as were sent vnto him for these purposes, the rather to beleeue that he could discouer no more, at one time he vsed these speeches following with great vehemencie: Now I haue disclosed the secrets of hir who was the deerest thing vnto me in the world (meaning the Scotish queene) and whom I thought no torment should haue drawen me so much to haue prejudiced as I haue done by my confessions. I see no cause why I should spare anie one, if I could saie ought against him: and sith I haue failed of my faith towards hir, I care not if I were hanged.

This vehement speech imputeth the secrets of great moment betweene Throckemorton and the Scotish queene.

And when he began first to confesse his treasons, which he did most vnwillinglie, after he was entered into the declaration of them before all the commissioners, vpon aduisement he desired he might deliuer his knowledge but to one of them onelie: whereunto they yeelded. And thereupon remouing aside from the place where he sat by the racke, he vsed this prouerbe in Italian, Chi a perso la fede, a perso l'honore, that is, He that hath falsed his faith, hath lost his reputation; meaning thereby (as it may be conceiued) that he had giuen his faith to be a traitor, and not to reueale the treasons: & then he began to confesse as you haue heard. By this discourse, conteining the principall heads of his treasons, and the proofes and circumstances of the same, you that are not transported with vndutifull minds and affections, will clearelie perceiue how impudentlie and vntrulie he denied at his arreignement the truth of his confessions, charging hir maiestie with crueltie, and hir ministers with vntruths in their proceeding against him. But the cause that moued him thereto, was the vaine conceit he had taken that his case was cleere in law, by the intermission of the time betweene his confession made and his arreignement, grounding himselfe vpon a statute of the thirteenth yeare of hir maiesties reigne, in the which there are certeine treasons specified and made of that nature, that no person shalbe arreigned for anie of those offenses committed within anie of the queenes maiesties dominions, vnlesse the offendor be thereof indicted within six moneths next after the same offense committed; and shall not be arreigned for the same, vnlesse the offense be proued by the testimonie and oth of two sufficient witnesses, or his voluntarie confession without violence: wherein he was greatlie deceiued. For it was made manifest vnto him by the lord chiefe iustice and other of the iudges in commission at his triall, that his treasons were punishable by a statute of 25. Edw. 3. which admitted no such limitation of time or proofe. Herein his skill failed him, and forgot the aduise giuen vnto him by some of the commissioners, who (pitieng his misfortune for sundrie good gifts of the mind appearing in him) assured him that there was no waie so readie for him to redeeme his life, as by submission and acknowleding of his offense, which for a time after he had confessed his treasons he was contented to follow, and now eftsoones after his condemnation by a new submission to the queens maiestie the fourth of June had resumed that course. The submission verbatim, written with his owne hand, followeth.

The clouds of lies cannot so darken the truth but it will appeare.

To hir most excellent maiestie, euen to hir owne roiall hands.

Throckemortons submission & letter, written and sent with his owne handwriting.

MOst excellent prince, and my most gratious soueregne, sith to me the most miserable of all your maiesties poore distressed subiects, being iustlie condemned by the ordinarie and orderlie course of your maiesties laws, there resteth no further meane of defense but submission: vouchsafe, most excellent prince, gratiouslie to accept the same, which prostrate in all humilitie I here present vnto the hands of your most excellent maiestie; beseeching the same, that as iustice hath beene deriued from your highnesse, as from the fountaine, to the triall of mine actions: so I may receiue from the same spring, some drop of grace and mercie for the great & grieuous offense, wherof I rest by your maiesties lawes iustlie condemned: some part, I saie, of that your accustomed gratious clemencie, wherof most your distressed subiects haue tasted, and few beene depriued. And albeit the inconsiderate rashnesse of vnbridled youth hath withdrawen me from that loiall respect, which nature & dutie bound me to owe vnto your maiestie, as to my lawfull & naturall dread soueregne; and that the naturall care in me of the defense of my life moued me latelie to the vntrue & vndutifull gainesaieng of some such points as had beene before by me in most humble sort confessed: neuertheless, I most humblie beseech your most excellent maiestie, that in imitation of God, whose image (both in respect of the happie place you hold, as also in regard of your singular wisdome and other the rare and singular vertues & perfections wherwith God & nature hath plentifullie indued you) you represent vnto vs here in earth, it may please your maiestie to commiserate the lamentable estate of me now the most miserable of all your maiesties subiects and gratiouslie to grant vnto me remission and forgiuenes, that not onelie doo most humblie confesse my selfe worthie of death; but also in shew of my repentance and sorowfull afflicted mind, doo not craue at your maiesties hands the prolonging of my life, if the same shall not stand with your gratious good plesure; but rather desire the trebling of the torment iustlie by your maiesties lawes imposed vpon me, if the same may be anie satisfaction to your maiestie for the heinous crime whereof I remaine by your maiesties lawes iustlie condemned; or anie mitigation of your maiesties indignation worthilie conceiued against me, that desire not to liue without your fauour; and dieng will wish from my hart, that my end may be the beginning of your maiesties securitie, and my death the preseruation of your life, and the increase both to your maiestie, and to this your most flourishing commonwelth, of all the most happie blessings of almightie God.

He sueth for vndeserued mercie to hir maiestie in his miserie, in whose fauour he might haue liued by loialtie.

Your maiesties most wofull subiect in that he hath offended you:

Francis Throckemorton.

He sent vnto hir maiestie, togither with the said submission, a declaration, written likewise with his owne hand, conteining the effects of the most principall points of his treasons formerlie confessed: retracting onelie the accusation of his father, and some other particularities of no moment to cleere him of his treasons, the effect wherof followeth in his owne words, as he set them downe.

A declaration, &c: written by Throckemorton to the queenes maiestie.

The declaration which Throckmorton sent to hir maiestie, with his letter of submission.

THe onelie cause why I coined the practise first by me confessed, and vniustlie touched my father, was, for that partlie I conceiued that the paper written so long since, could not now by law haue touched me: but principallie, for that I was willing thereby to colour the setting downe of those names and hauens in Romane hand, which were written long after the time by me confessed vpon occasion of conference betweene the Spanish ambassador and me of this latter practise. Mine intelligence with the Scotish queene began a little before Christmas was two yeares: the cipher I had from Thomas Morgan in France; the first letter I received by Godfrie Fulgeam, by whome also came all such others as I after received for the most part, vnlesse it were such as came to me by F. A. his hands, who as he told me, received them of the fellow by me spoken of in my former confessions, whose name, I protest before God, I know not, nor whense he is. And for such letters as came vnto me in the absence of Fulgeam, they were inclosed vnder a couerture from Fulgeam, and were deliuered me by the hands of Robert Tunstead his brother in law, vnto whome I deliuered such as I had for the Scotish queene, couered with a direction vnto Fulgeam: and once I remember or twise I sent by one of my men called Butler, letters for the Scotish queene to the house of the said Tunstead, neere Buckestones, couered with a direction to Tunstead, and vnder a letter to Fulgeam. In such letters as came to me from the Scotish queene, were inclosed letters to F. A. manie times, and most times some for Thomas Morgan. Hir letters to me conteined, &c.

William Ardington.

But before I returned mine answer vnto hir, I vnderstood of the death of the duke of Lenox, and withall heard from Morgan, with whome all mine intelligence was (for with my brother I neuer had anie, other than that the matters by me written to Morgan were by him imparted vnto my brother most times) that by the persuasion of the pope and the king of Spaine, the duke of Guise had yeelded to performe the iournie in person: and that it was thought that the next waie to atteine libertie for the Scotish queene, and to reforme Scotland, was to begin here in England. And therefore he desired to know from me, whether in mine opinion catholikes would not backe any such force as should be sent, considering a demand of tolerance in religion for them should insue the well performing of the said enterprise, and what I thought the force would amount vnto, both of horsse and footmen, and where I thought to be the fittest landing. Mine answer was, that as then, I saw no great probabilitie of the good successe of such an enterprise, for that the catholikes were timorous, dispersed, the matter perillous to be communicated vnto manie, without which I saw not how anie estimat could be made of the forces: besides, that it was an imminent danger vnto the Scotish queene, whereof I saw no remedie.

The next way to atteine libertie for the Scotish queene, &c.

I toke notice of this matter in my next letters to the Scotish queene, whose answer was, that she latelie heard of that determination, &c. Vpon my former answer vnto Morgan, he desired me, that I would conferre with the Spanish ambassador, to whom I should be recommended from thense. Herevpon the said ambassador sent for me, and brake with me in this matter, assuring me that in his opinion he found it verie easie to make great alteration here with verie little force, considering the disuse in men to warre, and troubles would so amaze them (as he thought) that they would be as soone ouerthrowne as assailed: & he could not thinke but in such a case catholikes would shew themselues, sith the purpose tended to the obteining for them libertie of conscience: and therefore he desired me to acquaint him, what I thought men would do in such a case, and where I thought the fittest landing, and what holds in these parts were easiest to be surprised. I answered him, that (as it seemed) the enterprise stood vpon great vncertainties, if it depended of the knowledge of a certeine force to be found here, which no man could assure him of, vnlesse he had sounded all the catholikes, which was not possible without a manifest hazard of the discouerie of the purpose. For as for anie great personage, I know no one to be drawne to this action, that could carrie anie more than his ordinarie retinue: the onlie waie in such a case was (I told him) for such as would be drawne into this matter, and were of credit in their countries, to leuie forces vnder colour of the princes authoritie.

The pestilent persuasion of the Spanish ambassador to procure this pernicious enterprise.

But for that these things depended vpon vncerteine grounds, which was not fit to be vsed in so great an action, I said it was to be resolued, that the force to be sent should be of that number, that what backing soeuer they should find here, they might be able of themselues to incounter with anie force that might be prouided to be sent against them, and therfore they could not be lesse than fifteene thousand men. For the place of their landing, I said it depended much vpon the force that should be sent: for if that were in great number, it mattered not where they landed: if in a small companie, then was it requisit that it should be in the countries best affected, & furthest from hir maiesties principall forces, which I said to be in the northerne parts on either side. To the danger of the Scotish queene by me obiected, he said he knew no remedie, vnlesse she might be taken awaie by some two hundred horsse, which I told him I saw not to be possible: for that I knew not anie gentleman in those parts (which were men, if anie, to performe it) that I durst with to be made acquainted with the matter before hand.

The reasons was frustrate as also the later of the plot: such was Gods iustice to persecute supplant both the one and the other.

Finallie, our conclusion was, that I should informe him of the hauens as particularlie as I could: and within few daies after, finding by him that the force intended hither, was farre inferior vnto that I spake of; and that there was some different betweene the pope & the king of Spaine for the charge, I told him that the surest course and of least danger were, to send a supplie into Scotland, where a small force would breed a great alteration, and things being there established by the good liking of the king, I thought it was in him by a continuall war, & by incursions so to annoie this state, as hir maiestie here should be forced to yeeld the libertie of the Scotish queene, and what should therevpon haue beene reasonablie demanded for the benefit of the catholikes here. And herein I said it would be a great furtherance, if at the same time some few were landed in Ireland: where although they abide the same hazard that the former forces susteined; yet would the charge be so great to hir maiestie, and so great an occasion of dispersing of hir forces, as a much lesse companie than was spoken of first by me, would (being landed here in a conuenient place) shake the minds of men generallie, and be of force (if anie thing) to draw them to shew themselues in the furtherance of the purpose.

was this (thinke you) a naturall subiects opinion, or not rather the conceipt of a tyrannous traitor?

He vtterlie reiected the purpose for Ireland, and disliked not the purpose for Scotland; but still he was in mind to haue forces landed here: and therefore desired me verie earnestlie to inquire particularlie of the hauens on the side of Cumberland and Lancashire, and what men were dwelling there that were well affected in religion, and what places easie to be taken, and what apt for fortification. The next time that I went to the Spanish ambassador, he found himselfe greeued that he vnderstood matters were determined in France without his priuitie: and told me that Persons the Iesuit was gone vnto Rome, sent (as he thought) to vnderstand the popes mind. Some after came ouer my brother Thomas, to make an end of our account, and to persuade me to come ouer, assuring me that for ought he could see in likelihood, the enterprise was neuer like to take effect. In the time of his being here, and while I interteined intelligence with the Scotish queene concerning hir libertie, the Spanish ambassador sent for me, and told me of the comming ouer of Pope to view Sussex and the hauens, and as he thought, to take the best of account there: whereat he seemed to be aggreeued; for that such matters had not beene left to him, being one whome they in France made beleeue that they relied vpon principallie in this enterprise. Afterwards, the ambassador told me, that it was Charles Paget, and that he was returned, but where he had beene he knew not, and at the same time I receiued a letter from Morgan, that it was Paget: but assuring me, and so willed me to assure the ambassador, that his comming was not to moue anie man, but onelie to view the countrie, for that the moouing of anie man was referred vnto him. I did so, and he intreated me to remember him for those foresaid names and hauens, saieng, that so it were done exactlie by the spring, it would suffice: for that sooner he saw no likelihood of the execution of the enterprise.

This Pope was Charles Paget, otherwise named Sprint: as beleeue.

My brother hauing made an end of his account with me, returned with this resolution betweene vs (I protest before God) that if the enterprise succeeded not betweene this and the next spring now past, that I would settle my things here and go ouer. And for this cause, he being gone, I went downe into the countrie, both to sell and take order for my lands in those parts, as also to fetch the draught of gentlemen and hauens for the most part of England, which had beene set downe by me aboue two yeares since, and left behind me at Feckenham in my studie. Not finding the draught at Feckenham, I returned to London, where I found the note of names in secretarie hand, which I carried to the Spanish ambassador, and there drew that other in Romane hand in his studie, putting downe Chester to be taken, in respect of the easinesse as I thought, and the rather to giue him incouragement in the matter, I left it with him, promising him that by the next spring I would perfect it, if I taried so long; making knowne vnto him, that I was had in suspicion, and my determination to be gone: but he prested the contrarie of me, assuring me, that if the enterprise proceeded not, he would then also depart.

Throckmorton's purpose that this enterprise succeeded not by the next spring.

Whether sir Francis Englefield were a dealer in this practise or no, I know not: but sure I am (for so the Spanish ambassador told me) that sir Francis had intelligence with the said ambassador all the time of his being here. The Spanish ambassador told me that he heard the people of Northwales were generallie well affected, and therefore he desired to haue the hauens of that countrie: I told him that hereafter I would helpe him thereunto, although no good might be expected there, for the reasons by me set downe in my first confession: and hereupon the date before mine apprehension, the ambassador sent me backe the said paper in Romane hand, desiring me to set downe the same at my leasure more exactlie, which was the cause that it was not in my greene veluet casket. The writings in my casket were such as were by me confessed, and came vnto my hands as I haue confessed.

Sir Francis Englefield whether excusable or no.

¶ I most humblie beseech hir most excellent maiestie, that the extremitie which I haue alreadie sustetined, and the causes by me discouered, to the safetie of hir maiestie and the state, not made knowne (as hath appeared) by anie other meane than by my selfe, may crane at hir hands the extending of hir gratious commiseration towards the releeuing of the lamentable estate of me, hir maiesties poore distressed subiect, and mine, if God for mine offenses forbid, not the same.

Throckmorton's sute for commiseration to hir maiestie.

Now iudge all ye, that be not peruerslie affected whether Throckemorton be iustlie condemned, and whether his confessions (though as he pretended, extorted from him by violence) be of force in law against him. He conspired to ouerthrow the state, to bring in strangers to inuade the realme, to remoue hir maiestie from hir lawfull & naturall right and inheritance to the crowne of England, and to place a stranger in hir seat. But this last point, for placing of a stranger, will (perchance) be denied: then note, that in the whole course of the practise, the greatest barre to the prosecution of the enterprise, was, they found no waie how to put the Scotish queene in safetie. Then, if these dangerous treasons be discouered by torture (the onelie meanes left vnto princes to discouer treasons and attempts against their states and persons; where they find apparent matter to induce suspicion, as in the case of Throckemorton, vpon sight of the plots of hauens, &c) may the law touch the traitor or not? If anie man hold this question negatiuelie, hold him for a friend to traitors and treasons, and an enimie to the queenes maiestie, whome God long preserue, and confound hir enimies: Amen.

A recapitulation of some treasonable enterprises by Throckemorton.

On the tenth date of Julie next following, the same Francis Throckemorton was conueied by water from the Tower of London to the Blacke friers staires, and from thense by land to the sessions hall in the old ballie without Newgate, where he was deliuered to the shiriffes of London, and then laid on a hurdle, from whence he was drawne to Tiburne, and there hanged, bowelled, and quartered. The nintéenth date of Julie, Robert baron of Denbigh, the onelie sonne and heire of Robert earle of Leicester, departed this mortall life, being then of the age of three yeares and somewhat more, at Wansted in Essex, the solemnitie of whose funerall was there honorablie kept on the first of August; and after, his bodie was conueied to Warwike, & there in the chappell of Richard Beauchampe earle of Warwike his ancestor honorablie intombed, on the one and twentith of October. In memorie of whom (but not as an epicedium, nor yet as an epitaph) these verses of fit inuention and deuise may well be vsed:

Throckemorton executed.

In this yeare, an ancient and charitable citizen of London named D. S. embroderer to the queenes maiestie (whome God from bare estate had aduanced to a degree of credit, hauing his wife aliue, and by hir onelie eight children, six of them maried, whose children counted together made aboue the number of twentie) this man (I say) notwithstanding these great occasions by multiplied generations might haue prouoked him to gather and laie vp against his death, such worldlie wealth, as they thereby might reape profit after his decease: yet remembring himselfe, that christians are not placed in this world to benefit their children onlie, but also to doo good to the household of faith, whereof none are more likelie to be members than the godlie poore, did laie out the most part of his substance (when he was three score yeares of age) in and about the building of six proper houses in forme of a quadrangle, with these words in faire great letters round about the same:

The charitable deeds of D. S.

These letters are placed about the gate.

Upon the front of the building, ouer the doore or gate of entrance, are these words of well wishing grauen in stone: GOD SAVE OVR NOBLE QVEENE ELISABETH CHEEFE FOVNDER OF THIS WORKE. The originall of this foundation was in this maner. The said M. S. did purchase certeine old houses in the ward of castell Bainard, in the citie of London, and pulling them downe to the ground, did (vpon his owne charges) build vpon the same ground six little houses all of bricke and stone, as strongly as he could deuise to continue, euerie house hauing three seuerall rooms one ouer the other: wherein he placed six poore widowes immediatlie after they were builded, that is, in euerie house one widow, choosing them within the parish where the said houses do stand; being such as haue liued in good name and fame all the daies of their liues, and so do continue, and are of the age of three score yeares or thereabouts, before they shall be admitted to dwell in anie of them: & being thus admitted, and remaining widowes, they haue their dwelling free during their liues, and twentie shillings a peece beside, paid them quarterlie by fiue shillings euerie quarter, to buie them wood & coles. And this he truelie paieth them during his owne life, and his wife shall do it likewise if she do out liue him during hir life: and after both their deceases, he hath made it ouer vnto Christs hospitall to performe the same for euer. For the performance of the premisses, he hath left vnto the said hospitall sufficient rents, as well to paie the said six pounds yearelie vnto the said six poore widowes, as also to keepe the said houses in reparations and buildings for euer, with some ouerplus vnto the said hospitall.

Six houses of perpetuall reléefe, founded vpon S. Peters hill in Baniard castell ward.

Rents left in perpetuitie for the maintenance of the said houses.

And to the intent that his good and charitable prouision should by no misbehauiour be abused, but decent and agreeable to the age of the parties there relieued, he maye certeine ordinances and rules, to be obserued and kept by those six poore widowes which do dwell or hereafter shall dwell in anie of those six houses, standing vpon saint Peters hill, in the ward of castell Bainard, erected by the said M. S. embodied to our most gratious and noble queene Elisabeth, Anno 1584.

Ordinances of the founder to be inuiolablie obserued.

1 First, I will that they shall be such widowes as shall be giuen to serue God, before all other exercises, and such as haue liued in good name and fame, and so do continue; no blasphemers of the name of God, no drunkards, no scolds, nor anie disquiet persons, but of good and godlie conuersation, to the better example of others. They shall be of the age of threescore yeares, or of six and fiftie yeares at the least, before they shall be admitted to dwell in anie of the same houses. And if anie of them shall fortune to marrie, they shall depart out of the same house or houses wherein she or they do dwell, before they do marrie, and neuer to be admitted to dwell in anie of the same houses againe.

What kind of widowes are to be admitted into these houses.

2 Also, they nor anie of them shall not lodge, nor suffer to be lodged or harboured by date nor yet by night, anie manner of person, neither man, nor woman, nor child, within anie of their houses, but onelie themselues; without it be in some great extremitie of sickenesse, when as of necessitie some honest ancient woman a keeper, may watch with anie of them for a night or two vpon great necessitie; or else not lodge, harbour, keepe, or maintaine, or suffer to be lodged, harboured, kept, or maintained, neither by date nor yet by night, any maner of person, although they be neuer so neere of blood or kindred; but if anie of them shall so do, she or they shall presentlie auoid out of hir or their houses within twentie daies next after anie such offense committed, & neuer to be admitted to dwell in anie of the said houses after. My meaning is not but that they may come the one of them vnto the others house, or their friends, to be merie together (when they shall thinke meete) louinglie, as honest neighbours vse to do at houres conuenient, and so to depart in good order.

Whom they may lodge and not lodge.

3 Also, they shall be no keepers of sicke persons in other houses which shall be sicke of the plague, or of anie infectious sicknesse, for bringing of infected clothes among themselues: nor they shall not suffer anie other folkes to haue anie recourse by their meanes, to wash anie sheets or other clothes, neither woollen or linnen at the well, nor in anie other part of the same yards but onelie themselues, for annoieng of the tenants with filth & foule waters running through their yards & houses there adioining. And if anie of the rest of the said widowes do or shall know that anie of them or more, haue offended anie of these articles aforesaid, and do not shew the same vnto such persons as shall haue authoritie to correct and amend the same: then all such persons shall be in the like danger as the partie that hath so offended, if it may be proued that they did know thereof: and if they or anie of them shall offend in anie of these articles, they shall be put from their houses as is aforesaid, and not be admitted anie more into anie of them.

In order for the auoiding of infection, sicknesse, annoiance, &c.

4 Also, I will that they and either of them, shall most dwallie vse the parish church of saint Wenets, neere Paules wharfe, and especiallie vpon the sabboth date, and vpon mondaie, wednesdaie, and fridaie, in euerie weeke; if there be anie sermon in the same church on the said daies: and if they or anie of them shall be absent from the same church at seruice time, being in the citie, and being not sicke, they shall paie two pence for euerie time so offending, which shall be put into the poores box among themselues, or into the poores box in the said parish church.

What weeke daies they are to repaire to the church.

5 Also, I will that none of them do occupie anie water aboue the staires of anie of the same houses, for decaieng of the same houses, and perishing of the seelings: and if anie of them shall so offend, she or they shall lose the fiue shillings that they should receiue the next quarter date following, by vertue of my will.

Conuenient vse of water, &c.

6 Also, I will haue them to put in two sufficient suerties to be bound in twentie pounds before they be admitted into anie of the same houses, to performe these articles, or else to auoid the said houses within twentie daies (as is aforesaid) quietlie.

Performance of these ordinances intended.

7 Also, I will that the two widowes that do or shall dwell in the two houses next the street on either side of the gate, shall hang out one lanthorne betweene them both, and a whole candell in it burning, according vnto the custome in the citie of London vsed in the winter season; that is to saie, the one widow one weeke to hang it out, and the other widow another weeke, and so to continue from time to time, and the said lanthorne to be maintained by those two widowes that shall haue the hanging of them out. And I will that they do maintaine them to be faire, large, and cleere lanthorns: and for the prouision of the candels, I will that the other foure widowes dwelling in the other foure houses, shall buie either of them one pound of cotton candels, and deliuer them vnto the two widowes that shall hang out the lanthorne, so as alwaies there shall not be aboue ten candels in the pound. And if any of the same widows shall not performe this my meaning, I will that twise so much more as will performe the premisses, shall be taken out of the fiue shillings that they or either of them should receiue the next quarter date following, by vertue of my last will and testament.

God grant that they which are better able, may haue no lesse good will to doo the like, or better, that the godlie poore may be relieued here on earth, vpon whom, be it little or much that is bestowed, Christ Iesus no doubt will reward it a hundred fold in heauen: and who would not by workes of faithfull charitie, endeuour to dwell in God, whome the scripture calleth charitie? Consdering that the apostle exhorteth all christians in no case to forget to doo good and distribute, sith with such sacrifices he is well pleased.

On the 12 date of November, the queens maiestie (returning after hir progresse) came to hir manor of S. Iames, where the citizens of London, to the number of two hundred of the gravest sort in cotes of velvet, and chaines of gold, on horsebacke, and a thousand of the companies on foot (hauing with them a thousand men with torches readie there to giue light on euerie side for that the night drew on) receiued and welcomed hir grace. And on the foure and twentith date of the same moneth, hir maiestie and the lords rode to the parlement, which was that date begun at Westminster.

Parlement at Westminster.

An. Reg. 27.

¶ In the foresaid parlement held at Westminster, were manie necessarie lawes ordeined for the commonwealth, amongst which was one speciall act procured by sir Roger Manwood knight chiefe baron of the exchequer, for the maintenance of the famous stone bridge of Rochester. And here because there is mention made of sir Roger Manwood & Rochester bridge; I thinke it conuenient (sith I haue alwaies determined to set forth what soeuer might come to my mind and pen touching my sweet and native countrie of Kent, and such persons of the same as either by honorable descent in that countrie, or by office of hie place in the commonwealth, or by worthie remembrance deserue not to be forgotten) to speake somewhat of the same sir Roger Manwood, and such things as he hath done for that countrie, especiallie sith maister Lambard a man of rare iudgement hath not forgotten to treat of him in his booke of the perambulation of Kent vnder the title of Sandwich. Wherfore thinking him worthie remembrance for that which he hath done in his owne countrie of Kent, I enter in discourse of him a Kentishman in this sort.

Addition of Fr. Thin.

Inact for the maintenance of Rochester stone bridge procured by sir Roger Manwood.

Sir Roger Manwood a friend to the commonwealth.

This man being borne at Sandwich in the yeare of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred and fiue and twentie, was first instructed in the grammar schole of that towne, as then but a meane thing and taught by a chanterie preest of the foundation of one Thomas Ellis. Afterwards, when as by dissolution of chanteries in the time of king Edward the first this chanterie schole was taken away, & the children of the townes people being manie in number were forced to be taught in the grammar scholes far distant from Sandwich, to the great charges of their parents (whereby manie poore mens children for capacitie and pains taking meet for learning, were put by the course of learning, which otherwise might haue proued learned and become good members of the common wealth) the said sir Roger Manwood by studie in the law, and reader in the inner temple, well considering the same (and minding to retire to Sandwich towne his birth place, a better grammar schole than that wherein he was first brought vp) did in the yeare of our redemption one thousand fiue hundred three score and three, vpon his owne charges procure from the deane & chapter of Christs church of Canterburie a vacant place (hauing manie broken stone walles) neere to the towne gate in Sandwich called Canterburie gate. In which void roome adioining to the riuer of Delfe is now erected a faire schoolehouse (for the schoolemaster, vsher, & certen boording scholers) framed all of bricke & stone. For perpetuall continuance of which schole, the said sir Roger Manwood (now lord chiefe baron) in the yeare of our Lord 1586 procured letters patents from the queene for incorporating and allurance of the same schole (with other lands and reuenues thereto belonging) to the maior and his brethren of Sandwich and to their successors for euer, by the name of the gouernours of the free grammar schole of Roger Manwood in Sandwich; allowing to the said gouernors of his owne land the cleere yearelie value of 22 pounds and more. Further, thereunto procuring of his brother Thomas Manwood (sometime maior of Sandwich) the cleere yearelie value of ten pounds of lands and tenements; and also of one Thomas Compton (iurat of Sandwich) eight pounds by yeare De claro, of his owne lands and tenements, in the grosse summe amounting to fourtie pounds by yeare, which lands being sufficientlie assured to the said gouernours, with conuenient dwelling for the maister, and vsher, lodging for sixteene boording scholers, and with some benevolence of parents for the teaching of their children, is a large endowment for perpetuall maintenance of the same grammar schole.

He erected a faire schoolehouse of bricke and stone.

He procureth letters patents &c: for the maintenance of the same in perpetuitie.

The summe of 40 pounds allowed yearlie, &c: to the maintenance of the said grammar schole.

Besides which, for the further benefit of the same schole, the same sir Roger Manwood hath obteined two scholers roomes in Gonuile and Caius college in Cambridge, and two other scholers roomes in Lincolne college at Oxford, with pension of foure markes yearelie to euerie of the said foure scholers to be removed from that schole of Sandwich, and to be placed in those colleges, from time to time as often as ante of the same college scholers roomes shall be void, and that ante scholer shall be next to come from that schole of Sandwich. Beyond all which that he hath done for recompense of his birth place, with a free grammar schole for the education of the youth there, he also for reliefe of age hath neere vnto his dwelling place of saint Stephans in Hackington parish (adioining to Canterburie) built in the yeare of our redemption 1573, a faire row of seuen almes houses of bricke, placing in euerie of the same almes houses poore folkes, such as are counted to be honest & good. For perpetuall maintenance of which almes persons he hath endowed that building with a yearelie allowance of the value of foure pounds by yeare (to euerie of the same almes men & houses) in monie, bread, & fewell. And in the same parish church neere to those almes houses he hath newlie erected an Ile, where his tombe is made and placed, & in that church a new roome of seuen pewes and seates for the almes people to be bestowed in, together by themselues.

Two scholers roomes obteined in Cambridge & two in Oxford for such scholers as remoue from the said schole to either of the vniuersities.

Seuen almes houses by him founded for the releefe of the honest aged.

Likewise for setting to worke of middle age, whereby they may eschew idlenesse, this sir Roger Manwood did in the yeare of Christ, one thousand fiue hundred seuentie and eight, build a new house of correction in the Westgate street in the suburbs of Canterburie. And moreouer, whereas Rochester bridge standing on the riuer of Medweie, being famoulie built of stone (in the time of king Richard the second as is most likelie; though some attribute the same to the time of Edward the third) by one sir Robert Knolles knight, with the helpe of John lord Cobham of Cobham, and Margaret Courtneie his wife, being two of the principall benefactors thereunto, after the decaie of a woodden bridge (first erected ouer the same riuer some hundred yeares before that of stone) had (for the perpetuall maintenance of the same stone bridge) the ancient contributarie lands lands (giuen for the support of the woodden bridge) after the ruine of the same woodden bridge reduced (by act of parlement holden in the one and twentith of Richard the second) to the maintenance of the same new stone bridge; and that sundrie manors, lands, tenements, & rents in Kent, London, & Essex, were by deuise of sundrie persons assured for the vpholding of the same new stone bridge: yet by want of due circumspection this new stone bridge became in so great decaie, that in the latter time of quéene Marie, and begining of hir maiestie now reigning, collection was made vpon all horsemen, & carriages passing ouer that bridge in manner of a tole or tar: and more, by reason of the quænes commission, an vniuersall taration was made in nature of a tenth and fiftéenth ouer all the countrie of Kent, and the citie of Canturburie, for and towards the reparations of the same bridge.

How the said bridge began to decaie, and what meanes are vsed for the reparing of the same.

All which being an vnwilling burthen, & griefe to the people, togither with the reuenues of the bridge lands, did not yet suffice to saue the ruine of that famous stone bridge, vntill by the carefull trauell of the said sir Roger Manwood (then a iustice in the common plées) a remedie was found therefore without iniurie to anie person, and without exaction of anie passenger. Which remedie was, that all the manors, lands, tenements, and rents, belonging vnto the bridge, should be freed from all leases thereof, made at small rents; and the same lands so let to be dulie improued to a higher rate, the same being a matter answerable to right and reason; considering the cause of the first gift of those lands then sufficient, and the now dearth of things, which made it insufficient to support the said bridge) the stone, timber and other stuffe, for repare of the same bridge, with the works, wages, and carriages concerning it, being now growne to farre greater prices than in old time they were. Which deuised remedie to vndo the old leases, was much impugned by manie persons of wealthie hauior, receiuing great profit by those old vnder rented leases.

Sir Roger Manwoods deuised remedie for the keeping of the said bridge well repared.

His deuised remedie tending to so good a purpose was impugned.

All which notwithstanding, this Roger Manwood prosecuted the same to a good successe: for he making to appeare before the lords of the councell, and the rest of the iudges of the realme (in the presence of such as misliked these old leases, and of their learned councell, and other fauourers) that the said manors, lands, and tenements, belonging to the said bridge, were giuen to the wardens & communaltie, owners of the contributorie lands; and that their old leases made by the wardens onelie, without consent of the communaltie, were not good in law: the farmers submitted themselues to surrender their old insufficient leases, and to take such as might be available in law of the same lands. Whereby the yearelie reuenues of the bridge lands grew to be of more value than triple that which they were before: and yet the old farmers had new leases vnto their owne contentation; bicause the same are not so improued, but that they are as reasonablie letten as other priuat mens lands be.

The yearelie reuenues of the said bridge amount vnto more in value by triple than they were before.

To which deuise a further remedie was then added, and set forth by the said iustice Manwood, who for perpetuall supplie (when need should be) procured that the ancient contributorie lands, almost growne into obliuion, should be to that end reduced into a conuenient order answerable vnto right and iustice. And likewise (for good direction in yearelie elections of wardens, and other officers, with the accounts, prouision, works, and other such necessaries required for perpetuall maintenance of that bridge) obteined an act of parlement in the eightéenth yeare of this quéenes reigne, as appeareth in the printed booke of statutes: wherein were manie things ordeined for the good ordering of the said bridge, and the officers belonging therevnto. After all which a charge of fiue hundred pounds was of record demanded and leuied vpon the wardens of the said bridge, for arrerages of the stipends of chanterie priests, sometime serning in the chappell at the east end of the said bridge, to the great damage and ouerthrow of the bridge; had not the said iustice Manwood by his trauell vpon due and lawfull triall at the assises, deliuered & discharged the bridge of that great demand; as appeareth by record in the court of the exchequer, before the said sir Roger Manwood came to be chiefe baron there. And yet abuse and slacknesse being had in these things, the wardens (notwithstanding that great benevolence and relése was at sundrie times and of sundrie persons procured vnto the said bridge, by the carefull and diligent trauell of Thomas Wooten of Boxton Maleherbe of Kent esquier, a deere father and fauourer of his countrie, as well at the times of the elections of the wardens, and the accounts of the officers) were forced to disburse great sums of their owne monie from time to time, to dispatch the needfull charges and works required for the bridge, without anie conuenient allowance of the contributorie persons, at the yearelie elections of the wardens, and without due regard had for order of the said lands, belonging and contributorie to the bridge.

Maister Thomas Wooten of Kent esquier a father and fauourer of his countrie.

For auoiding whereof the said sir Roger Manwood, then & now lord chiefe baron of the exchequer, procured to pas another act of parlement, in the seuen & twentith yeare of hir maiestie reigne, wherein is further prouision made for the said bridge, as in the printed booke of statutes at large appeareth. By which sullie prouided meanes and by reasonable following the presidents of the works and accounts (written in great *ligear books by the said chiefe baron, and William Lambard esquier, in the yeare next after the said last mentioned act of parlement of the seuen and twentith of the quéenes reigne, they then executing the office of wardens) all needfull reparations be so done, and prouision before hand so made, as it is now growne out of all controuersie, that the said famous stone bridge of Rochester for euer is like to last, according to the intent of the first building, and the indowment thereof for the good and beneficiall seruice of the common wealth. This sir Roger Manwood, hauing had before an other wife issued of the gentlemanlie familie of the Theobalds, is at this daie ioined in marriage with Elisabeth (descended of an ancient and worshipfull familie) the daughter of John Copinger of Alhallowes in the countie of Kent esquier: which Elisabeth, being a woman of such rare modestie and patience, as hir verie enimies must néeds confesse the same: occasioned these verses following to be composed touching hir & hir husband the said sir Roger Manwood:

the crowne, amongest others, speaketh verie commendablie and deseruedlie of this deceassed earle, who (at such time as the said booke was published vnder the title aforenamed) had bene lord great admerall of England thirtie yeares, and of councell vnto three princes: alwaies of vnspotted report specially for allegiance, and therefore as singularlie beloued in his life; so accordinglie bemoned at his death. The words that concerne this noble mans memoriall are thus extant, to the aduancement of his honour, testified by report of two English poets:

O Clintone tuæ concessa est regia classis
Tutelæ, totos ter denos circiter annos:

And before this, namelie in the yeare 1564, at what time the said noble man was honored with the title of Præfectus maris, and attendant vpon his maiestie in presence, at his being in Cambridge, where she was magnificallie interteined with all hir troupe of lords and traine of ladies, &c: thus did an academike write in praise of the forenamed earle:

Jesuites, seminaries, and massing priests set ouer the seas and banished out of this realme of England for euer.

On the one and twentith daie of Januarie, one and twentie Jesuites, seminaries, and other massing priests, late prisoners in the Tower of London, Marshalse, and Kings bench, were shipped at the Tower wharfe, to be conueied towards France, & banished this realme for euer, by vertue of a commission from hir maiestie, as may more fullie appeare by that which followeth.

A vew of the said commission from the queenes maiestie.

WHereas the queenes most excellent maiestie, foreseeing the danger that hath and might grow vnto the realme, by accesse of Jesuits and seminarie priests, and other like wandering and massing priests comming hither to seduce and withdraw hir louing subiects from their due obedience to God and hir maiestie; and therewithall, traitorouslie to practise the moouing and stirring of rebellion within the realme, as hath appeared by sufficient proofe against them, and by confession of sundrie of themselues; for the which diuerse of the said Jesuits and seminaries haue bene tried, condemned, and executed by the ordinarie and orderlie course of hir maiesties lawes, and yet they haue not refrained dailie to practise and attempt the like treasons. Hir maiestie not withstanding, following the accustomed course of hir princelie clemencie, liking rather for this time to haue them onelie banished out of the realme, than to suffer the iustice of hir lawes to be executed against them (although they haue deserued the same in the highest degree) hath giuen power to vs of hir maiesties priuie councell & others, by commission and warrant vnder the great seale of England, bearing date the fiftéenth date of this present month of Januarie, to see this hir purpose and determination for their banishment put in execution. By vertue whereof, we haue proceeded in execution. We haue committed to the charge of these bearers, William Bolles one of hir maiesties yeomen of hir chamber, and Anthonie Hall, the persons whose names do follow, that is to saie, James Bolgraue, John Hart, Edward Rushton, Jaspar Heiwod, William Tedder, Samuell Conters, Arthur Pits, William Warmington, Richard Blake, William Hartlie, Richard Norris, William Dean, William Bishop, Robert Nutter, Thomas Stephanson, John Colton, Christopher Tomson, Thomas Worthington, John Barns, William Smith, clearks, being Jesuits, seminaries, and other wandering and massing priests, and Henrie Orton gentleman: all which haue bene apprehended in this realme, to be by them imbarked, and transported beyond the seas, according to such direction as they haue receiued in that behalfe.

The queenes maiesties mercie notable.

The names of such Jesuites (Jesuits, I should say) as by vertue of the queenes commission were banished out of the queenes dominions.

These shall be therefore by the authoritie aforesaid, to will and require you, and in hir maiesties name strictlie to charge and command you, and euerie of you hir maiesties officers, as well within the realme of England and Ireland, as in anie other parts of hir maiesties dominions and countries, to whome it may and shall apperteine, not onelie to suffer them to passe vnder the charge of the said William Bolles and Anthonie Hall: but also that in case by contrarietie of winds, or extremitie of weather, they shall be after their imbarking, driuen into anie port or creeke within anie of your iurisdictions, that vpon the sight of this passport ye aid and assist the said Bolles, and Anthonie Hall, if they shall so require you, in seeing them safelie reteined, committed, & kept in custodie (if they shall come aland) till such time as they the said William Bolles and Anthonie Hall may with safetie put againe into the sea, to transport them to such place beyond the sea, as by our direction they are appointed; and to suffer them effsoones to imbarke and depart, without staie or interruption. Foreseeing, that they the said Jesuits and seminaries, and other the wandering and massing priests aforesaid, nor anie of them, nor the said Henrie Orton be suffered to conueie or transport out of the realme, anie thing that by the lawes be prohibited or forbidden. Whereof (as of the rest commanded herein) we require you not to faile, as you will answer to the contrarie at your perils. Giuen vnder our hands at Greenewich the twentith daie of Januarie, in the seuen and twentith yeare of hir maiesties reigne. ¶ Now followeth a certificat of the maister that transported the forenamed one and twentie banished persons, as followeth.

A further charge vpon the said seminaries touching transportation.

To the right honorable lords and o- thers of hir maiesties most honorable priuie councell, and all other officers to whome it may apperteine.

A certificat to the lords of the councell, &c: concerning the foresaid matter.

THese may be to certifie, &c: that William Bolles, yeoman vsher of hir maiesties chamber, and Anthonie Hall of London skinner, hauing imbarked at the Tower wharfe of London, the one and twentith date of Januarie 1584 one and twentie persons being banished men into my barke called the Marie Martin of Colchester, to be transported and conueied into Normandie, for sixteene of which said one and twentie persons they had compounded with me aforehand. The same William Bolles and Anthonie Hall haue satisfied and paid me for all their passages and vittels, and haue also hired at Douer an experimented pilot for the coasts of Normandie; which said Bolles and Hall with the said banished men in their charges, after their being by contrarie winds driuen to staie against Erith, at Grauesend, in Tilberie hope, at Lee, at the Spaniard, at the Downes, at Douer, and at Rie, were by force of weather and chase of pirats driuen to Bullen, and there arriued all safelie the second day of Februarie 1584, and thense sent the said banished men, some by horse, but most on foot, with conducts to Abbe-

ID all magistrats, officers, & ministers, within the realme of England or elsewhere, to whome it may in anie wise appertaine: this may be to giue certification, that we whose names are here vnder written, who were imbarked at the Tower wharfe of London the one and twentith daie of Januarie 1584, and there receiued into the charge of maister William Bolles, and maister Anthonie Hall, by commission from their lordships and other hir maiesties most honorable priuie councell, haue bene by them the said William Bolles and Anthonie Hall verie friendlie & honestlie intreated, and with carefull diligence safelie conducted, transported, & conueied to the prouince of Normandie, & by them left this third daie of Februarie, according to the English computation, in the yeare of Christ 1584, which said Bolles and Hall haue in our presence paid the maister of the barke which transported vs for his whole fraught and vittels in the ship, for the time of our remaining abroad: and generallie so well vsed vs in all respects, that we can not but acknowledge our selues much beholding to them & fullie satisfied, in hauing bene committed to the charge of so courteous officers, sith the case standeth so with vs that we are banished our countrie contrarie to our desires, wherein we take no little griefe of mind. For testimonie whereof, we haue hereunto set our seuerall hands this present third daie of Februarie 1584. Iaspar Hatwood, Edward Ruchton, John Hart, &c.

¶ O Lord what a mercifull quéene is this, in such sort to forgiue and forget iniuries, yea treasonable iniuries, as by banishment onelie to chastise them, that deserued extreame punishment? Yea with a banishment scarse fitlie to be so termed; sith in the execution thereof there was such clemencie shewed, as that the banished by their owne confessions haue left acknowledged vnder their owne handwriting, a notable kind of courtesie receiued by the meanes of hir maiestie. And therefore they cannot but in conscience commend hir highnesse tender affection so gratiouslie exchanged for seuere affliction; insomuch that it may rightlie be reported of hir highnesse, which the poet spake of Cesar, that is to saie:

The earles yeomen fiftie. This traine had to carie trunks, males, and chests, fiue carts and a wagon throughout from Calis to Paris, besides the earls sumpter horsse and garde viands on horsse backe.

The lord ambassador passeth from London to Graues end, and to Douer, and arriueth at Calis.

On the six and twentith daie of Januarie, the earls with his traine passed from London to Graues end in a tilt boat called a light horseman, and there taking post horsses rid to Sittingborne, and there lodged, from whense they rid to Douer, where they imbarked and landed at Calis on the first of Februarie, the earle of Derbie lord ambassador, with the lords Sands and Windsor transported in the quéns ship named the Scout, the other gentlemen & traine in craiers of Douer to the number of eight in the whole, where they were all receiued and welcomed to the towne by monsieur de Gourdan gouernour thereof, and rested there the next daie: on which daie at night the said earle, barons, and principall gentlemen were inuited to a supper, by the said monsieur de Gourdan, which was prepared for them in a merchants house in verie sumptuous sort and great interteinement, and after supper musicke and dansing, some ladies and gentlewomen of the towne being purposelie brought to the place to interteine and to danse with the noblemen and others.

Monsieur de Gourdan gouernour of Calis interteineth the ambassadors.

On the third of Februarie the whole traine went from Calis to Bullogne to bed, where they were verie well interteined, the gouernors deputie presenting the earle with certeine pots of wine of sundrie sorts. On the fourth of Februarie they rid to Monstrell to bed, and there were likewise presented. On the fift they went to Albeuill to bed, and were met with one hundred and fiftie shot of harquebuzers at the entrie of the towne, where on either side the streets were made ranks of shot all the way as they passed to their lodging, & after marched off about the market place, giuing manie a volée of shot till it waxed darke, the gouernor of the towne presenting sundrie sorts of wine. And the daie following they toke their iournie to Amiens to bed, where of monsieur Creuicure called Boniuet, lieutenant of Picardie for the king, accompanied with an hundred gentlemen, and best citizens, met the earle halfe a mile without the towne, and so rid talking with him & his traine. That night the said Creuicure presented the earle with great store of verie large and good fresh water fish, and the towne with wine of diuerse sorts, sorts, and the daie following being sundaie, the said Crearcure inuited the earle to dinner, which dinner was greatlie commended. After dinner his lordship's traine went to Brethnill to bed, the next daie to Cleremont, where he staied tuesdaie, and on wednesdaie the tenth of Februarie to Luzarch.

Sir Edward Stafford the queenes ambassador resident with the French king, &c.

On the 11 he went to S. Denise, where by the waie his lordship was met by sir Edward Stafford, hir maiesties ambassador resident with the French king, who brought with him diuerse gentlemen of England, to the number of thirtie horse, and so accompanied him to S. Denise where they kept companie all the daie following being fridaie. On saturdaie his lordship made his entrie into Paris, about two or three of the clocke at after none, there being of the lord ambassadors traine more than two hundred horse; and midwaie betweene saint Denise and Paris, there met with their lordships sent from the king, the duke of Montpensier a prince of the bloud, the lords of Cauignie, le Chapelle aux Vrsins, countie de Lude, de Vienne, de Malicorne, de la Moth Fenelon, who had sometimes beene ambassador liger in England, Dessrie, D'abin, de Fontaines, de Commillon, the marques of Curton, the countie de Exignan, all councellors in the councell, & knights of the holie ghost. The duke of Tremouille, the counties de Bzillac, de Creance, Sancerre, and of Lasuze, with a great number of lords and barons, gentlemen of the chamber, which all were cõmanded by the king to mount on horsebacke, and accompanie the said duke de Montpensier, who met the earle of Derbie and the English traine midwaie betwixt Paris and saint Denise, and did accompanie him vnto hostell de Longueuille, sometime called the hostle of Anion. At his lordships entrie into the said lodging, the siers de Marle and de Gonair maistres de hostell to his maiestie, gaue him to vnderstand how they were appointed by the king to haue care of his good vsage and interteinement, who likewise had appointed messiers de la Moth Fenelon, the marques de Curton, & the countie de Exignan, to keepe his lordship companie at all times. And so was his lordship with the other lords and gentlemen lodged in the said hostell de Longueuille, where was three tables verie sumptuouslie furnished for them all of the kings cost; the one table in the great chamber for the lords and gentlemen, seruants to hir maiestie; the other in the hall for the erle of Derbies gentlemen; and the third in a gallerie beneath for gentlemens seruants, besides liuerie into euerie chamber, both of war, wood, wine, and such like, in as great plentie as could be desired.

The lord ambassadors imbarquement and vsage.

The lord ambassadour passeth from London to Gratsend, and so to Douer, and arriueth at Calis.

Monsieur de Gourcan gouernour of Calis interteineth the ambassadour.

The statelie & honorable meaning of the lord ambassadour before he came in presence & audience of the French king.

On sundaie the fourteenth of Februarie after the English account, and the foure and twentith after the French reckoning, the said earle betwixt the houres of two and three in the after none, went from his lodging by a posterne through the garden, which is neere to the Louure, accompanied with the said lords de la Moth Fenelon, de Curton, and Exignan, togither with the sier de Gondie, & the said de Marle, and de Gonair, and found the capteins of the regiment of the kings gard, making two ranks on either side of the street, beginning from the posterne to the Louure gate, who welcõmed him in the kings behalfe. Without the gate of the said Louure he was receiued by the lieutenants of the great prouost of France & his archers; at the Louure gate by the sier de Montegnie capteine thereof to his maiestie and his archers; which archers togither with those of the great prouost made two ranks from the said gate of the Louure to the foot of the staires. From the foot of the staires his lordship was receiued by the sier de Perdillan the French lieutenant of the Swittzers of the kings gard; which from the foot of the said staiers to the doore of the hall, made two ranks for his lordships passage. At the entrie of the hall, his lordship was receiued by the sier de Chasteau viaux knight of the holie ghost, and capteine of the archers of the kings gard; who likewise from the said doore vnto the doore of the antichamber made two ranks. From the doore of the antichamber, his lordship was receiued by the sier de Combault of the holie ghost, chiefe maister de hostell to the king, and by the other maisters of the hostell to his maiestie, and by his gentlemen waiters; and there in the said antichamber all the said earle of Derbies officers and gentlemen wearing liueries were appointed to staie, and the quæenes seruants that proceeded next after them, and before the said earle went still forward. At the entrie of the chamber of estate his lordship was receiued by the sier de Lieucourt knight of the holie ghost, chiefe escuir of the kings escuir, and the other escuires of the escuir togither, with the lieutenant of the hundred gentlemen of his maiestie, who made likewise two ranks for his lordships passage from that chamber doore to the chamber of audience, euerie of them bearing halberds in their hands. At the entrance of the antichamber, his lordship was receiued by the duke Joieuse, accompanied with the gentlemen of the kings chamber ordinarie, who made two ranks from that chamber doore to the doore of the chamber rotall.

The chamber rotall, & manner of receiuing and conducting of the lord ambassadour thereunto, and other notable obseruations.

Into the said chamber rotall first entred all the gentlemen, the quæenes maiesties seruants, the lords that had receiued and accompanied the said earle and lords: and the said duke de Joieuse accompanied the said earle of Derbie euen vnto the bars that stood about the edge of the haltpase, or mounting stone in the same chamber, where the king stood at his beds feet, accompanied without the said barriers on his right hand with the cardinals of Bourbon, Vandosme, and Joieuse; and on the left hand with the lords, the princes of Contie, the countie de Soissons, and duke Montpensier, princes of the bloud: the dukes de Neuers, Delbeuse, de la Tremouille, de Retz, monsieur le chancellor, sier de Vilequier, du Bouchase, de la Valette, Dantragues, de la Chapelle aux Vrsins, Chauignie, la Vaugulon, countie de Vauleurier, Clermont, Dantragues, de Larchaut, and other knights of the holie ghost, and councellors of the estate in great number. The said earle with the lord ambassador ordinarie of England alone entered within the said haltpase within the barriers vnto his maiestie, of whom they were receiued with great courtesie, & as amiable countenance as could be. And the earle deliuered the quæenes maisties letters vnto the king with great reuerence, and then making rehearsall of that he had in charge to saie, the said ambassador presented vnto the king the lords Sands and Windsor, with other the English knights and gentlemen; which all one after an other mounted vpon the haltpase, kissed their hands, & did their reuerence vnto the king. When the erle tooke his leaue, and was conducted by all the lords & capteins that had before receiued him, and conueied him vnto the place where they had first receiued him. Afterwards he went to salute the quæene mother, and at the entrance into hir antichamber he was receiued by monsieur de Lansac knight of the holie ghost, and knight of honour vnto the same quæne, whome he found accompanied with hir neece the princesse of Loraine standing at hir beds head, the princesses of Conde and Jontie, and the duches of Neuers standing at the beds feet, the duchesses Dusez, and of Retz, and other ladies and gentlewomen in great number. From thense his lordship was conueied to the quæene Regents chamber, at the entrance whereof he was receiued by the countie de Fiesque knight

On mondaie the fifteenth of Februarie, the king by monsieur le Moth Fenelon told the lord ambassador his mind touching the receipt of the order, that he intended to receiue it on thursdaie following in the after none, at the Augustine friers, which was done accordinglie with a mantle of blew veluet, and a hood, and collar of the order, with a booke of the statutes of the order, which all were inuested vpon the king in a place called maison de Nautralles; but the oth was ministred vnto the king in the friers church, Magnificat being then song, or singing. On sundaie the eight and twentith of Februarie, the ambassador with his traine toke their leaue, at whose returne from the court to his lodging he was presented that night with a rich cupbord of plate, worth twelue hundred pounds at the least; and vnto maister Clarenceaux was giuen a chaine of gold worth one hundred and twentie pounds and better, of two hundred thirtie and six links; to maister Sumerset a chaine of one hundred and fiftie links, worth one hundred marks; and to Thomas Pils a chaine of the same value.

The French king inuested into the order of the garter.

Gifts of roiall magnificence bestowed and receiued.

On the thursdaie following, the earle with his traine set forward homewards from Paris vnto saint Denise, and so were lodged all the waie in the same lodgings that before they had beene receiued in, and arriued prosperouslie in England, from Bullogne to Douer, on fridaie the twelfe day of March; and on the tuesdaie following were brought to the queenes maiesties presence at Greenewich, who graciouslie welcommed them home.

William Parrie hanged and quartered at Westminster.

This yeare on the second daie of March being tuesdaie, William Parrie was drawne from the Tower thorough the citie of London to Westminster, and there in the palace court, hanged, bowelled, and quartered, for high and horrible treasons by him practised, as maie appeare by the discourse that followeth, published vpon his execution, to giue generall intimation of his notorious trecheries vnto all the queenes maiesties subiects.

A true and plaine declaration of the horrible treasons practised by William Parrie against the queenes maiestie, and of his conuiction and execution for the same, the second of March 1584, according to the account of England.

A description of William Parrie.

THis William Parrie, being a man of verie meane and base parentage, but of a most proud and insolent spirit, bearing himselfe alwaies far aboue the measure of his fortune; after he had long led a wastfull and dissolute life, and had committed a great outrage against one Hugh Hare, a gentleman of the inner temple, with an intent to haue murthered him in his owne chamber, for the which he was most iustlie conuicted, seeing himselfe generallie condemned with all good men for the same, and other his misdemeanors, he left his naturall countrie, & gaue himselfe to trauell into forren parts beyond the seas. In the course of this his trauell he forsoke his allegiance and duetifull obedience to hir maiestie, and was reconciled, and subiected himselfe to the pope. After which, vpon conference with certeine Jesuits and others of like qualitie, he first conceiued his most detestable treason to kill the queene (whose life God long preserue) which he bound himselfe by promise, letters, and bowes, to perfourme and execute: and so with this intent he returned into England in Januarie one thousand fiue hundred foure score & three; and since that did practise at sundrie times to haue executed his most diuelish purpose and determination: yet couering the same so much as in him laie with a veile and pretense of great loialtie vnto hir maiestie.

William Parrie reconciled to the pope: and of his treason In superlatiuo gradu.

Immediatlie vpon his returne into England, he sought to haue secret accesse to hir maiestie, pretending to haue some matter of great importance to reueale vnto hir: which obteined, and the same so priuatlie in hir highnesse palace at Whitehall, as hir maiestie had but one onelie councellor with hir at the time of his accesse, in a remote place, who was so far distant, as he could not heare his speech. And there then he discouered vnto hir maiestie (but shadowed with all craftie and traitorous skill he had) some part of the conference and proceeding as well with the said Jesuits, and other ministers of the popes, as especiallie with one Thomas Morgan a fugitiue, residing at Paris, who aboue all others did perswade him to proceed in that most diuelish attempt (as is set downe in his voluntarie confession following) bearing hir maiestie notwithstanding in hand, that his onelie intent of proceeding so farre with the said Jesuits, and the popes ministers, tended to no other end, but to discouer the dangerous practises deuised and attempted against hir maiestie by hir disloiall subiects and other malicious persons in forren parts: albeit it hath since appeared most manifestlie, as well by his said confession, as by his dealing with one Edmund Neuill esquier, that his onelie intent of discouering the same, in sort as he craftilie and traitorouslie did, tended to no other end, but to make the waie the easier to accomplish his most diuelish and wicked purpose.

O papisticall dissimulation.

Thomas Morgan a fugitiue and furtherer of Parries purpose.

Edmund Neuill not ignorant of this attempt.

And although anie other prince but hir maiestie (who is loth to put on a hard censure of those that protest to be loiall, as Parrie did) would rather haue proceeded vnto the punishment of a subiect that had waded so farre, as by oth and bow to promise the taking awaie of hir life (as he vnto hir maiesties selfe did confesse) yet such was hir goodnesse, as in stead of punishing, she did deale so gratiouslie with him, as she suffered him not onelie to haue accesse vnto hir presence: but also manie times to haue priuat conference with hir, and did offer vnto him vpon opinion once conceiued of his fidelitie towards hir (as though his wicked pretense had beene, as he protested, for hir seruice) a most liberall pension. Besides, to the end that he might not grow hatefull to the good and well affected subiects of the realme (from whome he could in no sort haue escaped with safetie of his life, if his diuelish purpose had beene reuealed) hir maiestie did conceale the same, without communicating it to anie creature; vntill such time as he himselfe had opened the same vnto certeine of hir councell; and that it was also discouered that he sought to draw the said Neuill to haue beene a partie in his diuelish and most wicked purpose.

O gratious queene and too fauourable euen to thine enimies!

A verie rare example, and such as doth more set forth the singular goodnesse and bountie of hir maiesties princelie nature, than commend (if it be lawfull for a subiect to censure his souereigne) hir prouidence such as ought to be in a prince and person of hir maiesties wisdome and qualitie. And as the goodnesse of hir maiesties nature did hereby most manifestlie shew it selfe to be rare in so extraordinarie a case, and in a matter of so great perill vnto hir owne roiall person: so did the malice of Parrie most euidentlie appeare to be in the highest and extreamest degree, who notwithstanding the said extraordinarie grace and fauour extended towards him, did not or-lie persuade the said Neuill to be an associat in the said wicked enterprise: but did also verie vehementlie (as Neuill confesseth) importune him therein as an action lawfull, honourable, and meritorious, omitting nothing that might prouoke him to assent thereunto. But such was the singular goodnesse of almightie God (who euen from his maiesties cradle by manie euident arguments hath shewed himselfe his onelie and especiall protector) that he so wrought in Neuils heart, as he was moued to reueale the same vnto his maiestie, and for that purpose made choice of a faithfull gentleman and of good qualitie in the court, vnto whome vpon mondaie the eight of Februarie last past, he discouered at large all that had passed betweene Parrie and him, who immediatlie made it knowne to his maiestie. Whereupon his highnesse pleasure was, that Neuill should be examined by the earle of Leicester, and sir Christopher Hatton: who in the euening of the same daie did examine him, and he affirmed constantlie all which he had before declared to the said gentleman.

In the meane time, his maiestie continued his singular and most princelie magnanimitie, neither dismaied with the rarenesse of the accident, nor appalled with the horror of so villanous an enterprise, tending euen to the taking awaie of his most gratious life (a matter especiallie obserued by the councellor that was present at such time as Parrie after his returne did first discouer vnto his maiestie his wicked purpose; who found no other alteration in his countenance, than if he had imparted vnto him some matter of contentment) which sheweth manifestlie how he reposeth his confidence wholie in the defense of the almightie. And so his maiestie, following the wonted course of his singular clemencie, gaue order that Parrie the same mondaie in the euening (though not so knowne to him) should be sent vnto maister secretaries house in London, he being then there; who according vnto such direction as he receiued from his maiestie, did let him vnderstand, that his highnesse (in respect of the good will she knew he bare vnto the said Parrie, & of the trust that Parrie did outwardlie professe to repose in maister secretarie) had made especiall choice of him to deale with him in a matter that concerned his highlie, and that she doubted not, but that he would discharge his dutie towards his, according vnto that extraordinarie deuotion that he professed to beare vnto his.

And thereupon he told him that his maiestie had beene aduertised, that there was somewhat intended presentlie against his owne person, wherwith she thought he could not but be made acquainted, considering the great trust that some of his worst affected subiects reposed in him: and that his pleasure therefore was, that he should declare vnto him his knowledge therein: and whether the said Parrie himselfe had let fall anie speech vnto anie person (though with an intent onelie to haue discouered his disposition) that might draw him in suspicion, as though he himselfe had anie such wicked intent. But Parrie with great and vehement protestations denied it vtterlie. Whereupon maister secretarie, the rather to induce him to deale more plainelie in a matter so important, declared vnto him, that there was a gentleman of qualitie euerie waie as good or better than himselfe, and rather his friend than enimie, that would auouch it to his face: yet Parrie persisted stubbornelie in his former denial, and iustification of his owne innocencie, and would not in anie respect yeeld that he was partie or priuie to anie such motion, enterprise, or intent.

Being lodged that night at M. secretaries house, the next morning he desired earnestlie to haue some further speech with maister secretarie: which granted, Parrie declared to him that he had called to remembrance that he had once some speech with one Neuill a kinsman of his (so he called him) touching a point of doctrine contained in the answer made to the booke, intituled, The execution of iustice in England; by which booke it was resolued, that it was lawfull to take awaie the life of a prince, in furtherance of the catholike religion: but he protested that he neuer had anie speech at all of anie attempt intended against his maiesties person. Which denial of his (at two sundrie times after so much light giuen him) doth set forth most apparantlie both the iustice and prouidence of God: his iustice, for that (though he was one of a sharpe conceipt) he had no power to take hold of this ouerture, thereby to haue auoided the danger that Neuils accusation might bring him into by confessing the same, as a thing propounded onelie to feele Neuils mind, whome before he had reported vnto maister secretarie he found a person discontented, and therefore his confession might to verie great purpose haue serued to haue cleered himselfe touching the intent: his prouidence, for that of his great mercie he would not suffer so dangerous and wicked a member to escape and liue to his maiesties perill.

The same daie at night, Parrie was brought to the earle of Leicesters house, and there eftsoons examined before the said earle of Leicester, maister vicechamberlaine, and maister secretarie: he persisted still in his denial of all that he was charged with. Whereupon, Neuill being brought before him face to face, iustified his accusation against him. He notwithstanding would not yet yeeld to confesse it, but verie proudlie and insolentlie opposed his credit against the credit of Neuill, affirming that his no, was as good as Neuils yea, & as by way of recrimination, obiected the crime to Neuill himselfe. On the other side, Neuill did with great constancie affirme all that he had before said, and did set downe manie probable circumstances of the times, places, and maners of their sundrie conferences, and of such other accidents as had happened betweene them in the course of that action: whereupon Parrie was then committed to the Tower, and Neuill commanded by their honors to set downe in writing vnder his hand, all that which before he had deliuered by words: which he did with his owne hand as followeth.

Edmund Neuill his declaration the tenth of Februarie, 1584, subscribed with his owne hand.

WIlliam Parrie the last summer, some after his repulse in his suite for the maistership of saint Katharins, repaired to my lodging in the White friers, where he shewed himselfe a person greatlie discontented, and vehementlie inueighed against his maiestie, and willed me to assure my selfe, that during this time and state, I should neuer receiue contentment. But sith, said he, I know you to be honorablie descended, and a man of resolution, if you will giue me assurance, either to ioine with me, or not to discouer me, I will deliuer vnto you the onelie meanes to do your selfe good. Which when I had promised him, he appointed me to come the next daie to his house in Feuter lane: & repairing thither accordinglie, I found him in his bed; whereupon he commanded his men forth, and began with me in this order.

My lord said he (for so he called me) I protest before God, that three reasons principallie do induce me to enter into this action which I intend to discouer

Parrie is desirous to haue some speech with maister secretarie.

Parrie is examined before certeine lords of the councell, &c.

Neuill chargeth Parrie so precislie, that he is committed to the Tower.

Note the malicious humor of Parrie because he might not obteine preferment to his liking.

Neuill discouereth the intended treason against his maiestie.

Parrie is committed to the custodie & examination of sir Francis Walsingham.

Parrie denieth with protestations whatsoeuer is demanded of him.

A triple reaſon that moued Parrie to his pretended treaſon.

uer vnto you: the replanting of religion, the preferring of the Scotiſh title, and the aduancement of iuſtice, wonderfullie corrupted in this commonwealth. And therevpon entred into ſome diſcourſes, what places were fit to be taken to giue entrance to ſuch forren forces as ſhould be beſt liked of, for the furtherance of ſuch enterpriſes as were to be vndertaken. And with theſe diſcourſes he paſſed the time, vntill he went to dinner: after which, the companie being retired, he entered into his former diſcourſes. And if I be not deceiued (ſaid he) by taking of Quinborough caſtell, we ſhall hinder the paſſage of the queenes ſhips forth of the riuer. Wherevnto when he ſaw me vſe no contradiction, he ſhooke me by the hand. Tuſh (ſaid he) this is nothing: if men were reſolute, there is an enterpriſe of much more moment, and much eaſier to performe: an act honorable, and meritorious to God and the world. Which ſeeing me deſirous to know, he was not aſhamed to vtter in plaine termes, to conſiſt in killing of hir maieſtie: wherein, ſaith he, if you will go with me, I will loſe my life, or deliuer my countrie from hir bad and tyrannous gouernment. At which ſpeeches finding me diſcontented, he aſked me if I had read doctor Allens booke, out of which he alledged an authoritie for it. I anſwered, no, and that I did not beleeue that authoritie. Well (ſaid he) what will you ſaie, if I ſhew further authoritie than this, euen from Rome it ſelfe, a plaine diſpenſation for the killing of hir, wherein you ſhall find it (as I ſaid before) meritorious? God couſine ſaid I, when you ſhall ſhew it me, I ſhall thinke it verie ſtrange, when I ſhall ſee one to hold that for meritorious, which another holdeth for damnable. Well, ſaid Parrie, do me but the fauour to thinke vpon it till to morrow: and if one man be in the towne, I will not faile to ſhew you the thing it ſelfe: and if he be not, he will be within theſe fiue or ſix daies; at which time if it pleaſe you to meete me at Chanon row, we may there receiue the ſacrament to be true ech to other, and then I will diſcouer vnto you both the partie, & the thing it ſelfe. Wherevpon I praied Parrie to thinke better vpon it, as a matter of great charge both of ſoule and bodie. I would to God, ſaid Parrie, you were as perfectlie perſuaded in it as I am! for then vndoubtedlie you ſhould do God great ſeruice.

Parrie counted it an act meritorious to murther hir maieſtie.

O villanous perſuaſion or inducement to be acceſſarie to the treaſon!

Not long after eight or ten daies (as I remember) Parrie comming to viſit me at my lodging in Yerns rents in Holborne, as he often vſed, we walked forth into the fields, where he renewed againe his determination to kill hir maieſtie, whom he ſaid he thought moſt vnworthie to liue, and that he wondered I was ſo ſcrupulous therein. She hath ſought, ſaid he, your ruine and ouerthrow, why ſhould you not then ſeeke to reuenge it? I confeſſe (quoth I) that my caſe is hard, but yet am I not ſo deſperat as to reuenge it vpon my ſelfe, which muſt needs be the euent of ſo vnhoneſt and vnpoſſible an enterpriſe. Unpoſſible, ſaid Parrie! I wonder at you, for in truth there is not anie thing more eaſie: you are no courtier, and therefore know not hir cuſtomes of walking with ſmall traine, and often in the garden verie priuatlie, at which time my ſelfe may eaſilie haue acceſſe vnto hir, and you alſo when you are knowen in court. Upon the fact we muſt haue a barge readie to carie vs with ſpeed downe the riuer, where we will haue a ſhip readie to tranſport vs if it be needfull: but vpon my head, we ſhall neuer be followed ſo far. I aſked him; How will you eſcape forth of the garden? For you ſhall not be permitted to carie anie men with you, and the gates will then be locked, neither can you carie a dag without ſuſpicion. As for a dag (ſaid Parrie) I care not: my dagger is enough. And as for mine eſcaping, thoſe that ſhall be with hir, will be ſo buſie about hir, as I ſhall find opportunitie enough to eſcape, if you be there readie with the barge to receiue me.

Note Parries peſtilent humor of malice againſt hir maieſtie.

These doubts were of aduantage to Newill, but meanes of reprochfull ruine to Parrie.

But if this ſeeme dangerous in reſpect of your reaſon before ſhewed, let it then reſt till hir comming to ſaint James, and let vs furniſh our ſelues in the meane time with men and horſſe fit for the purpoſe: may ech of vs keepe eight or ten men without ſuſpicion? And for my part, ſaid he, I ſhall find good fellowes that will follow me without ſuſpecting mine intent. It is much, ſaid he, that ſo manie reſolute men make do vpon the ſudden, being well appointed with ech his caſe of dags: if they were an hundred waiting vpon hir, they were not able to ſaue hir, you comming on the one ſide, and I on the other, and diſcharging our dags vpon hir, it were vnhappie if we ſhould both miſſe hir. But if our dags faile, I ſhall beſtirre me well with a ſword yer ſhe eſcape me. Wherevnto I ſaid: God doctor giue ouer this odious enterpriſe, & trouble me no more with the hearing of that, which in heart I loth ſo much. I would to God the enterpriſe were honeſt, that I might make knowne vnto thee whether I want reſolution! And not long after, hir maieſtie came to ſaint James, after which, one morning (the daie certeine I remember not) Parrie reuiued againe his former diſcourſe of killing hir maieſtie, with great earneſtneſſe and importunitie perſuading me to ioine therein: ſaieng he thought me the onelie man of England like to performe it, in reſpect of my balure, as he termed it.

Note the treaſonous practiſe of Parrie laid downe in order as it ſhould haue beene done.

Parrie ſueth for licence to trauell beyond ſea, and obteineth it.

Wherevpon I made ſemblance as if I had beene more willing to heare him than before, hoping by that means to cauſe him to deliuer his mind to ſome other that might be witneſſe thereof with me, wherein neuertheleſſe I failed. After all this, on ſaturdaie laſt being the firſt of Februarie, betweene the houres of fiue and ſix in the afternoone, Parrie came to my chamber, and deſired to talke with me apart, wherevpon we drew our ſelues to a windowe. And where I had told Parrie before, that a learned man whom I met by chance in the fields, vnto whom I propoſed the queſtion touching hir maieſtie, had anſwered me that it was an enterpriſe moſt villanous and damnable, willing me to diſcharge my ſelfe of it: Parrie then deſired to know that learned mans name, and what was become of him, ſaieng after a ſcornefull maner; No doubt he was a verie wiſe man, and you wiſer in beleeuing him: ſaid further, I hope you told him not that I had anie thing from Rome. Yes in truth, ſaid I. Wherevnto Parrie ſaid, I would you had not named me, nor ſpoken of anie thing I had from Rome! And therevpon he earneſtlie perſuaded me eftſoones to depart beyond the ſeas, promiſing to procure me ſafe paſſage into Wales, and from thenſe into Britaine, whereat we ended. But I then reſolued not to do ſo, but to diſcharge my conſcience, and laie open this his moſt traitorous and abhominable intention againſt hir maieſtie: which I reuealed in ſort as is before ſet downe.

Marke the reſolutenes of Parrie to accompliſh his treaſon by oft frequenting the action.

Newill is reſolued at no hand to be partaker with Parrie in his treaſon.

Edmund Newill.

Parrie is reſolued in the plot of his treacherous deuiſe.

After this confeſſion of Edmund Newill, William Parrie the eleuenth daie of Februarie laſt, being examined in the Tower of London, by the lord Hunſdon lord gouernour of Berwike, ſir Chriſtopher Hatton knight vicechamberleine to hir maieſtie, and Francis Walſingham knight principall ſecretarie to hir maieſtie, did voluntarilie and without anie conſtraint, by word of mouth make confeſſion of his ſaid treaſon, and after ſet it downe in writing all with his owne hand in his lodging in the Tower, and ſent it to the court the thirteenth of the ſame, by the lieutenant of the Tower. Parries voluntarie confession in the hearing of certein lords, &c.

IN the yeare 1570 I was sworne hir maiesties seruant, from which time vntill the yeare 1580, I serued, honored, and loued hir with as great readinesse, deuotion and assurance as ante pore subiect in England. In the end of that yeare, and vntill Midsummer 1582, I had some trouble for the hurting of a gentleman of the Temple. In which action I was so disgraced and oppressed by two great men (to whome I haue of late beene beholden) that I neuer had contented thought since. There began my misfortune, and here followeth my wofull fall. In Julie after, I laboured for licence to trauell for three yeares, which (vpon some consideration) was easilie obteined. And so in August, I went ouer with doubtfull mind of returne, for that being suspected in religion, and not hauing receiued the communion in two and twentie yeares, I began to mistrust my aduancement in England. In September I came to Paris, where I was reconciled to the church, and aduised to liue without scandale, the rather for that it was mistrusted by the English catholikes, that I had intelligence with the greatest councellour of England. I staied not long there, but remoued to Lions (a place of great traffike) where, bicause it was the ordinarie passage of our nation to and fro betweene Paris and Rome, I was also suspected.

Iuelche, good and gratious lord, whose hard hap it was to intertaine so bad & graceles a seruant.

Parrie sueth for licence to trauell beyond sea, and obteineth it.

Parrie inclineth himselfe in religion before the inquisitor of Millaine.

To put all men out of doubt of me, and for some other cause, I went to Millaine, from whense as a place of some danger (though I found fauour there) after I had cléered my conscience, and iustified my selfe in religion before the inquisitor, I went to Uenice. There I came acquainted with father Benedicto Palmio, a graue and a learned Iesuit. By conference with him of the hard state of the catholikes in England, & by reading of the booke De persecutione Anglicana, and other discourses of like argument, 1 I conceiued a possible meane to relieue the afflicted state of our catholikes, if the same might be well warranted in religion and conscience by the pope, or some learned diuines. I asked his opinion, he made it cléere, commended my deuotion, comforted me in it, and after a while made me knowen to the Nuntio Campeggio, there resident for his holinesse. By his meanes I wrote vnto the pope, presented the seruice, and sued for a pasport to go to Rome, and to returne safelie into France. Answer came from cardinall Como, that I might come, and should be welcome. I misliked the warrant, sued for a better, which I was promised: but it came not before my departure to Lions, where I promised to staie some time for it.

Parrie is resolued in the plot of his treacherous deuise.

And being indéed desirous to go to Rome, and loth to go without countenance, I desired Chriſtofero de Salazar, secretarie to the king catholike in Uenice, who had some vnderstanding (by conference) of my deuotion to the afflicted catholikes at home and abroad, to commend me to the duke di Noua terra gouernour of Millaine, and to the countie of Miuaris Embi, then resident for the king his master in Rome: which he promised to do effectuallie for the one, and did for the other. And so I toke my iournie towards Lions, whither came for me an ample pasport (but somewhat too late) that I might come & go In verbo pontificis per omnes iurisdictiones ecclesiasticas, absq; impedimento. I acquainted some good fathers there of my necessitie to depart towards Paris by promise, & praied their aduises vpon diuerse points, wherein I was well satisfied. And so assuring them that his holinesse should heare from me shortlie, it was vndertaken that I should be excused for that time.

In October I came to Paris, where (vpon better opinion conceiued of me amongst my catholike countriemen) I found my credit well setled, and such as mistrusted me before, readie to trust and imbrace me. And being one daie at the chamber of Thomas Morgan a catholike gentleman (greatlie beloued and trusted on that side) amongst other gentlemen, talking (but in verie good sort) of England, I was desired by Morgan to go vp with him to another chamber, where he brake with me, and told me that it was hoped and loked for, that I should do some seruice for God and his church. I answered him I would do it, if it were to kill the greatest subiect in England: whom I named, and in truth then hated. No no, said he, let him liue to his greater fall and ruine of his house: 2 it is the quéene I meane. I had him as I wished, and told him it were some done, if it might be lawfullie done, and warranted in the opinion of some learned diuines. And so the doubt once resolued (though as you haue heard I was before reasonablie well satisfied) I vowed to vndertake the enterprise, for the restitution of England to the ancient obedience of the sée apostolike. Diuers diuines were named, doctor Allen I desired, Parsons I refused. And by chance came maister Wats a learned priest, with whome I conferred, and was ouerruled.

Note the discreet conference betweene Morgan and Parrie.

Parrie boweth to vndertake the killing of the quéene.

3 For he plainelie pronounced (the case onelie altered in name) that it was vtterlie vnlawfull: with whome manie English priests did agrée as I haue heard, if it be not altered, since the booke made in answer of the execution of the English iustice was published, which I must confesse hath taken hard hold in me, and (I feare me) will do in others, if it be not preuented by more gratious handling of the quiet and obedient catholike subiects, whereof there is *good and greater store in England than this age will extinguish. Well, notwithstanding all these doubts, I was gone so far by letters and conference in Italie, that I could not go backe, but promised faithfullie to performe the enterprise, if his holinesse vpon my offer & letters would allow it, & grant me full remission of my sinnes. 4 I wrote my letters the first of Januarie 1584, by their computation, toke aduise vpon them in confession of father Aniball a Codreto a learned Iesuit in Paris, was louinglie imbraced, commended, confessed, and communicated at the Iesuits at one altar with the cardinals of Mandolmi and Marbone: whereof I praied certificat, and inclosed the same in my letter to his holines, to lead him the rather to absolue me, which I required by my letters, in consideration of so great an enterprise vndertaken without promise or reward.

*O Lord what a lamentable hearing is this!

Parrie is now become altogither past grace, and growne resolute with Iudas to kill the Lords anointed.

5 I went with Morgan to the Nuntio Ragazzoni, to whome I read the letter and certificat inclosed, sealed it, & left it with him to send to Rome: he promised great care of it, and to procure answer; and so louinglie imbraced me, wished mee good spéed, and promised that I should be remembred at the altar.

6 After this I desired Morgan, that some speciall man might be made priuie to this matter, least he dieng, and I miscarieng in the execution, and my intent neuer trulie discouered, it might sticke for an euerlasting spot in my race. Diuerse were named, but none agréed vpon for feare of bewraieng.

A promise for a Scotish inuasiõ after the deuise of Parrie executed.

7 This being donne, Morgan assured me, that shortlie after my departure, the L. Fernehurst (then in Paris) should go into Scotland, and be readie vpon the first newes of the quæns fall, to enter into England with 20 or 30000 men to defend the quæne of Scotland (whom, and the king hir sonne, I do in my conscience acquit of anie priuitie, liking, or consent to this, or anie other bad action, for anie thing that euer I did know.)

I shortlie departed for England, and arriued at Rie in Januarie 1583, from whense I wrote to the court, aduertised some, that I had a speciall seruice to discouer to the quéens maiestie. 8 Which I did more to prepare accesse and credit, than for anie care I had of hir person, though I were fullie resolued neuer to touch hir (notwithstanding anie warrant) if by anie deuise, persuasion, or policie she might be wrought to deale more gratiouslie with the catholikes than she doth, or by our maner of proceéding in parlement meaneth to do, for anie thing yet seene. I came to the court (then at Whitehall) praied audience, had it at large, and verie priuatlie discouered to hir maiestie this conspiracie, much to this effect, though couered with all the skill I had: she tooke it doubtfullie, I departed with feare. And amongst other things, I cannot forget hir maiesties gratious speech then uttered touching the catholikes, which of late, after a sort I auowed in parlement: she said vnto me that neuer a catholike should be troubled for religion or superstasie, so long as they liued like good subiects. Whereby I mistrusted that hir maiestie is borne in hand, that none is troubled for the one or the other. It may be trulie said that it is better than it hath béene, though it be not yet as it should be.

Note the villans ill mind to hir maiestie.

Note hir maiesties vndeserued gratiousnes to pretended catholikes.

In March last, while I was at Grénewich (as I remember) suing for saint Katharines, came letters to me from cardinall Como, dated at Rome the last of Januarie before, whereby I found the enterprise commended, and allowed, and my selfe absolued (in his holinesse name) of all my sinnes, and willed to go forward in the name of God. That letter I shewed to some in court, who imparted it to the quéene: what it wrought, or maie worke in hir maiestie, God knoweth: onelie this I know, 9 That it confirmed my resolution to kill hir, and made it cléere in my conscience, that it was lawfull and meritorious. And yet was I determined neuer to do it, if either policie, practise, persuasion, or motion in parlement could preuaile. I feared to be tempted, and therefore alwaies when I came neere hir, I left my dagger at home. 10 When I looked vpon hir maiestie, & remembred hir manie excellencies, I was greatlie troubled: and yet I saw no remedie, for my vowes were in heauen, my letters and promises in earth, and the case of the catholike recusants and others little bettered.

Note Parries resolution by letters from cardinall Como.

Parrie is in a mammering what to do as maie be noted by these speéches interrogatorie.

Sometimes I said to my selfe: Why should I care for hir? What hath she done for me? Haue I not spent ten thousand markes since I knew hir seruice, and neuer had penie by hir? It maie be said, she gaue me my life. But I saie (as my case stood) it had béene tyrannie to take it: and I feare me it is little lesse yet. If it please hir gratiouslie to looke into my discontentments, would to Jesus Christ she had it, for I am wearie of it. And now to come to an end of this tragicall discourse. In Julie I left the court, vtterlie reiected, discontented, and as hir maiestie might perceiue by my passionate letters, careless of my selfe. I came to London: doctor Allens booke was sent me out of France: 11 It redoubled my former conceipts, euerie word in it was a warrant to a prepared mind. It taught that kings maie be excommunicated, deprriued, and violentlie handled. It prooueth that all warres ciuill or forren, vndertaken for religion, is honourable. Hir maiestie maie do well to read it, and to be out of doubt (if things be not amended) that it is a warning, and a doctrine full dangerous. This is the booke I shewed, in some places read, and lent to my cousine Neuill (the accuser) who came often to mine house, put his finger in my dish, his hand in my purse, and the night wherein he accused me, was wrapped in my gowne, six moneths at least after we had entered into this conspiracie: in which space hir maiestie, and ten princes in seuerall prouinces might haue béene killed. God blesse hir maiestie from him: for before almightie God I lie and am glad in my soule, that it was his hap to discouer me in time, though there were no danger neere.

How long the conspiracie was in handling yer it was detected.

Parrie hath great feare of death.

Parrie desperat.

And now to the matter of our méetings. He came to me in the beginning of August, and spake to me in this or the like sort: Cousine, let vs do somewhat, sith we can haue nothing. I offered to ioine with him, and gladlie heard him, hoping because I knew him to be a catholike, that he would hit vpon that I had in my head: but it fell not out so. He thought the deliuerie of the quéene of Scotland easie, presuming vpon his credit and kinred in the North: I thought it dangerous to hir, and impossible to men of our fortunes. He fell from that to the taking of Berwike: I spake of Quinborough and the naule, rather to interteine him with discourse, than that I cared for those motions, my head being full of greater matter. 12 I told him that I had an other maner of enterprise, more honourable and profitable vnto vs, and the catholikes commonwealth, than all these, if he would ioine in it with me, as he presentlie vowed to do. He pressed to know it, I willed him to sleepe vpon the motion: he did so, and (belike ouertaken) came vnto me the next morning to my lodging in London, offered to ioine with me, and tooke his oth vpon a bible, to conceale and constantlie to pursue the enterprise for the aduancement of religion: which I also did, and meant to performe: the killing of the quéene was the matter.

Note the actions that should haue béene commensed and finished in this conspiracie.

This oth and all of the like qualitie and nature are violable Saluo interim anima.

The maner and place, to be on horsebacke, with eight or ten horses, when she should ride abroad about saint James, or some other like place. It was once thought fit in a garden, and that the escape would be easiest by water into Shepeie, or some other part: but we resolued vpon the first. This continued as agréed vpon manie moneths, till he heard of the death of Westmerland, whose land and dignitie (whereof he assured himselfe) bred belike this conscience in him to discouer a treason in Februarie, contriued and agréed vpon in August. If it cost him not an ambitious head at last, let him neuer trust me. He brought a tall gentleman (whome he commended for an excellent pistolier) to me to Chanon Row, to make one in the match: but I refused to deale with him, being loth to laie my head vpon so manie hands.

The death of Westmerland reported.

Parrie chargeth Neuill with grieuous speeches of cursed disloialtie.

M. Neuill hath (I thinke) forgotten, that he did sweare to me at diuerse times, that all the aduancement she could giue, should serue but for his scourge, if euer time and occasion should serue: and that although he would not laie hand vpon hir in a corner, his hart serued him to strike off hir head in the field. Now leauing him to himselfe, thus much (to make an end) I must confesse of my sele: I did meane to trie what might be done in parlement, to do my best to hinder all hard courses, to haue praied hearing

ring of the quenes maiestie, to moue hir (if I could) to take compassion vpon hir catholike subiects, and when all had failed, to do as I intended. If hir maiestie by this course would haue eased them, though she had neuer preferred me, I had with all comfort and patience borne it: 13 but if she had preferred me without ease or care of them, the enterprise had held. ¶ God preserue the quéene, & incline hir mercifull hart to forgiue me this desperat purpose, and to take my head (with all my part) for hir better satisfaction.

W. Parrie.

God (no doubt) will preserue good queene Elisabeth, though a thousand such traitors as Parrie conspire hir death to their owne destruction.

After which, for the better manifesting of his treasons, on the fourteenth of Februarie last past, there was a letter written by him to hir maiestie, verie voluntarilie, all of his owne hand, without anie motion made to him. The tenor whereof, for that which concerneth these his traitorous dealings, is as followeth.

A letter written by Parrie to hir maiestie.

YOur maiestie maie see by my voluntarie confession, the dangerous fruits of a discontented mind: & how constantlie I pursued my first conceiued purpose in Venice, for the releefe of the afflicted catholikes, continued it in Lions, and resolued in Paris to put it in aduenture, for the restitution of England to the ancient obedience of the see apostolike. You maie see withall how it is commended, allowed, and warranted in conscience, diuinitie, and policie, by the pope and some great diuines: though it be true or likelie, that most of our English diuines (lesse practised in matters of this weight) do vtterlie mislike and condemne it.

Parries purpose conceiued in Venice, continued in Lions, resolued in Paris, to be executed in England.

Note the actions that should haue béene commensed and finished in this conspiracie.

The enterprise is preuented, and conspiracie discouered, by an honourable gentleman my kinsman, and late familiar friend, maister Edmund Neuill, priuie and by solemne oth (taken vpon the bible) partie to the matter, wherof I am hardlie glad, but now sorie (in my verie soule) that euer I conceiued or intended it, how commendable or meritorious so euer I thought it. God thanke him, and forgiue me, who would not now (before God) attempt it (if I had libertie and oportunitie to do it) to gaine your kingdome. I beseech Christ that my death and example maie as well satisfie your maiestie, and the world, as it shall glad and content me.

Neuill charged by Parrie to be accessarie to the treason.

This oth and all of the like qualitie and nature are violable Salua interim anima.

The queene of Scotland is your prisoner, let hir be honourablie intreated, but yet surelie garded. The French king is French, you know it well enough, you will find him occupied when he should do you good; he will not loose a pilgrimage to saue you a crowne. I haue no more to saie at this time, but that with my hart & soule I do now honour & loue you, am inwardlie sorie for mine offense, and readie to make you amends by my death and patience. Discharge me A culpa but not A pœna, good ladie. And so farewell, most gratious and the best natured and qualified queene that euer liued in England. From the Tower, the fourteenth of Februarie, one thousand fiue hundred eightie and foure.

W. Parrie.

Compare this warnings with the euents in Anno 1585, 1586, specialllie about Ingall.

The death of Westmerland repozted.

After which, to wit, the eighteenth of Februarie last past, Parrie, in further acknowledging his wicked and intended treasons, wrote a letter all of his owne hand in like voluntarie maner to the lord treasuror of England, and the earle of Leicester, lord steward of hir maiesties house, the tenor wherof is as followeth.

Parrie chargeth Neuill with grieuous speeches of cursed disloialtie.

Parries guilte conscience reuealeth it selfe by voluntarie confession.

William Parries letter to the lord treasuror, and the earle of Leicester.

MY lords, now that the conspiracie is discouered, the fault confessed, my conscience cleared, and mind prepared patientlie to suffer the paines due for so hainous a crime; I hope it shall not offend you, if crieng Miserere with the poore publicane, I leaue to despaire with cursed Caine. My case is rare and strange, and for anie thing I can remember, singular: a naturall subiect solemnlie to vow the death of his naturall queene (so borne, so knowne, and so taken by all men) for the releefe of the afflicted catholikes, and restitution of religion. The matter first conceiued in Venice, the seruice (in generall words) presented to the pope, continued and vndertaken in Paris, and lastlie commended and warranted by his holinesse, digested and resolued in England, if it had not beene preuented by accusation, or by hir maiesties greater lenitie and more gratious vsage of hir catholike subiects.

A traitor of singular note by his owne confession was Parrie.

This is my first and last offense conceiued against my prince or countrie, and doth (I cannot denie) conteine all other faults whatsoeuer. It is now to be punished by death, or most gratiouslie (beyond all common expectation) to be pardoned. Death I do confesse to haue deserued; life I do (with all humilitie) craue, if it may stand with the queenes honor, and policie of the time. To leaue so great a treason vnpunished were strange; to drawe it by death in example were dangerous; a sworne seruant to take vpon him such an enterprise vpon such a ground, and by such a warrant, hath not beene seene in England; to indict him, arreigne him, bring him to the scaffold, and to publish his offense, can do no good; to hope that he hath more to discouer than is confessed, or that at his execution he will vnsaie anie thing he hath written, is in vaine; to conclude, that it is impossible for him in time to make some part of amends, were verie hard, and against former experience.

An offense sufficient to hang 1000 traitors without drop of mercie.

Parrie had more gloring rhetorike than faithfull obedience.

The question then is, whether it be better to kill him, or (least the matter be mistaken) vpon hope of his amendment to pardon him. For mine owne opinion (though parciall) I will deliuer you my conscience. The case is good queene Elisabeths, the offense is committed against hir sacred person, and she may (of hir mercie) pardon it without preiudice to anie. Then this I say in few words, as a man more desirous to discharge his troubled conscience, than to liue: Pardon poore Parrie and releeue him; for life without liuing is not fit for him. If this may not be, or be thought dangerous, or dishonorable to the queenes maiestie (as by your fauors, I thinke it full of honor and mercie) then I beseech your lordships (and no other) once to heare me before I be indicted, and afterwards (if I must die) humblie to intreat the queenes maiestie to hasten my triall and execution: which I praie God (with all my heart) may prooue as honorable to hir, as I hope it shall be happie to me, who will while I liue (as I haue doone alwaies) praie to Iesus Christ for hir maiesties long and prosperous reigne. From the Tower the eighteenth of Februarie, 1584. W. Parrie.

God Lord with what heart might Parrie hope after anie thing but death, hauing béene so capitall a traitor?

And where in this meane time sir Francis Walsingham secretarie to hir maiestie, had dealt with one William Creitchton, a Scot for his birth, and a Iesuit by his profession, now prisoner also in the Tower, for that he was apprehended with diuerse plots for inuasions of this realme, to vnderstand of him, if the said Parrie had euer dealt with him in the parties beyond the seas touching that Creitchton apprehended with diuerse plots for inuasions of this realme.

queſtion, whether it were lawfull to kill hir maieſtie or not. The which at that time the ſaid Creitchton called not to his remembrance: yet after vpon better calling it to mind, vpon the twentith date of Februarie laſt paſt, he wrote vnto maiſter ſecretarie Walſingham thereof voluntarilie, all of his owne hand, to the effect following.

William Creitchtons letter to ſir Francis Walſingham, Febr. 20.

Right honorable ſir, when your honor demanded me if maiſter Parrie did aske me, if it were leaſon to kill the queene; in deed and veritie, then I had no remembrance at all thereof. But ſince, thinking on the matter, I haue called to mind the whole faſhion of his dealing with me, and ſome of his arguments: for he dealt verie craftilie with me, I dare not ſay maliciouſlie. For I did in no wiſe thinke of anie ſuch deſeine of his, or of anie other, and did anſwer him ſimplie after my conſcience and knowledge to the veritie of the queſtion. For after that I had anſwered him twiſe before, Quòd omninò non liceret; he returned late at euen by reaſon I was to depart earlie in the next morning toward Chamberie in Sauoie where I did remaine, and being returned out of the cloſſe within one of the claſſes of the college, he proponed to me of new the matter, with his reaſons and arguments.

Note Creitchtons report of Parries craft and malice.

Creitchtons reaſons to repell Parries traitorous allegations.

First he alleged the vtilitie of the deed for deliuering of ſo manie catholikes out of miſerie, and reſtitution of the catholike religion. I anſwered, that the ſcripture anſwereth thereto, ſaieng: Non ſunt facienda mala, vt veniant bona. So that for no good, how great that euer it be, may be wrought anie euill, how little that euer it be. He replied that it was not euill to take awaie ſo great euill, and induce ſo great good. I anſwered, that all good is not to be doone, but that onelie: Quòd bene & legitimè fieri poteſt. And therefore, dixi Deum magis amare aduerbia, quàm nomina. Quia in actionibus magis ei placent bene & legitimè, quàm bonum. Ita vt nullum bonum liceat facere, niſi bene & legitimè fieri poſſit. Quòd in hoc caſu fieri non poteſt. Yet ſaid he, that ſeuerall learned men were of the opinion, Quòd liceret. I anſwered, that they men perhaps were of the opinion, that for the ſafetie of manie in ſoule and bodie, they would permit a particular to his danger, & to the occult iudgement of God: or perhaps ſaid ſo, moued rather by ſome compaſſion and commiſeration of the miſerable eſtate of the catholikes, nor for anie ſuch doctrine that they did find in their bookes. For it is certeine, that ſuch a thing is not licit to a particular, without ſpeciall reuelation diuine, which exceedeth our learning and doctrine. And ſo he departed from me. Out of the priſon in the Tower, the 20 of Februarie.

Deum magis amare aduerbia quàm nomina.

Your honors poore ſeruitor in Chriſt Jeſu, W. Creitchton priſoner.

Creitchton holdeth Parries attempt vnlawfull: note.

Parrie faith and vnfaith like a traitor to ſhift off the heauie charge of treaſon.

And where alſo the ſame Parrie was on the ſame twentith date of Februarie examined by ſir Francis Walſingham knight, what was become of the letter conteined in his confeſſion to be written vnto him by the cardinall de Como: he then anſwered, that it was conſumed and burnt. And yet after, the next date following, being more vehementlie vrged vpon that point in examination (becauſe it was knowne that it was not burnt) he confeſſed where he had left it in the towne: whereupon, by Parries direction it was ſent for, where it had beene lapped vp togither with other friuolous papers, and written vpon the one ſide of it; The laſt will of William Parrie. The which letter was in the Italian tong as hereafter followeth, with the ſame in Engliſh accordinglie tranſlated.

Parrie conuented, and arreigned at Weſtminſter hall the 25 of Februarie.

Vpon all which former accuſation, declaration, confeſſions and proofes, vpon mondaie the two and twentith date of Februarie laſt paſt, at Weſtminſter hall, before ſir Chriſtopher Wraie knight chiefe iuſtice of England, ſir Gilbert Gerrard knight maſter of the rolles, ſir Edmund Anderſon knight chiefe iuſtice of the common plées, ſir Roger Manwood knight chiefe baron of the exchekar, ſir Thomas Gawdie knight one of the iuſtices of the plees before hir maieſtie to be holden, & William Periam one of the iuſtices of the common plées, by vertue of hir maieſties commiſſion to them and others in that behalfe directed: the ſame Parrie was indicted of high treaſon, for intending and practiſing the death and deſtruction of hir maieſtie, whome God long proſper, and preſerue from all ſuch wicked attempts. The tenor of which indictment appeareth more particularlie in the courſe of his arreignment following.

minster, in the place where the court commonlie called the Kings bench is vsuallie kept by vertue of hir maiesties commission of oier and terminer, before Henrie lord Hunsdon gouernour of Barwike, sir Francis Knolles knight treasuror of the queenes maiesties houshold, sir Iames Croft knight comptrollor of the same houshold, sir Christopher Hatton knight vicechamberleine to hir maiestie, sir Christopher Wraie knight chiefe iustice of England, sir Gilbert Gerrard knight master of the rols, sir Edmund Anderson knight chiefe iustice of the common plees, sir Roger Manwood knight chiefe baron of the excheker, and sir Thomas Hennage knight treasuror of the chamber.

Act and processe as had touchāt of Parrie arraigned.

The lieutenant of the tower returneth his precept.

FIrst three proclamations for silence were made, according to the vsuall course in such cases. Then the lieutenant was commanded to returne his precept, who did so, and brought the prisoner to the bar, to whome Miles Sands esquier clerke of the crowne said; William Parrie hold vp thy hand: and he did so. Then said the clerke of the crowne; Thou art here indicted by the oths of twelue good and lawfull men of the countie of Midleser, before sir Christopher Wraie knight and others, which tooke the indicment by the name of W. Parrie, late of London gentleman, otherwise called W. Parris, late of London doctor of the law, for that thou as a false traitor against the most noble and christian prince, quéene Elisabeth thy most gratious souereigne and liege ladie, not hauing the feare of God before thine eies, nor regarding thy due allegiance (but being seduced by the instigation of the diuell, and intending to withdraw and extinguish the hartie loue and due obedience, which true & faithfull subiects should beare vnto the same our souereigne ladie) diddest at Westminster in the countie of Midleser on the first daie of Februarie, in the six and twentith yeare of hir highnesse reigne, and at diuerse other times and places in the same countie, maliciouslie, and traitorouslie conspire and compasse, not onelie to depriue and depose the same our souereigne ladie of hir roiall estate, title and dignitie; but also to bring hir highnesse to death and finall destruction, and sedition in the realme to make, and the gouernement thereof to subuert, and the sincere religion of God established in hir highnesse dominions to alter and supplant.

The indictment against Parrie wherein his heinous treason appeareth.

A god cleaning in the meane time that allow treasons in this sort.

*God spirit, nate malignāt spirit & more than diabolicall.

*Nate cursed and abhominable purposes, with destruction to the vndertaker.

Parrie sent letters to Gregorie the 13 bishop of Rome: and what was the scope of them.

And that, whereas thou William Parrie, by thy letters sent vnto Gregorie bishop of Rome, diddest signifie vnto the same bishop thy purposes and intentions aforesaid, and thereby diddest praie and require the same bishop to giue thée absolution; that thou afterwards, that is to saie, the last day of March in the six and twentith yeare aforesaid, diddest traitorouslie receiue letters from one called cardinall de Como, directed vnto thée William Parrie, whereby the same cardinall did signifie vnto thée, that the bishop of Rome had perused thy letters, and allowed of thine intent; and that to that end he had absolued thée of all thy sinnes, and by the same letter did animate and stir thée to proceed with thine enterprise; and that thereupon, thou, the last daie of August in the six and twentith yeare aforesaid, at saint Giles in the fields, in the same countie of Midleser, diddest traitorouslie confer with one Edmund Neuill esquier, vttering to him all thy wicked and traitorous deuises, and then and there diddest moue him to assist thée therein, and to ioine with thée in those wicked treasons aforesaid, against the peace of our said souereigne ladie the queene, hir crowne and dignitie. What saiest thou William Parrie, art thou guiltie of these treasons whereof thou standest here indicted, or not guiltie?

Parrie moueth Neuill to aid him in his treasons.

Then Parrie said; Before I plead not guiltie, or confesse my selfe guiltie, I praie you giue me leaue to speake a few words: and with humbling himselfe began in this maner. God saue quéene Elisabeth, & God send me grace to discharge my dutie to hir, and to send you home in charitie. But touching the matters that I am indicted of, some were in one place, and some in another, and done so secretlie, as none can sée into them, except that they had eies like vnto God: wherefore I will not laie my blood vpon the iurie, but doo mind to confesse the indictment. It conteineth but the parts that haue béene openlie read, I praie you tell me. Whervnto it was answered, that the indictment conteined the parts he had heard read, & no other. Whervpon the clerke of the crowne said vnto Parrie; Parrie, thou must answer directlie to the indictment, whether thou be guiltie or not.

Parries answer to the indictment, wherein he confesseth it.

Then said Parrie, I doo confesse that I am guiltie of all that is therein conteined: and further to, I desire not life, but desire to die. Vnto which the clerke of the crowne said; If you confesse it, you must confesse it in maner and forme as it is comprised in the indictment. Wherevnto he said; I doo confesse it in maner and forme as the same is set downe, and all the circumstances thereof. Then the confession being recorded, the quéenes learned councell being readie to praie iudgement vpon the same confession, master vicechamberleine said: These matters conteined in this indictment, and confessed by this man, are of great importance; they touch the person of the quéenes most excellent maiestie in the highest degrée, the verie state and weldoing of the whole commonwealth, and the truth of Gods word established in these hir maiesties dominions, and the open demonstration of that capitall enuie of the man of Rome, that hath set himselfe against God and all godlinesse, all good princes and good gouernement, and against good men. Wherefore I praie you for the satisfaction of this great multitude, let the whole matter appéere, that euerie one may sée that the matter of it selfe is as bad as the indictment purporteth, and as he hath confessed.

Parrie confesseth that he is guiltie of all things conteined in the indictment.

Sir Christopher Hattons collection out of Parries indictment.

Whereto in respect that the iustice of the realme hath béene of late verie impudentlie slandered, all yealded as a thing necessarie to satisfie the world in particular, of that which was but summarilie comprised in the indictment, though in the law, his confession serued sufficientlie to haue proceeded thervpon vnto iudgement. Whervpon the lords and others the commissioners, hir maiesties lerned councell, and Parrie himselfe agréed, that Parries confession (taken the eleuenth and thirtenth of Februarie 1584, before the lord of Hunsdon, master Vicechamberleine, and master Secretarie) and cardinall de Como his letters, and Parries letters to the lord treasuror and lord steward, should be openlie read.

Certeine speciall matters vnder writing read in open audience of the multitude for their satisfaction.

And Parrie, for the better satisfieng of the people and slanders by, offered to read them himselfe: but being told how the order was, that the clerke of the crowne should read them, it was so resolued of all parts. And then master vicechamberleine caused to be shewed to Parrie his said confession, the cardinals letter, and his owne letter aforesaid: which after he had particularlie viewed euerie leafe thereof, he confessed, and said openlie they were the same. Then said master vicechamberleine; Before we proceed to shew what he hath confessed, what saie you (said he to Parrie) is that which you haue confessed here true, and did you confesse it freelie and willinglie of your selfe, or was there anie ertort means vsed to draw it from you? Surelie (said Parrie) I made that confession freelie without anie constraint, and that is all true, and more to: for there is no treason that hath bæne since the first yeare of the quæne anie waie touching Parries confession was not Coacta but Voluntaria: ergo more credible.

Parries confession of his treasons was read by his owne assent.

Then his confession of the eleuenth and thirteenth of Februarie, all of his owne handwriting, and before particularlie set downe, was openlie and distinctlie read by the clerke of the crowne. And that done, the cardinall di Como his letter in Italian was deliuered vnto Parries hand, by the direction of maister vicechamberleine, which Parrie there perused, & openlie affirmed to be wholie of the cardinals owne handwriting, and the seale to be his owne also, and to be with a cardinals hat on it: and himselfe did openly read it in Italian, as before is set downe. And the words bearing sense as it were written to a bishop or to a man of such degrée, it was demanded of him by maister vicechamberleine, whether he had not taken the degrée of a bishop? He said, No: but said at first, those tearmes were proper to the degrée he had taken: and after said that the cardinall did vouchsafe as of a fauour to write so to him. Then the copie of that letter in English as before is also set downe, was in like manner openlie read by the clerke of the crowne, which Parrie then acknowledged to be trulie translated. And therevpon was shewed vnto Parrie his letter of the eightéenth of Februarie, written to the lord treasuror, and the lord steward: which he confessed to be all of his owne handwriting, and was as before is set downe.

Parries letter of the eightéenth of Februarie to the lord treasuror and the earle of Leicester read.

These matters being read openlie for manifestation of the matter, Parrie praied leaue to speake; whereto maister vicechamberleine said: If you will saie anie thing for the better opening to the world of those your foule and horrible facts, speake on: but if you meane to make anie excuse of that which you haue confessed, which else would haue béene and dow stand proued against you; for my part, I will not sit to heare you. Then hir maiesties atturnie generall stood vp and said: It appeareth before you my lords, that this man hath béene indicted and arreigned of seuerall most heinous and horrible treasons, and hath confessed them, which is before you of record: wherefore there resteth no more to be done, but for the court to giue iudgement accordinglie, which here I require in the behalfe of the quéenes maiestie.

The quéenes atturnie requireth iudgement.

Then said Parrie, I praie you heare me for discharging of my conscience; I will not go about to excuse my selfe, nor to séeke to saue my life, I care not for it, you haue my confession of record, that is inough for my life: and I meane to vtter more, for which I were worthie to die; and said: I praie you heare me, in that I am to speake to discharge my conscience. Then said maister vicechamberleine; Parrie, then dow thy dutie according to conscience, and vtter all that thou canst saie concerning those thy most wicked facts.

Then said Parrie: My cause is rare, singular and vnnaturall, conceiued at Venice, presented in generall words to the pope, vndertaken at Paris, commended and allowed of by his holinesse, and was to haue béene executed in England, if it had not béene preuented. Yea, I haue committed manie treasons, for I haue committed treason in being reconciled, and treason in taking absolution. There hath béene no treason since the first yeare of the quénes reigne touching religion, but that I am guiltie of (except for receiuing of Agnus Dei, & persuading as I haue said) and yet neuer intended to kill quéene Elisabeth. I appeale to hir owne knowledge and to my lord treasurors and maister secretaries. Then said my lord of Hunsdon: Hast thou acknowledged it so often, and so plainelie in writing vnder thy hand, and here of record; and now, when thou shouldest haue thy iudgement according to that which thou hast confessed thy selfe guiltie of, dwell thou go backe againe, and denie the effect of all? How can we beléeue that thou now saiest?

Parrie had for his credit afore time said vnto secretarie, that he had béene solicited beyond the seas to murther the queene, but he would not, wherewith he craftelie abused both the quéenes maiestie, & their two councellors, when he now went to helpe himselfe with their speeches against manifest proofes.

Then said maister vicechamberleine; This is absurd, thou hast not onelie confessed generallie, that thou wert guiltie according to the indictment, which summarilie, and yet in expresse words doth conteine that thou hadest traitorouslie compassed and intended the death & destruction of hir maiestie: but thou also saidst particularlie that thou wert guiltie of cuerie of the treasons conteined therein, whereof the same was one in plaine & expresse letter set downe, and read vnto thée; Yea thou saiedst that thou wert guiltie of more treasons too beside these; And diddest thou not vpon thy examination voluntarilie confesse, how thou wast moued first therevnto by mislike of thy state after thy departure out of the realme: And that thou diddest mislike hir maiestie for that she had done nothing for thée? How by wicked papists and popish bookes thou wert persuaded that it was lawfull to kill hir maiestie? How thou wert by reconciliation become one of that wicked sort, that held hir maiestie for neither lawfull quéene, nor christian? And that it was meritorious to kill hir? And diddest thou not signifie that thy purpose to the pope by letters, and receiuedst letters from the cardinall, how he allowed of thine intent, and excited thée to performe it, and therevpon diddest receiue absolution? And diddest thou not conceiue it, promise it, vow it, sweare it, and receiue the sacrament that thou wouldest dow it? And diddest not thou therevpon affirme, that thy vowes were in heauen, and thy letters and promises on earth to bind thée to dow it? And that what soeuer hir maiestie would haue done for thée, could not haue remoued thée from that intention or purpose, vnlesse she would haue desisted from dealing as she hath done with the catholikes, as thou callest them? All this thou hast plainelie confessed; and I protest before this great assemblie, thou hast confessed it more plainelie & in better sort, than my memorie will serue me to vtter: and saiest thou now, that thou neuer meantest it?

Maister Vicechamberleine taxeth Parrie with vntruth.

Ah (said Parrie) your honors know how my confession vpon mine examination was extorted. Then both the lord Hunsdon and maister Vicechamberleine affirmed, that there was no torture or threatning words offered him. But Parrie then said, that they told him, that if he would not confesse willinglie, he should haue torture. Whereunto their honors answered, that they vsed not anie speech or word of torture to him. You said, said Parrie, that you would proceed with rigour against me, if I would not confesse it of my selfe. But their honors expreslie affirmed that they vsed no such words. But I will tell thée, said maister Vicechamberleine, what we said; I spake these words: If you will willinglie vtter the truth of your selfe, it may dow you good, and I wish you to dow so; if you will not, we must then proceed in ordinarie course to take your examination. Whereunto you answered, that you would tell the truth of your selfe. Was not this true? Which then he yéelded vnto. And hereunto, hir maiesties atturnie generall put Parrie in remembrance what speeches he vsed to the lieutenant of the Tower, the quenes maiesties sergeant at law, M. Gaudie, and the same atturnie on saturdaie the twentith of Februarie last at the Tower, vpon that he was by them then examined by order from the lords: which was, that he acknowledged he was most mildlie and fauourablie dealt with, in all his examinations: which he also at the bar then acknowledged to be true.

Then maister vicechamberleine said, that it was wonder

Parrie proued of false speeches, and so by himselfe also convicted.

The magnanimitie of the queenes maiestie noticed by sir Christopher Hatton.

wonder to see the magnanimitie of hir maiestie, which after that thou haddest opened those traitorous practises in sort as thou hast laid it downe in thy confession, was neuertheless such, and so far from all feare, as that she would not so much as acquaint anie one of hir highnesse priuie councell with it, to his knowlege, no not vntill after this thine enterprise discouered and made manifest. And besides that which thou hast set downe vnder thine owne hand, thou diddest confesse, that thou haddest prepared two Scottish daggers fit for such a purpose: and those being disposed awaie by thee, thou diddest saie that an other would serue thy turne. And withall, Parrie, diddest thou not also confesse before vs how wonderfullie thou wert appalled and perplexed vpon a sudden at the presence of hir maiestie at Hampton court this last summer, saieng that thou diddest thinke thou then sawest in hir the verie likenesse and image of king Henrie the seuenth? And that therewith, and vpon some speaches vsed by hir maiestie, thou diddest turne about and weepe bitterlie to thy selfe? And yet diddest call to mind that thy vowes were in heauen, thy letters and promises on earth; and that therefore thou diddest saie with thy selfe, that there was no remedie but to do it? Diddest thou not confesse this? The which he acknowledged.

Beyond the seas to commit the fact, but he would not bewraie wherewith he craftilie abused both the queenes maiestie, & those two councellors, wherof he now would helpe himselfe with these speeches against most manifest proofs.

The lord of Buckhurst his speeches concerning Parries manifestlie false treason.

Then said the lord Hunsdon; Saiest thou now, that thou diddest neuer meane to kill the queene? Diddest thou not confesse, that when thou diddest vtter this practise of trecherie to hir maiestie, that thou diddest couer it with all the skill thou haddest; and that it was done by thee, rather to get credit and accesse thereby, than for anie regard thou haddest of hir person? But in truth thou diddest it, that thereby thou mightest haue better opportunitie to performe thy wicked enterprise. And wouldest thou haue run into such feare as thou diddest confesse that thou wert in, when thou diddest vtter it, if thou haddest neuer meant it? What reason canst thou shew for thy selfe? Which that he cried out in a furious maner: I neuer meant to kill hir: I will laie my bloud vpon queene Elisabeth and you, before God and the world: and therevpon fell into a rage and euill words with the quenes maiesties attourneie generall. Then said the lord Hunsdon; This is but thy popish pride & ostentation, which thou wouldest haue to be told to thy fellowes of that faction, to make them beleeue that thou diest for poperie, when thou diest for most horrible and dangerous treasons against hir maiestie, and thy whole countrie. For thy laieng of thy bloud, it must lie on thine owne head, as a iust reward of thy wickednesse. The lawes of the realme most iustlie condemne thee to die out of thine owne mouth, for conspiring the destruction both of hir maiestie, and of vs all: therefore thy bloud be vpon thee: neither hir maiestie, nor we at anie time sought it; thy selfe hast spilt it.

Parries exclamation of outrage and impatiencie.

Note all this charge of matter vicechamberleine to be a recapitulation of all or most the treasons of Parrie.

Parrie chargeth the lords of the councell with vntruth.

Then he was asked what he could saie, why iudgement of death ought not to be awarded against him? Whereto he said, he did see that he must die, because he was not setled. What meanest thou by that, said maister vicechamberleine? Said he, Looke into your studie, and into your new bookes, and you shall find what I meane. I protest (said his honor) I know not what thou meanest: thou dost not well to vse such darke speeches, vnlesse thou wouldest plainelie vtter what thou meanest thereby. But he said, he cared not for death, and that he would laie his bloud amongst them. Then spake the lord chiefe iustice of England, being required to giue iudgement according to law, and said; Parrie, you haue beene much heard, and what you meane by being setled, I know not; but I see you are so setled in poperie, that you cannot setle your selfe to be a good subiect. But touching that you should saie to stale iudgement from being giuen against you, your speeches must be of one of these kinds; either to proue the indictment (which you haue confessed to be true) to be insufficient in law; or else to pleade somewhat touching hir maiesties mercie, why iustice should not be done of you. All other speeches wherein you haue vsed great libertie, is more than by law you can aske. These be the matters you must looke to, what saie you to them? Whereto he said nothing.

Parrie abuseth the honorable and worshipfull of the bench with termes vncouth and darke speeches.

More libertie of speech giuen to Parrie than by law was allowable.

Then said the lord chiefe iustice; Parrie, thou hast beene before this time indicted of diuerse most horrible and hatefull treasons, committed against thy most gratious soueregne, and natiue countrie: the matter most detestable, the maner most subtill and dangerous, and the occasions and meanes that lead thee thereunto most vngodlie and villanous. That thou diddest intend it, it is most euident by thy selfe. The matter was the destruction of a most sacred and an anointed queene thy soueregne and mistresse, who hath shewed thee such fauour, as some thy betters haue not obteined: yea, the ouerthrow of thy countrie wherein thou wert borne, & of a most happie common-wealth whereof thou art a member, and of such a queene, as hath bestowed on thee the benefit of all benefits in this world (that is to saie) thy life, hertofore granted thee by hir mercie when thou hadst lost it by iustice & desert. Yet thou hir seruant sworne to defend hir, mentest with thy bloudie hand to haue taken awaie hir life, that mercifullie gaue thee thine, when it was yeelded into hir hands. This is the matter wherein thou hast offended.

Parries treasons recapitulated by the lord chiefe iustice, both for maner and matter.

The maner was most subtill and dangerous, beyond all that before thee haue committed anie wickednesse against hir maiestie: for thou making shew as if thou wouldest simplie haue vttered for hir safetie the euill that others had contriued, diddest but seeke thereby credit & accesse, that thou mightest take the apter opportunitie for hir destruction. And for the occasions and meanes that drew thee on, they were most vngodlie and villanous: as the persuasions of the pope, of papists, and popish bookes. The pope pretendeth that he is a pastor, when as in truth he is far from feeding of the flocke of Christ, but rather as a wolfe seeketh but to feed on & to sucke out the bloud of true christians, and as it were thirsteth after the bloud of our most gratious and christian queene. And these papists and popish bookes, while they pretend to set forth diuinitie, they do indeed most vngodlie teach and persuade that which is quite contrarie both to God and his word. For the word teacheth obedience of subiects toward princes, & forbiddeth anie priuat man to kill; but they teach subiects to disobeie princes, & that a priuat wicked person may kill. Yea & whome? a most godlie queene, & their owne naturall and most gratious soueregne. Let all men therfore take heed how they receiue anie thing from him, heare or read anie of their bookes, and how they confer with anie papists. God grant hir maiestie, that the maie know by thee, how euer she trust such like to come so neere hir person!

The occasions and meanes that induced Parrie to these treasons.

The danger & damnablenesse of popish bookes either read or listened vnto of papists, &c.

But see the end, and why thou diddest it, and it will appeare to be a most miserable, fearefull, and foolish thing: for thou diddest imagine, that it was to releeue those that thou callest catholikes, who were most likelie amongst all others to haue felt the worst of it, if thy diuelish practise had taken effect. But sith thou hast beene indicted of the treasons comprised in the indictment, and therevpon arreigned, and hast confessed thy selfe guiltie of them; the court doth award, that thou shalt be had from hense to the place whense thou diddest come, and so drawne through the open citie of London vpon an hurdle to the place of execution, and there to be hanged and let downe alme, alive, and thy priuie parts cut off, and thy entrals taken out and burnt in thy sight, then thy head to be cut off, and thy bodie to be diuided in foure parts, and to be disposed at hir maiesties pleasure: and God haue mercie on thy soule.

The forme of iudgement against the traitor pronounced by the lord chiefe iustice.

Parrie rageth at the iustice bar without all reuerence.

Parrie neuertheles persisted still in his rage and fond speach, and raginglie there said, he there summoned queene Elisabeth to answer for his bloud before God: wherewith the lieutenant of the Tower was commanded to take him from the barre: and so he did. And vpon his departure, the people striken as it were at heart with the horror of his intended enterprise, ceased not, but pursued him with outcries, as; Awaie with the traitor, awaie with him, & such like: whereupon he was conueied to the barge, to passe to the Tower againe by water: & the court was adiorned. After which, vpon the second daie of this instant March, William Parrie was by vertue of processe in that behalfe awarded from the same commissioners of oier and terminer, deliuered by the lieutenant of the Tower erlie in the morning vnto the shiriffes of London and Middlesex, who receiued him at the Tower hill, and thereupon, according to the iudgement, caused him there to be forthwith set on the hurdle: from whense he was drawne thereupon through the middest of the citie of London, vnto the place for his execution in the palace at Westminster: where, hauing long time of staie admitted vnto him before his execution, he most malicioustie and impudentlie, after some other vaine discourses eftsoons & often deliuered in speach, that he was neuer guiltie of anie intention to kill queene Elisabeth, and so (without anie request made by him to the people to pray to God for him, or praier publikelie vsed by himselfe for ought that appeared: but such as he vsed, if he vsed anie, was priuat to himselfe) he was executed according to the iudgement. And now for his intent, how soeuer he pretended the contrarie in words, yet by these his owne writings, confessions, letters, & manie other proofes afore here expressed, it is most manifest to all persons, how horrible his intentions and treasons were, and how iustlie he suffered for the same: and thereby greatlie to be doubted, that as he had liued a long time vainelie and vngodlie, and like an atheist and godlesse man, so he continued the same course till his death to the outward sight of men. ¶ Here endeth the true and plaine course and processe of the treasons, arrest, arreignement, and execution of William Parrie the traitor.

William Parrie the traitor executed.

Parrie (euen at the time of his death) seeketh to cleare and purge himselfe as innocent of the treasons for the which he was condemned.

An addition not vnnecessarie for this purpose.

FOrsomuch as Parrie in the aboundance of his proud and arrogant humour, hath often both in his confession, and letters, pretended some great and grieuous causes of discontentment against hir maiestie, and the present state: it shall not be impertinent, for better satisfaction of all persons, to set forth simplie and trulie, the condition and qualitie of the man, what he was by birth and education, and in what course of life he had liued. This vile and traitorous wretch was one of the yonger sonnes of a poore man, called Parrie ap Dauid: he dwelled in Northwales in a little village called Northop in the countie of Flint: there he kept a common alehouse, which was the best and greatest staie of his liuing. In that house was this traitor borne, his mother was the reputed daughter of one Conwaie a priest, parson of a poore parish called Halkin in the same countie of Flint: his eldest brother dwelleth at this present in the same house, and there keepeth an alehouse as his father did before him. This traitor in his childhood so soone as he had learned a litle to write and read, was put to serue a poore man dwelling in Chester, named John Fisher, who professed to haue some small skill and vnderstanding in the law. With him he continued diuerse yeares, and serued as a clerke, to write such things as in that trade, which his master vsed, he was appointed.

A description of Parrie both by linage person, education, and qualitie, &c.

Parrie borne and baselie brought vp.

During this time, he learned the English tong, and at such times of leasure as the poore man his master had no occasion otherwise to vse him, he was suffered to go to the grammar schole, where he got some litle vnderstanding in the Latine tong. In this his childhood he was noted by such as best knew him, to be of a most villainous and dangerous nature & disposition. He did often run awaie from his master, and was often taken & brought to him againe. His master, to correct his peruerse and froward conditions, did manie times shut him as prisoner in some close place of his house, and manie times caused him to be chained, locked, and clogged, to staie his running awaie. Yet all was in vaine: for about the third yeare of hir maiesties reigne, for his last farewell to his poore master, he ran awaie from him, and came to London to seeke his aduentures. He was then constreined to seeke what trade he could to liue by, and to get meat and drinke for his bellie, and clothes for his backe.

Parrie a verie runnagate and vagarant rakehell in his young yeares.

His good hap in the end was to be interteined in place of seruice aboue his desert, where he staied not long, but shifted himselfe diuerse times from seruice to seruice, and from one master to another. Now he began to forget his old home, his birth, his education, his parents, his friends, his owne name, and what he was. He aspired to greater matters, he challenged the name and title of a great gentleman, he vanted himselfe to be of kin and alied to noble and worshipfull, he left his old name which he did beare, and was commonlie called by in his childhood, & during all the time of his abode in the countrie, which was William ap Harrie (as the maner in Wales is.) And because he would seeme to be in deed the man which he pretended, he toke vpon him the name of Parrie, being the surname of diuerse gentlemen of great worship and hauiour. And because his mothers name by hir father a simple priest, was Conwaie: he pretended kinred to the familie of sir John Conwaie, and so thereby made himselfe of kin to Edmund Nevill.

Parrie maketh himselfe gentleman.

Parrie marieth himselfe in marriage with a widow in Southwales.

Being thus set forth with his new name and new title of gentleman, and commended by some of his good fauorers, he matched himselfe in marriage with a widow in Southwales, who brought him some reasonable portion of wealth. She liued with him but a short time, and the welth he had with hir lasted not long: it was soone consumed with his dissolute and wastfull maner of life. He was then driuen to his wonted shifts, his creditors were manie, the debt which he owed great, he had nothing wherewith to make paiment, he was continuallie pursued by sergeants and officers to arrest him, he did often by sleights and shifts escape from them. In this his needie and poore estate, he sought to repare himselfe againe by a new match in marriage with another widow, which before was the wife of one Richard Heiwood.

Parrie a shifter, in debt & danger; he marrieth a rich widow, &c.

This matter was so earnestlie followed by himselfe, and so effectuallie commended by his frends and fauourers, that the sillie woman yeelded to take him to husband: a match in euerie respect verie vnequall and vnfit. Hir wealth and yearelie liuelihood was verie great, his poore and base estate worse than nothing, he verie yong, she of such age as for yeares she might haue beene his mother. When he had thus possessed himselfe of his new wiues wealth, he omit-

Parrie pretended a conscience of religion, being verie prophane and of no religion.

Parries voluntarie oth (thrise taken in 22 yeares) of obedience to hir maiestie.

And this is most like, for what will not the pope dispense withall?

ted nothing that might serue for a prodigall, dissolute, and most vngodlie course of life. His riot and excesse was vnmeasurable, he did most wickedlie deflоure his wiues owne daughter, and sundrie waies pitifullie abuse the old mother: he caried himselfe for his outward port and countenance (so long as his old wiues bags lasted) in such sort, as might well haue sufficed for a man of verie good hautour and degrée. But this lasted not long, his proud hart & wastfull hand had sone powred out old Yetwoods wealth.

Parrie deflowreth his wiues owne daughter, and lieth with his owne mother.

He then fell againe to his wonted shifts, borowed where he could find anie to lend, and ingaged his credit so far as anie would trust him. Amongst others, he became greatlie indebted to Hugh Hare, the gentleman before named. Who after long forbearing of his monie, sought to recouer it by law. For this cause Parrie conceiued great displeasure against him, which he pursued with all malice, euen to the seeking of his life. In this murtherous intent, he came in the night time to M. Hares chamber in the Temple, broke open the doore, assaulted him, and wounded him grieuoullie, and so left him in great danger of life. For this offense he was apprehended, committed to Newgate, indicted of burglarie, arreigned, and found guiltie by a verie substantiall iurie, and condemned to be hanged, as the law in that case requireth.

Parrie a verie runnagate and vagarant rakehell in his yong yeares.

Parrie condemned for burglarie, is pardoned of the queene.

He standing thus conuicted, hir maiestie of hir most gratious clemencie, and pitifull disposition, tooke compassion vpon him, pardoned his offense, & gaue him his life, which by the law & due course of iustice he ought then to haue lost. After this he taried not long, but pretending some causes of discontentment, departed the realme, and trauelled beyond the seas. How he demeaned himselfe there from time to time, and with whome he conuersed, is partlie in his owne confession touched before. This is the man, this is his race, which he feared should be spotted if he miscaried in the execution of his traitorous enterprise, this hath béene the course of his life, these are the great causes of his discontentment.

Note Parries ambitiō, and how the priest forgetteth that euer he was parish clerke.

Parrie pretended a conscience of religion, being diuerslie prophane and of no religion.

And whereas at his arreignement and execution, he pretended great care of the disobedient popish subiects of this realme, whom he called catholikes, and in verie insolent sort séemed to glorie greatlie in the profession of his pretensed catholike religion: the whole course and action of his life sheweth plainelie, how prophanelie & irreligiouslie he did alwaies beare himselfe. He vaunted, that for these two and twentie yeares past he had béene a catholike, and during all that time neuer receiued the communion: yet before he trauelled beyond the seas, at three seuerall times within the compasse of these two and twentie years, he did voluntarilie take the oth of obedience to the quœnes maiestie, set downe in the statute made in the first yeare of hir highnesse reigne; by which, amongst other things, he did testifie and declare in his conscience, that no forreine prince, person, prelat, state, or potentat, hath or ought to haue anie iurisdiction, power, preeminence, or authoritie, ecclesiasticall or spirituall, within this realme; and therfore did vtterlie renounce & forsake all forren iurisdictions, powers, and authorities, and did promise to beare faith and true allegiance to the quœnes highnelle, hir heires and lawfull successours.

Parries voluntarie oth (shrift taken in 22 yeares) obedience to hir maiestie.

With what conscience or religion he tooke that oth so often, if so be he were then a papist in deed, as since the discouerie of his treasons he pretended, let his best frends the papists themselues iudge. But perhaps it may be said, that he repented those his offenses past: that since those three oths so taken by him, he was twise reconciled to the pope, and so his conscience cleared, and he become a new man, and (which is more) that in the time of his last trauell, he cast awaie all his former lewd maners: that he changed his degrée and habit, and bought or begged the graue title of a doctor of law, for which he was well qualified with a little grammar schole Latine: that he had plenarie indulgence and remission of all his sinnes, in consideration of his vndertaking of so holie an enterprise as to kill quœne Elisabeth, a sacred annointed quœne, his naturall and souereigne ladie: that he promised to the pope, & vowed to God to performe it: that he confirmed the same by receiuing the sacrament at the Jesuits, at one altar with his two beaupéres, the cardinals of Vandosme and Narbone: and that since his last returne into England, he did take his oth vpon the bible to execut it. These reasons may séeme to beare some weight in déed amongst his friends the Jesuits, and other papists of state, who haue speciall skill in matters of such importance.

Parries two beaupéers the cardinals of Vandosme & Narbone.

But now latelie in the beginning of this parlement in Nouember last, he did eftsoones solemnelie in publike place take the oth before mentioned, of obedience to hir maiestie. How that may stand with his reconciliations to the pope, and with his promises, vowes, and oth to kill the quœne, it is a thing can hardlie be warranted, vnlesse it be by some speciall priuilege of the popes omnipotencie. But let him haue the glorie he desired, to liue and die a papist. He deserued it, it is fit for him, his death was correspondent to the course of his life, which was disloiall, periured, and traitorous towards hir maiestie; and false and perfidious towards the pope himselfe, and his catholikes, if they will beléeue his solemne protestations which he made at his arreignement and execution, that he neuer meant nor intended anie hurt to hir highnesse person. For if that be true, where are then his vowes which he said were in heauen, his letters and promises vpon earth? Why hath he stollen out of the popes shop so large an indulgence and plenarie remission of all his sinnes, and meant to performe nothing that he promised? Why was his deuotion and zele so highlie commended? Why was he so specially praid for and remembred at the altar? All these great fauours were then bestowed vpon him without cause or desert: for he deceiued the pope, he deceiued the cardinals and Jesuits with a false semblance and pretense to do that thing which he neuer meant.

What a notable dissembler was this?

Parrie periured towards hir maiestie & perfidious to the pope, &c.

But the matter is cleere, the conspiracie, and his traitorous intent is to plaine and euident: it is the Lord that reuealed it in time, and preuented their malice: there lacked no will or readinesse in him to execute that horrible fact. It is the Lord that hath preserued hir maiestie from all the wicked practises and conspiracies of that hellish rable: it is he that hath most gratiouslie deliuered hir from the hands of this traitorous miscreant. The Lord is hir onelie defense in whome she hath alwaies trusted, he will defend hir maiestie, and fulfill for hir sake no lesse than god king Dauid (sundrie times assalted with falsehearted enimies) and all loiall subiects will hartilie praie for; namelie such vengeance and heauie measure of iudgement to be proportioned and allotted them, as is wished against the malicious wicked in the eight and fiftith psalme, effectuallie set downe by the Paraphrast in these words following:

No trust nor certeine dealing vsed by Parrie to or fro.

Confringe malas (ô Deus) impudens
Os comminutis contere dentibus:
Et rictibus sæuis hiantes
Hos inhibe catulos leonum, &c.
Sensim liquescant, tardi gradus velut
Limax: acerbo funere deferant
Vitale lumen, more fœtus
Ante suum pereuntis ortum, &c.

Buch. in psalm. 58.

A few obſeruations gathered out of the verie words and writings of William Parrie the traitor, applied to prooue his traitorous coniuration, with a reſolute intent, imagination, purpoſe, and obſtinate determination to haue killed hir maieſtie, our moſt gratious ſouereigne: whom the Lord hath ſaued, and euer maie he ſaue by his mercie.

THis William Parrie the traitor, 1 confeſſeth to haue conceiued the treaſon at Uenice, by conference with B. Palmio, of whome he ſtill thinketh ſo well, as he can not but ſpeake of him with reuerend mention; whereas, if he had neuer thought, or did now forethinke the treaſon, he would rather curſſe the time that euer he met with ſuch a bloudie and treacherous ghoſtlie father. Well, this graue and learned frier Palmio (ſaith he) made the matter cleere in religion and conſcience, and commended the traitors deuotion. This treaſon Parrie ſo apprehended, as he wrote preſentlie to the pope, preſenting the ſeruice. 2 Returning to Paris, he conferred with Morgan, vowed to performe it for reſtitution of England, &c. 3 Being diſſuaded (as the credible man writeth) by Wats, he replied that he was gone ſo farre, as he could not go backe, but promiſed faithfullie to performe the enterpriſe, if the pope would vpon his offers and letters allow it, and grant remiſſion, &c.

Benedicto Palmio a Ieſuit, mentioned before, pag. 1385.

Thomas Morgan and Wats the one termed a catholike gentleman, pag. 1385.

Where this by the wale is to be noted, that if the opinions of theſe Engliſh prieſts (as he will néeds make vs beléeue) were differing from the pope, and our Engliſh Ieſuits, varieng from Ieſuit Palmio and others beyond ſea Ieſuits, in the queſtion of murthering a prince: ſome of them at leaſt would haue giuen totall intelligence of ſuch a treaſon conceiued and nouriſhed in that man, who had made ſo manie priuie both beyond and on this ſide the ſea, as could not be diſſuaded from his purpoſe, but euer departed with a reſolution contrarie vnto theſe cold diſſuaders. It were no god policie to truſt this popiſh traitor, but rather to ſuſpect all pope created prieſts to be of the ſame mind with their ſupreame head, and all Engliſh Ieſuits to conſent with forren Ieſuits their fellow members. They be all of one order and vow, they haue one ſuperior; and if they had deteſted this fact in déed, ſome of them, ſéeing the wretch to periſh, muſt néeds haue bewraied it, and not to ſuffer him to go on headlong in ſuch a ſinne, leauing hir totall perſon to the will and malice (as much as in them laie) of a murthering ruffian.

They cannot be found in loialtie that are vnſound in religion: Ergo how can they giue Caeſar his right, that denie God his due and true ſeruice?

But to prooue his intent with continuance and growing of the ſame, 4 Againe he writeth letters to the pope, in Januarie one thouſand fiue hundred eightie and foure by that account, toke aduiſe vpon them in confeſſion of A. Codreto, was commended, againe confeſſed, toke the ſacrament (verelie Cruentum ſacramentum, & ſacrificium cruoris) at the Ieſuits, at one altar, with the cardinals of Vandoſmi and of Narbone. Hereof he had certificat to the pope, which he ſent incloſed in his letters to his holineſſe, to lead him to abſolue him; which he required in conſideration of ſo great an enterpriſe vndertaken without reward. 5 The letter and certificat he read to Ragazzoni, and left with him to be ſent to the pope, who wiſhed him god ſpéed, promiſing he ſhould be remembred at the altar. 6 He doubteth, leaſt if Morgan died, and he miſcarried in the execution (as he did, God be thanked, and choked in the halter, notwithſtanding their remembrance at the altar) and his intent neuer trulie diſcouered; that is to ſaie, that he did it for the catholikes, it might be a ſpot in his race. Marke here the verie word (intent) in his owne confeſſion. 7 Morgan aſſureth him, that the lord Fernehurſt ſhould go into Scotland, and be readie to enter vpon the firſt newes of our quéenes fall. Thus much for his intent beyond the ſea, and before his conſpiration diſcouered.

Aniball a Ieſuit in Paris, of whome before, pag. 1385.

Ragazzoni the Nuntio; ſée before, pag. 1385.

Upon his arrinall in England, he wrote to court, that he had a ſpeciall ſeruice of diſcouerie vnto the quéene: but with what intent, let his owne words ſpeake, 8 More to prepare acceſſe and credit, than for anie care had of hir perſon. Admitted vnto hir gratious audience, he diſcouered the conſpiration; yet in what maner, let himſelfe ſaie, euen couered with all the ſkill he had. This intent was with déepe treaſon: for (as he ſaith) ſo he did, he diſcloſed onelie ſo much as he thought god and neceſſarie to ground in hir highneſſe a ſetled confidence towards him, whereby he might effect his traitorous intent with better opportunitie, and his owne ſafetie. He bewraied himſelfe ſo farre as he might couer his chiefe drift, manie principall things concealed, nothing of lord Fernehurſt with his Scotiſh forces, &c. 9 Receiuing from the pope himſelfe commendation and allowance of his enterpriſe, of incouragement, and plenarie indulgence by no meaner man than cardinall di Como, though he ſhewed the letter to hir maieſtie; not for anie care of hir perſon, but for his better acceſſe & credit, as the reſt, yet let his owne words tell what his intent was at the verie receiuing and ſhewing of the ſame letter. Forſooth (ſaith he) this letter confirmed his reſolution to kill the quéene, making it cléere in his conſcience, as a thing lawfull and meritorious.

See before, pag. 1386.

Cardinall di Como, of whom ſée before, pag. 138, and his letter to Parrie, pag. 1388.

Now is his intent grown to a reſolution, not doutfull, but cléere in conſcience, not alone lawfull, but meritorious. Papa dixit, a cardinall is Nuntio. What other thing is this, than for the pope and his cardinals, like an other Antoninus Commodus, to make one Inter ſicarios & gladiatores? The diuell inforcing this traitors heart to execute his intent, 10 He was troubled loking vpon the quéene, and remembring hir excellencies: yet he ſaw no remedie, his vowes were in heauen, his letters and promiſes on earth. Yea, he ſtroue to cloſe his eies at theſe excellencies, and obſtinated his hart by ſéeking reaſons to quench all ſparks of humanitie and allegiance ariſing in his thoughts. For thus reaſoneth he againſt his conſcience; Why ſhouldeſt thou care for hir? What hath ſhe done for thée? Haſt thou not ſpent ten thouſand marks, &c. What more diueliſh intent could poſſeſſe a traitor, than to labour to ſuppreſſe a ſmall remaine of conſcience, abhorring to kill ſo excellent a perſonage, which God ſtirred vp in his thoughts to his ſuiter condemnation? 11 Doctor Allens booke redoubled his former conceipts, euerie word was a warrant to a prepared mind.

See before, pag. 1386.

How could this hellhound die an innocent for innocent; the preſumptions conſidered.

See before, pag. 1386, part of Parries voluntarie confeſſion.

Sée how the ſmoth words of that catholike booke are interpreted and conceiued. One ſpirit occupieth the catholike reader with the catholike writer, and therefore can beſt expound the writers ſenſe in his readers mouth, euen to be a booke fraught with emphaticall ſpeaches of energeticall perſuaſion to kill and depoſe hir maieſtie, and yet doth the hypocrite writer, that traitor catholike, diſſemble and proteſt otherwiſe. 12 Parrie ſuffering repulſe in a ſute for S. Katharins, communeth with maiſter Neuill, recommendeth the enterpriſe as honorable & profitable to the catholike common-weale. Being preiudiced in opinion of Allens booke (as before) he commendeth it, and deliuereth it to Neuill, thereby to worke the ſame vile intent in him which it had alreadie confirmed in himſelfe. He toke now an other oth vpon the bible, after the maner of a proteſtant, to purſue the enterpriſe, and ment (he ſaith) to performe it, ſo far forth as the place and maner of doing was appointed. This ſecond conſpiration he neuer bewraied wraied in six moneths, till accused by Neuill, and then at first denied it.

13 Finallie, to declare his height of malice, he saith, if the quéne had preferred him neuer so greatlie, yet must this bloudie enterprise haue holden, except she had releeued the catholikes. Was this no intent, which neither feare of God, nor reuerence of excellencie could repell? Which neither dread of punishment, nor tract of time could remoue? Did he conceiue it, conferre and aduise of it, vow himselfe to the execrable seruice, present and offer it, harden his heart against others dissuasions, beat backe contrarie motions of his owne conscience, go so farre as he could not go backe, promise it faithfullie, receiue a church sacrament therevpon, make certificat thereof, propound himselfe the end and reason of his intent, discourse vpon the contingent sequele, preuenting the spot of his race, receiue letters of allowance, commendation, incouragement, and absolution, could he vow in heauen, and promise on earth, could he do all this in a thing which he meant not?

Cardinall of Como, of whom see before, pag. 1387. and his letter to Parrie, pag. 1388.

All these circumstances proue that Parrie was resolute, and prepared both wherr and by hand to put in ure his conceiued vnnaturall treason.

Could he resolue and confirme his resolution of a thing which he intended not; yea, could he intend & meane (for all these be his owne words) that which he neuer meant nor intended? could he redouble his concerts, and haue a prepared mind for that he intended not? Would such a craftie traitor practise with others by persuasiue speach, & traitorous broke in such a matter, as the onelie broching thereof must capitallie indamage his kinsman and friend, and withall laie his owne head in his friends hand? And yet notwithstanding, either he meant this treason, either else he little loued his friend, to tempt him so dangerouslie; whom yet, he saith, he loued so, as to suffer his finger in his dith, & his hand in his purse. But which is aboue all, would anie man sweare againe on the bible, appoint time and place, conceals it with as much perill as if he had done it; would he denie it, would so ambitious a man discontent himselfe with all preferment, for the atchining of that which he meant not? Was this mischeefous course, begun and continued, a long time, at home and abroad, in manie kingdomes, communicated with manie persons, of seuerall nation and qualitie, as pope, cardinall, Nuntio, frier, priest, kings secretarie and ambassadors, all this while not meant? Was it frankelie and voluntarilie confessed meant, finallie, recorded by pleading guiltie in maner & forme with all circumstance, and yet could he die an innocent for intent?

See before, pag. 1386.

How could this hethound be an innocent for intent; the praemisses considered.

See before, pag. 1386. part of Parries voluntarie confession.

All this falling vpon no simple man, but vpon one, not now the first time holding vp his hand at barre, & vpon a doctor of law, the verie hood whereof is able to giue a man more iudgement, than to slip without light in all these things: I know not how he maie be excused without strong suspicion of the excuser. And if a prince may not iudge a wicked seruant out of his owne mouth, nor determine an offense by two or three mouthes, it were a notable world for traitors and murtherers, thus to haue all proceedings set lose, as well of our common lawes, which condemne vpon all euidences, as of the ciuill lawes, which giue capitall sentence vpon confession onelie: yea, Moses wisedome is ouerreached, and Christes equitie in his euangelicall parable against the lewd seruant not vsing his talent is eluded. All this is also ratified by voluntarie letters of his to hir maiestie apart, and to hir honorable councell. And if anie Italianat papist neuertheless will néeds beleeue this repugnancie of his last speaches, let him yet take this one note of him, whereby to consider how credible a man he creditch.

Note the pretious dealing of Parrie euerie waie hurtfull, Tam principi quàm populo, dem ceps sibimet & proditori summo. pag. 1386.

Either Parrie meant this monstrous murther according to his vowes in heauen, and sworne promises in earth, and so died a desperat traitor, protesting the contrarie in his last words vpon his soule and damnation: or else was he periured, to the foule abuse of pope & all poperie, most execrablie prophaning Gods name by promising, swearing, vowing, &c: that which he meant not. Necessarilie therefore must he perish vpon periured treason, or wrecke vpon desperat detestation. Nothing auoideth this dilemma, but a popish bull of dispensation, which if he had, I know not how princes may not as safelie suffer wolues and beares come to their presence, as such papists. And verie like it is that Parrie had a speciall bull, either else was it comprehended in his indulgence, that he might take othes contrarie to his catholike conscience, as he did the oth of supremasie in the beginning of the last parlement. Which if his conjuratours had not béene priuie with what intention he did sweare, he neuer durst haue taken it, least they should haue now bewraied him as a man sworne against the pope, therefore not to be trusted. But the truth is, this papist Parrie was both a traitor, and a manifold periured traitor, whome (with all other of the like stampe) we leaue to the finall iudgement of God at the last and dreadfull dome: registring (in the meane time) a proper epigram, and of no lesse fit than true deuise, in memorie of the said capitall traitor, requiting that prophetically posie concerning Darnell Gatheren and frier Forrest, of whome you shall read in the thirteenth yeare of king Henrie the eight; this of Parrie being as followeth:

A dilemma of reason of aduantage, concluding that Parrie died a periured traitor.

William Parrie
Was ap Harrie
By his name:
From the alehouse
To the gallows
Grew his fame.

Gotten westward
On a bastard
As is thought:
Wherefore one waie
Kin to Conwaie
Hath he sought.

Like a beast
With inceast
He begon:
Mother maried
Daughter caried
Him a sonne.

Much he borrowed
Which he sorrowed
To repaie:
Hare his good
Bought with blood
As they saie.

Yet for paiment
Had arrainment
Of his detter:
Shee that gaue him
Life to saue him
Hangd a better.

Parrie his pardon
Thought no guardon
For his worth:
Wherefore sought
That he mought
Trauell forth.

Which obtained
He remained
As before:
And with rashnes
Shewd his bashnes
More and more.

He did enter
To aduenter
Euen his death:
By whose fauor
He did euer
Draw his breath.

It was pittie
One so wittie
Malcontent:
Leauing reason
Should to treason
So be bent.

But his gifts
Were but shifts
Void of grace:
And his brauerie
Was but knauerie
Vile and base.

Wales did beare him
France did sweare him
To the pope:
Venice wrought him
London brought him
To the rope.

Wherewith strangled
And then mangled
Being dead:
Poles supporters
Of his quarters
And his head.

In this yeare one thousand fiue hundred eightie & foure, sir Walter Mildmaie knight, one of hir maiesties most honorable priuie councell, founded a college in the vniuersitie of Cambridge, and named it Emmanuell college. ¶ The same was sometimes a house of friers, and came to king Henrie the eight by dissolution, as appeareth by the sequeale, being an extract out of a substantiall and large booke written in parchment (which I haue seene, and whense I had this transcript) conteining the entrie or inrolment of certeine letters patents, writings and euidences touching the said college. First the premisses came vnto king Henrie the eight by act of parlement touching the dissolution of monasteries; & afterwards the said king by letters patents vnder the great seale of England, dated Decimo sexto Aprilis, anno tricesimo quinto regni sui, did grant the same to Edward Elrington and Humfreie Metcalfe, and to the heires of the said Edward for euer. After that, the said Edward Elrington and Humfreie Metcalfe by their deed pold dated Quarto Martij, anno tricesimo sexto Henrici octaui, did grant the premisses to William Sherwood gentleman & his heires for euer. Then George Sherewood gentleman, sonne and heire to William Sherwood by deed pold dated Vicesimo nono Septembris, anno vicesimo tertio Elisabethæ reginæ, did grant the premisses to Robert Tailor esquier and to his heires for euer.

And afterwards, the said Robert Tailor by deed pold dated Duodecimo Iunij, anno vicesimo quinto Elisabethæ reginæ, did grant the premisses to Richard Culuerwell citizen & mercer of London and Laurence Chaderton of Cambridge bachelor of diuinitie, and their heires for euer. And after that, the premisses were conueied to sir Walter Mildmaie, who hath conuerted the same into a seedplot of learning, for the benefit of the church & common-wealth: so that the students maie verie trulie saie this, and more to, of so good, so honorable, and vertuous a founder:

——fluuijs dum creuerit æquor,
Dúmque vagas stellas pascet vterque polus,
Dum steriles altis lustrabunt montibus vmbræ,
Virtutis stabit fama decúsque tuæ.

1585 The parlement dissolued.

On the nine and twentith daie of March, which was in the yeare of Christ 1585, the parlement was dissolued: at the breaking vp whereof, the quéenes maiestie in the parlement house made an oration, to such effect as followeth.

The queenes maiesties oration in the parlement house.

The quéenes maiesties oration in the parlement house.

MY Lords and ye of the lower house, my silence must not iniurie the owner so much, as to suppose a substitute sufficient to render you the thanks that my heart yeeldeth you: not so much for the safe keeping of my life (for which your care appeareth so manifest) as for the neglecting your priuat future perill, not regarding other waie than my present state. No prince herein (I confesse) can be surer tied, or faster bound than I am, with the linke of your good will; and can for that, but yeeld a hart & head to seeke for euer all your best. Yet one matter toucheth me so neere, as I may not ouerskip: religion, the ground on which all other matters ought to take rote, and being corrupted may marre all the tree: and that there be some faultfinders with the order of the cleargie, which so may make a slander to my selfe & the church, whose ouer ruler God hath made me; whose negligence can not be excused, if anie schismes or errors hereticall were suffered.

O the care that hir maiestie hath of true religion, the lord of life lengthen hir graces life.

Thus much I must saie, that some faults and negligences may grow and bee (as in all other great charges it happeneth) and what vocation without? All which if you my lords of the cleargie do not amend, I meane to depose you: loke you therfore well to your charges; this may be amended without heedlesse or open exclamation. I am supposed to haue manie studies, but most philosophicall: I must yeeld this to be true, that I suppose few (that be no professors) haue read more. And I need not tell you, that I am so simple that I vnderstand not, nor so forgetfull that I remember not; & yet amongst my manie volumes, I hope Gods booke hath not beene my fildomest lectures, in which we find that, which by reson (for my part) we ought to beleeue, that seeing so great wickednes & griefs in the world, in which we liue but as waie-faring pilgrims, we must suppose that God would neuer haue made vs but for a better place, and of more comfort than we find here. I know no creature that breatheth, whose life standeth heerelie in more perill for it than mine owne, who entered not into my state without fight of manifold dangers of life and crowne, as one that had the mightiest and greatest to wrestle with. Then it followeth, that I regarded it so much as I left my selfe behind my care.

Hir maiesties reuerend estimation of Gods word and sacred scriptures.

And so you see that you wrong me too much (if anie such there be) as doubt my coldnesse in that behalfe. For if I were not persuaded that mine were the true waie of Gods will, God forbid I should liue to prescribe it to you. Take heed, lest Ecclesiastes saie not too true; They that feare the horie frost, the snow shall fall vpon them. I see manie ouer bold with God almightie, making too manie subtill scannings of his blessed will, as lawiers do with humane testaments: the presumption is so great as I may not suffer it (yet mind I not hereby to animate *Romanists, which what aduersaries they be to mine estate is sufficientlie knowne) nor tolerate new fangledenesse. I meane to guide them both by Gods true rule: in both parts be perils, and of the latter I must pronounce them dangerous to a kinglie rule, to haue euerie man according to his owne censure to make a doome of the validitie and priuitie of his princes gouernement, with a common beile and couer of Gods word, whose followers must not be iudged but by priuat mens exposition, God defend you from such a ruler that so euill will guide you. Now I conclude, that your loue and care neither is nor shall be bestowed vpon a careless prince, but such as for your good will passeth as litle for this world as who careth least; with thanks for your free subsidie: a manifest shew of the aboundance of your good wils, the which I assure you, but to be imploid to your weale, I could be better pleased to returne than receiue.

O most princelie resolution and persuasion!

* The Gods vengeance and iustice rote them out, that the Lords annointed maie be free from all feare of hurt.

What subiect would thinke life and lands too deere to lose (if need were) for so gracious a quéene?

This is the summe of hir maiesties oration vttered in a solemne assemblie, and well worthie the recording, as tesstifieng no lesse in sinceritie and truth, than euerie good subiect may seale vnto himselfe, and laie his hand vpon his hart to be faithfullie meant for his securitie. Wherein is speciallie to be noted the religious care which hir maiestie hath vowed to haue of the propagation and supportation of the gospell; according to that which is reported of hir by waie of prophesie in the vision of quéene Anne in a dreame; where (after a repetition of miseries foretold to befall in quéene Maries daies) these words are inferred:

Ecce malis tantis tua parua medebitur infans,
Iámque tenella geret post sceptrum patris adulta,
Solamen magnum patriæ, solamen amicis:
Qua regnante diu, cœlis ea fata feruntur,
Britanni populus fœlix, erit Anglia fœlix,
Et longa tali sub principe pace fruetur.

C. O. in sua Elisabetha.

¶ In this yeare of Grace, on the eleuenth of Aprill died pope Gregorie the thirteenth, termed the last & lewd pope of that name; one that wanted not the waies to aplie his vsurped supremasie to the common abuse of all christendome, according to the receiued custome of his predecessors; who rather than they would abide anie be it neuer so small an eclipse of their worldlie pompe, all the world shalbe set together by the ears, in so much that heauen & earth shall ring with the noise of the tumults. This is he that (among other acts by him vndertaken & done) after the old Romane or Julian kalendar was by popish arguments accused & charged with manifold imperfections, whereinto by continuance of time it fortuned to fall, thrust forth into the world a reformed kalendar, exhibited to his holinesse by one Antonie Lillie doctor of arts & physicke, wherein (by a certeine new cycle of epacts by one Aloisius the said Antonies brother germane deuised, and to an vndoubted rule of the golden number directed, as also to what soeuer magnitude or greatnesse of the yeare of the sunne aplied) all things that in the old kalendar were faultie, may by constant reason and for euer to last be so reformed; that the kalendar once reformed according to this plot, need neuer hereafter either to be altered or amended. Howbeit, in commending the perfect reformation of this new kalendar, whereby not onelie all things erronious are abolished; but also such foresight is had of the time to come, that the calculation of this kalendar shall neuer hereafter saeme subiect vnto change: an occasion of some demands may hereof arise, touching christian libertie; namlie; Whether the church be tied to a certeine time according to the reformed calculation astronomicall, in the celebration of yearelie festiuals: Whether it be lawfull for the bishop of Rome to reforme the time and the kalendar: Whether the church of Christ be bound by necessitie of religion to receiue that kalendar, at the first originall beginning proceeding from the pope, though the same afterwards were set forth vnder another title: Whether it profiteth or be requisit that for the keeping of peace and concord, in contracts, bargainings, and intercourse of traffike and merchandize; the one partie should submit himselfe to that kalendar, wherevnto the pope hath yoked his popelings; and persuaded manie more to doo the same, &c. Although these and the like interrogatories may be made against the papists; yet bicause to giue an instance is not to answer a doubt, it is to be wished that this kalendar were throughlie sifted by some sound and sober mathematician, and the three heads, whereof this new reformed kalendar of Gregorie doth consist, dispersed: which three heads, repeated by Gregorie in his bull before the said kalendar, are these.

¶ The reforming and coupling of the equinoctiall in the spring to the one and twentith daie of March, with such a caueat giuen, that from thense, as from the proper and fixed seat, it may not possiblie hereafter at anie time remoue. 2 The correction of the golden number by the cycle of epacts, in such sort, that the numbers of epacts may shew not onelie the daie of the new mone in euerie moneth of all years; but also, and that principallie the terme of Easter: that is, the certeine & full daie of the verie next full mone following after the equinoctiall of the spring; and that euerie yeare without error or deceipt. 3 The verie iust and certeine sundaie of Easter, that ought to be celebrated and kept on the verie next sundaie after the full mone, which doth follow first after the iust equinoctiall of the spring. These three heads being so anatomized and opened by mathematicians as were meet, it should be found in the end, that this new kalendar, in all and euerie part thereof, euen wherin it is best reformed, or so thought to be, is manie waies faultie, & erronious in the verie grounds: in which qualitie leauing it, as not to be put to the touch in a publike chronicle, but otherwise to be had in triall, Gregorie the preferrer thereof is now to be handled by description, which is no fiction or imagined fable, but deriued out of an oration or funerall sermon in Rome, at the burtall of his holinesse, conteining his maners, life, deeds, and last words at his death: togither with the lamentations of the cardinals and whole Romish clergie: otherwise to be intituled as followeth:

Vide M. Michaelem Mæstlinum Gœppingensem in Tubingensi academia mathematicum, &c.

A sermon full of papisticall adulation, and matter sufficient to procure the wise and vertuous minded to contemne such grosse and palpable blindnesse, and all persons to laugh at the Romanists absurd and erronious follies.

THere is nothing so certeine as death, either vncerteine as the moment thereof. Wherefore the holie doctor saith: Keepe thy selfe continuallie in that estate wherin thou desirest to die. And the prouerbe goeth, that manie a one thinketh himselfe in perfect helth, when he beareth death in his bosome. To saie the truth, we doo continuallie carrie death about with vs, it is in vs immediatlie after we take life and mouing in our mothers wombe; and whersoeuer we walke, it is still at our heeles: if we take horsse, it is with vs: if we be on the water, it is the guide of our ship: so as we can neuer saie death to be absent from vs: for our selues are verie death, and no part of our bodie immortall. Wherefore those that suppose themselues to liue in this world, are far deceiued in their owne opinions, and the pilgrimage of man in this world is but a shadow of life, which vnto vs seemeth life, but in deed is none. The better therefore to describe the said shadow, I will make an abstraction of the dead time of mans age, from the full and greatest age that a creature can liue in the world.

A good and plausible beginning, if the proceeding were agreeable.

First, the longest age that man can liue is but sirtie yeares. From sirtie yeares we must deduct the nights, for man when he sleepeth liueth not. Beside that, sleepe is termed the image of death: so that deducting the nights, which comprehend one halfe of the time, man liueth but three score yeares in the world. Whiles man liueth these sirtie yeares, he liueth but the one halfe of them, for if he haue one daie of mirth and quiet, he hath another of sorrow and care, bicause griefe doth still secretlie creepe into mirth. And anie person troubled with cares and vered in mind, doth rather die than liue. We must therfore take from the sirtie yeares aforesaid the one halfe, and so there remaine but thirtie. Now, let vs see whether in the Popish diuines doo rather imitate anie duns than the prophet Dauid, who setteth downe the age of man to consist of 70. yeares.

Sir Rem. the death of pope Gregorie the thirteenth: end of this mans practises against England in diuerse treaties, pag. 311, &c.

The pope is verie liuelie set out by his owne proclamations & good enterludes to vnteach christian liertie.

This hath been done in such sort by a mathematicus stranger, that he is bold to challenge euer holding the contrarie sermon to a regent of his examination.

A further examination of mans age by popish learning.

space of six score yeares a man may not passe awaie ten at the least in sickenesse, mischances, or other infirmities? I may tell you there is no man that liueth six score yeares in the world, but at seuerall times and during the said age he hath aboue ten yeares infirmitie: and therefore we must take from the thirtie yeares which are the remainder of mans life yet ten yeares, & then there are but twentie left, which are now the twentie yeares of his life. We must take them at his infancie & in his oldest age: that is, ten yeares from his verie childhood, & the other ten from his extreame old age. But sith aswell in infancie as in extremitie of age there is no life, but rather a liuing death; I conclude, that man hath not one onelie houre of life in this world, also that whosoeuer seeketh life in this world doth much deceiue himselfe. In heauen therefore it is that we must assure our selues to liue, and seeke for life; but not vpon earth where death doth continuallie haunt vs. For we ought to die to the world, to the end to be borne in Jesus Christ; according to the soueraigne sentence and decree, O ye inhabitants of Rome we see your great bishop and mine is dead: behold our crowne is fallen: our lodestar vanished awaie, and our light extinguished.

Happie newes to the true church, when the members of antichrist decrease.

And for mine owne part, O miserable man, who am depriued of him, of two things I wish for one, that is, either neuer to remember the good that we haue lost; either else calling the same to mind, to find some one that were able to giue me comfort correspondent to the greatnesse of the heauinesse wherinto I am fallen. And indeed my selfe do now come into the pulpit vpon two seuerall occasions meere contrarie ech to other, to wit, to reherse the gretnes of the good that is taken from vs, & to comfort those that sustaine the losse: naie rather, to do two things which seeme to repugne ech other. For if it be true that nothing doth more aggrauate the griefe of the losse, than the remembrance of the value of the thing lost; then doth nothing seeme more contrarie to the comfort of the liuing, than the praises of him that is dead, as in this case, wherein so far do the merits of the deceased exceed, that the arrowes which pearse his hart that is depriued of him are the more sharpe and grieuous. Howbeit some man would answer, that contrariwise by the commendations of him that is departed, we do declare that he is not dead, but liueth, and thus we may by litle and litle asswage the sorrow of our losse and damage in whatsoeuer maner.

This is no adulation to a dead carrion, what did this fellow (thinke you) to the beast when he was aliue?

A comparison abused to the commendation of lewd pope Gregorie.

But as it were hard for a painter in the face of a sorrowfull person to represent a smiling countenance, so doth it seeme to me a difficult enterprise to vndertake to comfort a man by rehearsing the vertues of him that is taken awaie from vs: and that the more, if we should enter into consideration of him that is spoken of: of your selues that are the hearers: and of me that do make the discourse: for in each of these three, the same circumstances that seeme to make mine enterprise easie, are those that indeed do yeeld it most difficult and troublesome. As if a man should in respect of him saie, that if the multitude of his great vertues do seeme to abridge my labour, in seeking some argument whereupon to ground his praises: so contrariwise the aboundance of so great vertues do hold me so short, that I can not certeinelie resolue vpon the choice of one onlie whereupon worthilie to commend him. For you, if a man should saie, in that you all knew him and vsed him to your great profit, it should seeme sufficient for me onelie to decipher matters: so contrariwise your own perfect knowlege, togither with your dealings with him, would sufficientlie open vnto you all my defaults in displaieng of him. And for mine owne part, if infinit courtesies and great fauors, wherewith he hath alwaies gratified me, do seeme without seeking anie cuning to breed in me as much affection as is requisit: so by contrarie reason, the great fauours and benefits, wherewith he hath alwaies gratified me, do not leaue me anie cunning meanes to hinder me from hauing greater affection than is heere to be required of me. And this was the principall reason that moued me somewhat to refuse this so honorable a commission, and vnto me in manie other respects most welcome, and to request you to apoint and commit to some other the charge to discourse herevpon, and to leaue vnto me teares and lamentations onelie.

How big the fellow looked Gregorie, when he was so magnified being dead.

But now vnto thee, Oh my good maister and father (for so will I alwaies call thee) do I turne my selfe. Saie it be possible that this my oration, which latelie in thy life thou diddest harken vnto, should now be imploied in praising of thee being dead, either that this my tong, which imploieng me to the seruice of this countrie, thou diddest so greatlie honor, should now be occupied, alas, in lamentations for thy so hurtfull death to all christendome? And what? Hast thou then brought me so toilfullie to Rome, to the end here to celebrate thy funerals? Oh how that commission to read Hieremie might well forshew vnto me (but I perceiued it not) that my lecture thereof should end in lamentations, and now behold that diuination accomplished! See Quomodo sedet sola ciuitas, how the citie sitteth desolat, notwithstanding it be Plena populo, full of people: also how this spouse, the church of Rome, who by great brightnes seemed to be Domina gentium, ladie of nations, now hauing lost thee, Est facta quasi vidua, is made as it were a widow: and as a widow all dipped in teares and lamentations, willeth me to celebrate the praises of hir deere spouse, which she all wholie togither can not celebrate: wherein although I can not (as in truth I am not able) atteine to the least parcell of thy deserts, which are not well to be expressed, yet at all aduentures I assure my selfe, O happie soule, that as in thy life time thou diddest pardon me a number of other imperfections, so now thou wilt likewise forgiue me this: I know that as thou wert accustomed, thou wilt make better accompt of the good will than of the glose and pompe of words, and as discreet thalt well see, that not onelie I, but also that no orator is able to atteine to the type of thy commendations.

A fit child to scholer such a father and maister.

No spouse to a strumpet sported with spirituall fornication.

Wealthie and blasphemous diuinitie, to forsweare a bishop, and vnlearned a chaplaine.

Among the which my lords, and ye my hearers, I do freelie confesse, that I haue greatlie doubted whether I were best to begin, as I take the maner to be, at the greatnesse and eminencie of the familie from whense he is extract: and at the first I was purposed so to do, and that the rather bicause it is not yet scarse two months since that my selfe heard him in this temple, discourse how our sauiour Jesus Christ was content to be borne of a mother though poore, yet noble, and descended of a noble race; also that nobilitie was verie effectuall euen to spirituall life, as it may be said of him that is noble, that whether it be through conformitie or resemblance of mind with his predecessors, either through the remembrance of such things as they haue done, either else through the effect of good bringing vp, or for what other reason he is better disposed to do well; that nobilitie serueth him as a spur to goodnesse and a bridle to euill: also that as the pretious stone being set in gold maketh a greater shew than in iron, euen so the same vertuous deeds do giue a more effectuall example, when they proceed from noble personages than from men of base estat, with other things which he spake to the same purpose.

Noble birth (no doubt) was this Gregorie, yet thereof he called Hugh the good fellow.

A similitude of a pretious stone set in gold, and vertues in personages noble descended.

Childish reasons and worse diuinitie.

Howbeit I will not speake thereof, in that it might might be accompted rashnesse in me, euen in Rome to seeke to make his holinesse familie more famous than it is. It may be that some may saie that this familie doth want glorious titles, preeminence, riches, possessions, iurisdictions, pretentions of rights, patronages, ancient petidegrees of their predecessors, commendations of learning, praise of armes, noble and famous aliances either in Italie or without, and to be briefe, all such things collected into one, as being seuerallie taken are sufficient to set a faire shew vpon a whole progenie. Notwithstanding all these things which are terrestriall & too common with others, and for the causes aforesaid his holinesse perceiuing (as he perceiued all things) that it is not inough for a house to be of a good race, except himselfe be also good, and that they are happie and wise, who as the sea, doo not receiue the sweetnesse of this vaine glorie of the riuers of their predecessours, but returning their course and swelling ouer the mouths of the riuers themselues, can yeeld to their forerunners the reward of firme and permanent commendation; so of that great nobilitie which he had brought forth of his mothers wombe with him, he did therin onelie yeeld thankes to God, for that his actions with their circumstances, thereby, and in respect thereof, were more notable and exemplarie.

Gregorie perceiued all things: but it should be knowen how.

A long similitude most fond and most ridiculous applied.

Oh most happie person, who in the middest of so great eminencie of birth, could so well subdue pride, and in himselfe giue example vnto other! Euen like vnto the pearle, which although it lieth in the bottome of the sea, yet keeping it selfe close in the shell, and neuer opening vntill it ascendeth to receiue the dew of heauen, we find therein no smell, no sauour, or drop that tasteth of hir sea; but being pure, cleare and white, it seemeth to be formed euen in heauen. We must not therfore take commendations of this people at the transitorie things of the sea of this world, and although he be therein extract of a most noble birth, yet will I not saie anie more thereof as of that which is none of his.

Marke this principallie, that Gregorie was mortified euen vpon the first hir.

But discoursing and speaking of that which properlie apperteineth to himselfe, I would aske whether his mind commanded not his bodie? Also whether it were possible to find a bodie more withered, afflicted, macerated, dried vp, or pale through the effect of austere and hard penance? Other mens bodies (O christian hearers) are for the most part wished to be of this or that forme, bicause they yeeld such or such inclination to the mind. But in this I will shew you a matter worth the noting; that is, that here the case was altered, for it was the mind that ministred inclination to the bodie: so that being waren altogither spirituall, had not extreame need forced him, he neuer desired meat, drinke, or bodilie rest: and he liued in such sort as it was a miracle (whereof, alas, we haue but too soone seene the issue) how he could liue so manie yeeres, but rather liuing was dead. And for my part I assure you, I neuer, euen in the hart of summer, killing his holie hands (good God shall I neuer doo so more?) found them other than cold, wherein there was no heat, except the same proceeded of some excesse or immoderate labor, or of some motion of a sudden feuer. O most deere bodie! O most holie members! But looke yet once againe vpon them, O ye Romane people, and saie: Are not these the verie hands which so often haue bin ioined togither, and lifted vp to praie and offer sacrifice for vs? Be not these the feet that haue trauelled so far for our sakes? Is not this the head that neuer imagined anie thing but for our benefit? Is not this the heart that burned in loue of vs? O deere members! O members so deere! What? Shall you then go vnder the earth? And what? Must you be buried? Alas my God! who is that thou hast taken awaie from vs? And wherefore doo ye hide your selues? For my part, none but onlie death shall euer plucke out of my heart the liuelie image of that so well beloued countenance: especiallie in this act, wherein with your eies toward heauen as it were smiling, and with an angelicall countenance I see you depart and remaine dead.

But it is time for vs (O christian hearers) to proceed to matters of greater importance, which are so manie & withall so intangled one within an other, that I could not find anie more fit meane to part and diuide them; neither doo I thinke that we can take anie better course, than the verie course of his holie life: and there to begin. When he was a little child he was verie deuout, and it is well knowne that God, euen in his first youth, wrought in him maruellous signes of singular goodnesse. The like is read of saint Basill, saint Gregorie, saint Dominike, saint Francis, and manie others, as was to be seene in this yong child (saie they that doo remember it) namelie, that at his returne from the college, all the delite that that age vsed to take in anie other thing, he tooke onelie in framing of little altars, adorning of small chapels, and counterfeiting of holie things. Matters, which although the wisest maie thinke too base for this place, and for the occasion now ministred, yet would I not onelie not disdaine, but also take great and singular pleasure in the same.

And although some doo saie, that among such serious affaires such small trifles should haue no place: yet doo I delite to shew how commendable, not onelie graue matters, but euen such small things were in him. Concerning the rest, according to the proportion of his age, or rather beyond the reach of that age (as occasions doo increase so must my stile arise) his holinesse being past the inferiour schooles, and comming to studie the law, it is not possible to make an end of writing with what modestie and grauitie he there passed the yeares of his studie: he was apparelled in clerks attire, but, which was of greater importance, he obserued clergie maners, much continencie, & (as is supposed) perpetuall virginitie, with modest behauiour, no vanitie, continuall studie: these were his exercises. And to be briefe, although thorough our mishaps, the vniuersitie wherin he studied were not vsuallie either the quietest or the holiest in the world, yet might the writing of Nazianzen concerning the great Basill and the towne of Athens be aplied to him. Like as there is one riuer, which flowing thorough the sea, taketh no bitternesse thereof; also a certeine beast that liueth in the fire and consumeth not: euen so he with great quietnesse passing these troubles, and with soueregne vertues such vices, did first and most worthilie atteine to the doctorall degree, & afterward was called to Rome, and made cardinall, onelie thorough desert, for his learned studies, and not by fauour, as the most part doo now vsuallie practise.

A happie departure, a blessed iournie for all the holie church, but especiallie for this great citie of Rome, which haue receiued so great benefits and so much comfort at his hands. Notwithstanding, whatsoeuer affaires he had in hand, yet did he dailie aplie his studie at a certeine houre, & so continued his studie euen to his death, with so deepe iudgement and good successe, that although his intellectuall habitudes had not beene verie farre surmounted & darkened thorough the marueilous brightnesse of his morall and theologicall vertues: yet in respect of his learning and studie onelie, he deserued great praise, and in truth he was neuer other than most learned and a great fauourer of learned men. Who did euer shew them more pleasure, or receiue them more maintaine his owne pompe and glorie.

For all that is hitherto spoken is verie ridiculous, idle and meere lyng labour.

Notes that he would in time prooue a strong piller of idolatrie.

The continencie and virginitie of the popish clergie doth consist in keeping of concubines.

Note how Gregorie is extolled by waie of comparison.

A great thrift was Gregorie, but in no good facultie.

Better had that liberalitie bene exhibited to theues than to sacrilegious beasts &c.

courteoustie? Besides the seminaries and colleges, as well at Pauie as here, the lectures, the stipends, with such & so manie things done to the behoofe of learning, and besides the bookes which he hath of himselfe written: and now that the bridle of his modestie doth no longer deteine, I hope, as my selfe haue séene them, so comming to light, all the world shall behold them, and in them perceiue as in himselfe whether were more his holie writings or good maners. This loue of learning and holinesse of life he practised so diligentlie in himselfe, that thorough Gods grace, and the inspiration of the holie ghost, he was in respect of his vertues, knowledge, and holie life, elected pope, and his name from Hugh good Companion, was changed and called Gregorie the thirteenth. During his papasse he liued so religiouslie and deuoutlie, that the whole life of a man were little enough to rehearse the same. But herein I repose my selfe vpon that zeale which I perceiue in euerie one to commend him, whereby I maie shortlie sée so manie poesies, verses, and rimes, with such hiperboles, so manie orations, and volumes to his honor, that all these things, as well such as I can not touch, as the rest which I mention and speake of, shall briefflie be deciphered and liuelie set forth.

Gregorie a good companion to traitors, but an ill companion to the godlie.

It is impossible (if you will beléeue this flattering parasite) to rehearse Gregories workes &c.

For to rehearse all the holie works of our good shépheard, or to indeuour to set forth that verie patterne of a bishop which he hath expressed in himselfe, to saie truth, I thinke impossible, and much lesse to beléeue that the verie summarie of those things that he hath done maie be drawne into anie annals or chronicle. Neither can I conceiue anie means to atteine thereto, vnlesse some one haue in forme of remembrances béene dailie collecting the course of his déeds and works. For my part in this short discourse that I haue to prosecute, as one not able to restreine the whole sea, I will go sée if I maie gather the water at the riuers and brooks from whense this sea doth arise, that is, from his vertues, which in him haue wrought so manie holie works. Notwithstanding I might at once in generall words saie, that all vertues beséeming a bishop, which saint Paule & others do speake of, were to be found in him.

The woolfe is dead, and the shéepe want a good shéepheard.

Alas how this holie pastor burning in loue, made himselfe leane for you, O ye poore artificers, ladies, yong infants, and poore beggers! Alas ye all haue lost your father, the shépheard is dead, & the shéepe remaine a preie to the wolues. How soeuer it is, hereof maie we plainelie sée O Rome, that he bare thée singular good will: and in déed (for I will not conceale thy commendation) it is euident that thou diddest answer his good will with reciprocall amitie, witnesse this thy assemblie: these sobs & these teares do testifie thy acknowledging thereof, besides all other things, alas, too bitter and too swéet togither; euen the night of his departure was to you and to me infortunate. O great, O great pitie, what could be séene more worthie compassion and teares, than the fearefull stirre of the people? It seemed, when the most horrible sound of the bell called Aue Maria, that gaue notice of his death, to the end to praie to God for him, sent furies to all both men and women.

How could the pope néed the praiers of men, sith himselfe can forgiue sinnes?

One ran here, an other there, some two togither, others without order or reason: all wept, all cried, all howled out, saieng: Ah, good God whereto are we brought? What shall become of vs? If the infection doth afflict vs, who shall praie for vs? Ah that we had not deserued it! Oh how God is wroth with vs! With manie other exclamations sufficient to haue rent the marble stones, and clouen the wals in sunder. He was a man of much praier and reading, as euer was ante, and in priuat behauior had not his like. Two things there were that made him wonderfull wise. The one, he would in all affaires heare

Two things made Gregorie counsell. The other, he had still recourse vnto praier. Truelie he was as wise as holie. I confesse that in respect of his example onelie, I learned to vnderstand this place of saint Paule concerning his care of all the churches: Quis infirmatur & ego non infirmor? Quis scandalizatur & ego non vror? Who is weake and I am not sicke? Or who is offended and I burne not? And that which followeth.

Vrie saith he will become the reporter.

To be briefe, toward the end of his daies, and being hoze hated, he conceiued two excellent imaginations. The one, concerning that great and wonderfull college that is now at building in your Rome, for the teaching (a wonderfull matter) of all languages in the world. The other, the same which he propounded and began to put in execution touching the recouerie of the goods of the catholike apostolike Romish church. The same was it which he did so highlie commend to the clergie, yea to the christian princes, and vnto his successor, to the end that the Romane sée might recouer the full brightnesse of hir glorie, and to depriue the enimie of mankind of that innumerable gaine of soules, that through his subtiltie he doth dailie make. These were his last words when he left vs with the water in our eies, and sorrow in our harts, for the losse of a thing of so great value. Neuertheleslie, sith it is to no purpose to weepe, it resteth that we do two things. The one, that so much as in vs lieth, we indeuour to reteine those notable institutions, and walke in that path which he hath prescribed for vs. The other, that we haue recourse to God with praier, that he will send vs a successor worthie him: and that as Simplician succéeded saint Ambrose, so to this Ambrose an other Simplician in vertue and holinesse maie succéed.

Two imaginations in Gregories head toward his death.

Some traitorous deuise for the persecution of the gospell.

God rest our all of the succession, & giue his truth free passage against popery.

This is that small matter, Oh blessed soule, which my foolish and vnméete tong is able this day to vtter of thée in middest of these sighs and lamentations. Now shall it cease: howbeit, at time conuenient, both this daie and euer, my heart shall discourse of thée. Oh wretch that I am! O ye Romane people, to whome happeneth still the contrarie of that which happened to the Romane souldior, that was wounded and maimed vpon one of his legs, at a certeine victorie that he obteined. For he said, that at euerie step that he set, and vpon the least paine that he felt of his leg, he called to mind the most honorable blason of his glorie: but I contrariwise, in the least commendations that I may obteine, shall thinke vpon my losses. For when soeuer I shall boast, that I haue béene seruant to such a holinesse, and so great a personage, I must necessarilie withall remember what a good I am depriued of. Let vs therefore praie to our good God, that it may please him of his grace with his holie spirit to inspire the most reuerend cardinals, the electors of the holie apostolike and Romish sée, to the end his holinesse successor, succéeding in the holie sée, may likewise succéed in those vertues and holinesse, wherewith he was indued and replenished.

Flacke good soule that hast lost thy solace and comfort.

¶ This is the parasiticall and flattering* sermon of a popeling, patched togither like a beggers mantle of sundrie rotten rags diuerslie colored: wherein there is as much learning as wit; and as much of both as of truth and goodnesse in this praiser and the praised: of whome (because it is sinne against the holie ghost to speake otherwise than according to the motion of a good and sound conscience) an epitaph imprecatorie (as fit for him as a pudding for a friers mouth) is here placed as a conclusion of this his memoriall, and apliable vnto all and euerie one of that antichristian and diabolicall succession:

Albus an ater (lector) cognoscere quiuis
Papa, tibi dicam qua ratione licet;
Tu metamorphosin lepidam spectabis: olorem

When this Gregozie was deceased, shortlie after (least the ouerlong vacancie of the sacred and apostolike sée should prejudice the Romish prelasie and cleargie) the succession came to Sixtus Quintus, who according to the disposition of his predecessors) indeuoring to mainteine the title of his supremasie, and to beare rule ouer mens consciences, as though perempzorie authozitie had by priuilege passed vnto the bishops of that sée to controll and giue the checke to all christendome; one iot oz minute whereof the beast now residing at Rome not meaning to relinquish, but rather to fortifie and aduance, vndertooke to intermedle with princes of renowme, as proffering to bring them within the compasse of his iurisdiction: insomuch that falling to the extreame point of his antichristian power, he let flie (but as paper shot) his excommunications, thinking that if anie thing were able to daunt and appall the courages of mightie men, this were the waie. But herein Sixtus Quintus was foiled, for prose whereof behold an answer to the excommunication latelie denounced and published by the said Sixtus Quintus, pope of Rome so called, against two christian princes vndernamed, and sent to Rome as followeth.

Sixtus quintus pope of Rome next after Gregozie the good fellow a bloudie comedian.

Excommunication a perilous bolt to shoot at princes.

The answer of Henrie king of Nauarre, and Henrie prince of Conde, to the excommunication of Sixtus Quintus, now pope, &c.

HEnrie by the grace of God king of Nauarre, prince of Bearne, chiefe péere and prince of France, opposeth himselfe against the excommunication of Sixtus Quintus, terming himselfe pope of Rome, auouching the same to be false, and appealeth to the court of péeres of France, of whome he hath the reputation to be the first in degrée. And as concerning the crime of heresie, whereof he is falslie accused by the said excommunication, he auoweth and affirmeth, that my lord the pope, saluing his holinesse and reuerence, hath therein most falselie and wickedlie lied: and that the pope himselfe is an heretike, which he offereth to proue publikelie in a generall oz common councell lawfullie assembled. Where if he shall refuse to appeare and submit himselfe, as by his owne canons and decrées he is speciallie bound, the said king doth and will hold and repute him a verie antichrist, and in that qualitie of antichrist denounceth perpetuall warre against him: protesting in the meane time, the popes wicked sentence to be vnlawfull and insufficient, and to prosecute against him and his successors (for reparation of honor) reuenge of the iniurie thereby offered to him and all the princes of his bloud, as the lewdnesse of the act and the present necessitie dw require. For if in times past, the princes and kings his progenitors haue béene able to chastise the insolencie and arrogancie of such companions as the pope is, when they forgat their duties, and exceeded the limits of their vocation and place, confounding and intermixing their spirituall iurisdiction with the temporall: the said king of Nauarre being in state nothing inferior to them, doth hope, that God will giue him the grace to reuenge the wrong and iniurie hereby done to his souereigne, his familie and bloud, and to the supreame courts and seats of iustice and parlement in France, vpon the said pope and his successors: and to that end and purpose he implozeth the aid, succour, and assistance of all true christian kings, princes & common-weales, whome this case doth concerne, together with the allies and confederats of the crowne of France, against the tyrannie and vsurpation of the said pope, and of the associated conspirators against the state of their souereigne, enimies to God, France, and the common peace and quiet of christendome. The like protestation is also made by Henrie of Burbon prince of Conde, vnto whome the excommunication likewise reacheth. ¶ Fired and set vp vpon the Pasquile at Rome to the view of all men.

The king of Nauarre implozeth the aid of all christian kings, &c. against the tyranne and vsurpation of the pope.

¶ In this yeare 1585, euen in Aprill, at the pleasant prime, sir Walter Raleigh knight, being incouraged by the reports of his men of the goodnesse of the soile and the fertilitie of the countrie, which they had discouered this yeare last past, and now by hir maiestie called Virginia, with knightlie courage counteruaileable to his double desire of honour, by vndertaking hard aduentures, furnished to his great charges eight sailes of all sorts, and immediatlie set them to the sea, ordeining sir Richard Grænfield his kinsman (a gentleman of verie good estimation both for his parentage and sundrie good vertues, who for loue he bare vnto sir Walter Raleigh, together with a disposition that he had to attempt honorable actions worthie of honour, was willing to hazard himselfe in this voiage) his lieutenant, inioining him either to tarrie himselfe, or to leaue some gentleman of good worth with a competent number of soldiers in the countrie of Virginia, to begin an English colonie there. Who with the ships aforesaid, hauing in his companie sir John Arundell, Thomas Candish, Rafe Lane, Edward Gorges, John Stukle, Edward Stafford, Philip Amadis, Arthur Barlow, Thomas Heriot, and diuerse other gentlemen with a competent number of souldiers, departed from London in Aprill aforesaid. But after they had sailed certeine numbers of leagues at the sea, by force and violence of fowle weather they were separated one from another; so that sir Richard Grænefield being singled from his fleet, all alone arriued in the Iland of Hispaniola in the west Indies, about the middest of June following, where he determined resolutelie to remaine, vntill he had built a bote (for he had lost his owne bote in the tempests aforesaid.)

shes, to inforce him to retire to his ship: but he nothing appalled with their brags kept his ground. Twelue daies after his arriuall there, after Thomas Candish arriued at the same place, where sir Richard Grænfield was ensconsing of himselfe, to the great reioising both of themselues & their companies. The Spaniards finding it too hard for them (notwithstanding their multitudes) to remoue these few resolute Englishmen by violence, came to a parlee, and in the same concluded an amitie, that the one nation might in safetie traffike with the other. Now when sir Richard Grænefield had taried in that Iland almost a moneth, and had built his bote, reuittelled himselfe, and laden his ships with horsses, mares, kine, sheep, swine, &c: to transport with him to Virginia (bicause these sorts of cattell heretofore were not to be found in that countrie) he departed thense; and in his waie he made discouerie of manie Ilands and hauens vpon the continent adioining, and arriued safelie in the new discouered countrie (where he met with the rest of his fleet that attended his comming thither) about the middest of Julie next insuing, not without great danger of shipwracke. For at the verie entrance into the harborough, his ship strake on the ground, and did beat so manie strokes vpon the sands, that if God had not miraculouslie deliuered him, there had beene no waie to auoid present death. In this danger his ship was so bruised, that the saltwater came so aboundantlie into hir, that the most part of his corne, salt, meale, rice, bisket, & other prouisions that he should haue left with them that remained behind him in the countrie was spoiled.

Sir Richard Grænefield meeteth with the rest of his fleet and is in danger of shipwracke.

Sir Richard Grænefield establisheth an English colonie in Virginia by commission.

After he had remained there certeine daies, according to his commission from sir Walter Raleigh, he began to establish a colonie, appointing maister Rafe Lane (a gentleman of good account) generall of those English which were to remaine there, being in all to the number of an hundred and seauen persons, amongst whom diuerse gentlemen remained; namelie, Philip Amadis, Edward Stafford, Heruin, Kendall, Prideaux, Acton, Heriot, and others. When he had taken sufficient order for the establishing of maister Lane and his companie aforesaid, leauing with them as much of all prouisions as his plentie would giue him leaue, he weighed anchor for Engl nd. But in his returne, not hauing sailed manie leagues from the coast of Virginia, he descried a tall ship of foure hundred tuns or thereabouts, making the same course that he did, vnto whom he gaue chase, and in few houres by goodnesse of saile ouertooke, and by violence wan, richlie laden with sugar, hides, spices, and some quantitie of gold, siluer, and pearle: she was the viceadmerall of the fleet of Sancto Domingo that were for Spaine. After this good fortune, hauing a merie gale, not manie daies after he arriued at Plimmouth in October next insuing; where sir Walter Raleigh meeting with him, did presentlie resolue vpon another voiage, to supplie Rafe Lane, and his companie that were left with him in Virginia, the next spring following: which accordinglie was performed with all expedition.]

¶ On the nineteenth of Maie being Ascension eeue, Edward Wotton esquier, descended of a worthie parentage, was ambassador into Scotland, to establish a league of amitie betweene the two nations of England and Scotland: whome I will now leaue in that countrie executing his commission, and turne my pen to some persons of that surname, who for their singularitie of wit & lerning, for their honour and gouernement in and of the realme about the prince, and elsewhere at home and abroad, deserue such commendations, that they merit Nineo signari lapillo. In treating of whome I will neither make mention of the antiquitie of that worshipfull familie from the first originall, nor yet treat of Richard Wootton, liuing in the time of Edward the first, the father of John Wootton coroner of Dunstable an officer of great account in those daies and father to an other John Wootton, &c: nor of Richard Wootton or Wocton, an officer of the exchekar in the time of Edward the second, nor of sir Nicholas Wootton knight, liuing about the daies of Richard the second, nor of anie other Woottons whereof this Edward Wootton is descended: but onelie of such Woottons his ancestors, who of late time liued within the compasse of my memorie, and were the sonnes of sir Robert Wootton of Boton Malherbe in Kent knight, deseruing not to be forgotten, in that he was father to two such worthie sonnes, as I do not remember that euer England nourished at one time for like honour, disposition of mind, fauour and seruice to their countrie.

The Woottons an ancient familie, and of speciall name in diuerse kings reignes.

Sir Robert Wootton of Boton Malherbe in Kent, a man of singular note.

The sonnes of this sir Robert Wootton, whereof we intend to intreat, were sir Edward Wootton knight the eldest, and Nicholas Wootton doctor of both lawes the yonger sonne. Whereof the first being a man of great estimation in the countrie for his orderlie and wise managing of the priuat affaires of his countrie of Kent, was for his fidelitie and good carriage in small things made lord and ruler of great things. For king Henrie the eight, vnderstanding the grauitie of the man, his rare wit, deepe iudgement, great experience, and other parts required in a sound councellor, did admit this sir Edward into his owne bosome, and made him of his priuie councell: whose modest mind being so farre estranged from desire of honour, as that he would not accept it by great inforcement (a vertue verie rare, and such as declareth a noble mind iudiciallie grounded vpon the truth of diuine philosophie) refused the honorable place of the chancellorship of England, accounting that the vertue of the mind made a man honorable, and not the honorable place. For Wherefore not being ambitious of honour (after which the best do often hunt, although such greedie desire of honour and ambition be, as saith Barnard, Futile malum, secretum virus, pestis occulta, doli artifex, mater hypocrisis, liuoris parens, vitiorum origo, tinea sanctitatis, excæcatrix cordium, ex remedijs morbos creans, ex medicina languorem generans) did further increase his honour and aduance him to greater credit; as appeareth by this, that king Henrie the eight, whom this man had long and faithfullie serued in his life time, made him one of his executors, and the disposer of his testament at the time of his death; with whom also in the same authoritie he ioined his brother doctor Nicholas Wotton, a man of no lesse merit than the other, and rightlie deseruing to be here ioined in remembrance with his brother after their deaths, since almost equall honor, like loue, the same authoritie in the common-weale, one bloud, and one Christ did ioine them togither in perfect amitie during their liues: of which Nicholas Wotton I will not speake anie more (except that as his brother refused the chancellorship, so he in the beginning of the reigne of this queene refused the bishoprike of Canturburie) but that which the worthie gentleman Thomas Wotton of Boton Malherbe esquire now liuing (sonne to the said sir Edward, and nephew to the said Nicholas, this Thomas being a great and fast fauorer of his countrie, not vnthankefull vnto him wherefore) hath set downe in a statelie and rich tome of curious workemanship, formed after the order of a pyramis, and placed in the church of Canturburie, on which is ingraued in a faire stone of marble this epitaph following: wherin his birth, his parents, his honors at home, his ambassages abroad, and other things necessarie the knowledge are faithfullie set downe.

In which epitaph it appeareth what he was, & how greatlie learned and reuerenced for the same. Wherfore néeding not to speake anie more of him, sith I shall not be able with due maiestie of stile to expresse his worthinesse; I will yet, leauing what otherwise his merit might challenge to be spoken, note one strange and rare thing, which to my remembrance neuer happened to anie one man before the same; being this, that he had not onelie béene councellor to foure kings and quéenes of England following in succession of time, but also that he had béen thirteene seuerall times ambassador and orator to diuerse princes for the affaires of the publike wealth, and the princes honor. Thus leauing this worthie doctor with his nephue Thomas Wotton, father to Edward Wotton sent ambassador to Scotland, which occasioned me to treat thus much of the Wottons, I conclude, that it is a singular blessing of God, not commonlie giuen to euerie race, to be beautified with such great and succeeding honor in the descents of the familie. Whereof this Edward Wotton now liuing, hath in the life of his father giuen great proofe of continuance to descend to their posteritie, in that he in these his yoong yeares, hath béene (after his trauell ouer the most part of Europe) twise imploied in ambassages for the seruice of his countrie; first to the king of Portingall, & now to the king of Scots: with whome I will at this time set end to this discourse of the Wottons.]

This is touched in the former epitaph among other his preferments.

Commendation of Edward Wotton, in respect of his great trauelling ouer the most part of Europe and his imploiments in ambassages &c.

On the one and twentith date of June, Henrie Persie earle of Northumberland, prisoner in the Tower of London vpon vehement suspicion of high treason, was there found dead, and also of his owne diuelish intent, and of his malice before pretended to haue murthered himselfe, as more manifestlie and at large may appeare, by an inquisition made by a substantiall iurie, taken before the coroner as followeth verbatim with the record.

Dowe, Anthonie Hall, William Curtis, Thomas Wood, Matthew Dolman, Thomas Martin, Richard Slefoꝛd, John Trot, Philip Smith, Thomas Taylor, and Henrie Bowdler, of good and lawfull men of the same ward, and of three other wards to the same ward next adioining, as the maner and custome is in the citie afoꝛesaid, to inquire how, in what maner, and when the said Henrie Persie late earle of Noꝛthumberland came to his death.

The verdict of the iurie deliuered vpon their oths.

Which iurie doo saie vpon their oths, that on the one & twentith daie of this instant moneth of June, in the yeare of the reigne of our souereigne ladie Elisabeth by the grace of God quéene of England, France, and Ireland, defendoꝛ of the faith, &c: the seuen and twentith afoꝛesaid, and long befoꝛe the foꝛesaid Henrie late earle of Noꝛthumberland pꝛisoner in the Tower of London situat in the parish of Alhallows Barking afoꝛesaid, in the ward of the Tower of London afoꝛesaid, foꝛ suspicion of high treason afoꝛesaid, by him against our souereigne ladie the quéene supposed to be committed; and the foꝛesaid earle so remaining pꝛisoner, and being placed in a certeine chamber within the Tower of London afoꝛesaid, there pꝛisoner remaining, imagining and intending himselfe diuelishlie and feloniouslie to kill and murther befoꝛe the foꝛesaid one & twentith daie of June: that is to saie, the sixteenth daie of June in the seuen and twentith yeare afoꝛesaid, did pꝛepare a certeine dag of iron and steele of the value of ten shillings: and also certeine bullets of lead, and a certeine quantitie of gunpowder, conteined in a certeine small boꝛ, and caused the foꝛesaid gun, the bullets of lead and the gunpowder to be bꝛought into the foꝛesaid chamber vnto him the same earle of Noꝛthumberland, and to be deliuered to the same earle then and there by the hands of James a Pꝛice yeoman, to execute his diuelish and felonious purpose and intention.

The meanes that the earle made and pꝛepared to destroie himselfe.

Which dag afoꝛesaid, the foꝛesaid earle caused secretlie to be hidden in a certeine mattris vnder the bolster of his bed in the chamber afoꝛesaid, and then and there, the foꝛesaid one and twentith daie of June in the seuen and twentith yeare afoꝛesaid, betweene the houres of twelue and one in the night of the foꝛesaid one and twentith daie of June, thinking and intending to pꝛosecute and follow his diuelish intention and purpose afoꝛesaid, did bolt the doꝛe of the foꝛesaid chamber, and the inner part of his said chamber towards himselfe, least anie man should foꝛsee oꝛ withstand his diuelish, felonious, and malicious intent: and the said doꝛe of his foꝛesaid chamber, being so bolted; the same earle then and there into his bed himselfe did laie; and vpon this afterward, that is to saie, the foꝛesaid one and twentith daie of June, in the seuen & twentith yeare afoꝛesaid, about the houres afoꝛesaid, within the Tower of London afoꝛesaid, situat and being in the parish of Alhallows Barking afoꝛesaid, in the ward of the Tower of London afoꝛesaid, not hauing the almightie God oꝛ his feare befoꝛe his eies, but being moued and seduced by the instigation of the diuell, of his malice afoꝛe pꝛetended; did take vp into his hands the foꝛesaid dag of iron and steele, then and there made readie, charged with gunpowder, and three bullets of lead, and the foꝛesaid dag to the left part of his breast neere vnto the pappe of the same part of his brest, then and there feloniouslie and diuelishlie did put, and vpon the same part of his brest the foꝛesaid dag did discharge.

This consenteth with the discourse following, wherein the same matter is more largelie handled.

The order of the action that was the earls destruction.

By reason of the violence of which gunpowder, and of the foꝛesaid three bullets of lead, the foꝛesaid earle into his bodie and heart, and through his chinebone, euen into his right shoulder, himselfe then and there with the foꝛesaid bullets of lead feloniouslie and voluntarilie did strike; giuing vnto himselfe then and there one mooꝛtall wound, of the depth of twelue inches, and of the bꝛeadth of two inches: of which mooꝛtall wound afoꝛesaid, the foꝛesaid earle within the Tower of London afoꝛesaid, the daie, yeare, pꝛish, and ward afoꝛesaid, instantlie died. And so the iurie doth saie vpon their oths afoꝛesaid, that the foꝛesaid earle, the daie, yeare, and place aboue written, of his diuelish intent afoꝛesaid, and of his malice befoꝛe pꝛetended, felonioulie and voluntarilie himselfe did kill and murther in manner and foꝛme afoꝛesaid, against the peace of our souereigne ladie the quéene, hir crowne and dignitie. But what goods and cattels the foꝛesaid earle in the time of the felonie and murther to himselfe afoꝛesaid committed, had, oꝛ as yet hath, the iurie knew not, &c: in witnesse whereof, &c.

The bꝛeadth and depth of his wound.

¶ This was the verdict of the iuroꝛs, whereby the manner how, and the matter whereby the earle dispatched himselfe is trulie declared: which being taken foꝛ truth (as deseruing no lesse, the parties welwoꝛthie of credit) it remained to pꝛouide foꝛ the bestowing of his wꝛetched carcase, which on the three and twentith daie of June was buried in saint Peters church within the said Tower of London. This was the end of that graceless earle, the manner of whose murther, and part of his treasons are here dilated, as the same was publikelie deliuered in the Starchamber, and after published in a booke intituled:

Henrie earle of Noꝛthumberland buried in the Tower.

A true and summarie report of the declaration of some part of the earle of Northumberlands treasons, deliuered publikelie in the court at the Starchamber by the lord Chancellor and others of hir maiesties most honoꝛable priuie councell, & councell learned, by hir maiesties speciall commandement, togither with the examinations & depositions of sundrie persons touching the maner of his most wicked and violent murther committed vpon himselfe with his owne hand, in the Tower of London, the 20 daie of June, 1585.

MAlice, among other essentiall pꝛoperties pertaining to hir ouglie nature, hath this one not inferioꝛ to the rest and the woꝛst, incredulitie, wherewith the commonlie possesseth the minds and affections of all those that are infected with hir, so blinding the eies & iudgement of the best and clearest sighted, that they cannot see oꝛ perceiue the bꝛight beames of the truth, although the same be deliuered with neuer so great puritie, pꝛofe, circumstance and pꝛobabilitie. It is said that no truth passeth abꝛoad vnaccompanied with hir contrarie; and as they go, truth is euer constreined to yeeld the pꝛecedence and pꝛeheminence to hir yokefellow falshood, whose lodging is alwaies first made and pꝛepared without a harbenger in the coꝛrupt nature of mankind, by whome she is first receiued, interteined and harboꝛed at all times: whereof in our dailie experience there happen manie and dangerous demonstrations, especiallie in matters of the highest moment, tending to excuse oꝛ accuse the actions of the greatest personages.

Incredulitie an essentiall pꝛoperti of malice.

Truth and falshood commonlie concur & are oppolite.

There was of late deliuered in publike by persons of honour, credit, and reputation, a large declaration of certeine treasons pꝛactised by the late earle of Noꝛthumberland, of the maner of his vntimelie death, being with his owne hand murthered in the Tower, and of the causes that wꝛought him thereunto. The particularities whereof are such and so manie, as foꝛ the helpe of my memoꝛie (comming then to the Starchamber by occasion, and not looking foꝛ anie such pꝛesence of the nobilitie and priuie councell as I found there at that time, and not looking foꝛ anie such cause of that nature to haue béene handled there that daie) I toke notes of the seuerall matters

Upon the hearing of the treaſons with their proofs and circumſtances, and the deſperat maner of the earles deſtruction deliuered in that place, and by perſons of that qualitie, I ſuppoſed no man to haue bene ſo void of iudgement or the vſe of common reaſon, that would haue doubted of anie one point or particle thereof, vntill it was my chance (falling in companie with diuerſe perſons at ſundrie times, as well about the citie of London as abroad) to heare manie men report variablie and corruptlie of the maner and matter of this publike declaration, poſſeſſing the minds and opinions of the people with manifeſt vntruths: as, that the earle had bene vniuſtlie deteined in priſon without proofe or iuſt cauſe of ſuſpicion of treaſon: and that he had bene murthered by deuiſe and practiſe of ſome great enimies, and not deſtroied by himſelfe. Theſe ſlanderous reports haue miniſtred vnto me this occaſion to ſet forth vnto thy view and conſideration (gentle reader) this ſhort collection of the ſaid treaſons and murther, as neere vnto the truth as my notes taken may lead and permit me, with the view of ſome of the examinations them ſelues concerning this cauſe for my better ſatisfaction ſince obteined. Which I haue vndertaken for two reſpects: the one, to conuince the falſe and malicious impreſſions and conſtructions receiued and made of theſe actions, by ſuch as are in heart enimies to the happie eſtate of his maieſties preſent gouernement: the other, becauſe it may be thought neceſſarie for the preuenting of a further contagion like to grow (by this creeping infection) in the minds of ſuch as are apt (though otherwiſe indifferent) in theſe and the like rumors, to receiue the bad as the good, and they the moſt in number. Wherein if I haue ſeemed more bold than wiſe, or intermedled my ſelfe in matters aboue my reach, and not apperteining vnto me, I craue pardon where it is to be aſked, and commit my ſelfe to thy friendlie interpretation to be made of my ſimple trauell and dutifull meaning herein.

Upon the three and twentith daie of June laſt, aſſembled in the court of Starchamber, ſir Thomas Bromleie knight lord chancellor of England, William lord Burleigh lord treaſurer of England, George earle of Shrewſburie lord marſhall of England, Henrie earle of Derbie, Robert earle of Leiceſter, Charles lord Howard of Effingham lord chamberlaine, Henrie lord Hunſdon lord gouernor of Berwike, ſir Francis Knollis knight treaſurer, ſir James Croſt knight comptroller of his maieſties houſhold, ſir Chriſtopher Hatton knight vicechamberlaine to the queenes maieſtie, the lord chiefe iuſtice of his maieſties bench, the maiſter of the rolles, and the lord chiefe baron of the ercheker, and others. The audience verie great of knights, eſquiers, and men of other qualitie, the lord chancellor began briefelie and ſummarilie to declare, that whereas Henrie late earle of Northumberland, for diuerſe notable treaſons and practiſes by him taken in hand, to the danger not onelie of his maieſties roiall perſon, but to the perill of the whole realme, had bene long deteined in priſon, and looking into the guilt of his owne conſcience, and perceiuing by ſuch meanes of intelligence, as he by corrupting of his keepers and other like deuiſes had obteined, that his treaſons were by ſundrie examinations and confeſſions diſcouered, grew thereby into ſuch a deſperat eſtate, as that thereupon he had moſt wickedlie deſtroied & murthered himſelfe. Which being made knowen to the lords of his maieſties priuie councell, order was thereupon taken, and direction giuen to the lord chiefe iuſtice of England, the maiſter of the rolles, and the lord chiefe baron of the ercheker, to examine the maner and circumſtances of his death, which they with all good indeuor and diligence had accordinglie performed. And leaſt through the ſiniſter meanes of ſuch perſons as be euill affected to the preſent eſtate of his maieſties gouernement, ſome bad and vntrue conceipts might be had as well of the cauſe of the earles deteinement, as of the maner of his death: it was therefore thought neceſſarie to haue the truth thereof made knowen in that preſence: and then he required his maieſties learned councell there preſent to deliuer at large the particularities both of the treaſons, and in what ſort the earle had murthered himſelfe. Then began John Popham eſquier, his maieſties attourneie generall, as followeth.

The earle of Northumberland about the time of the laſt rebellion in the north, in the eleuenth yeare of his maieſties reigne (then called by the title of Henrie Perſie knight) had vndertaken the conueieng awaie of the Scotiſh queene: for the which (as appeareth by a record of the fourteenth yeare of his maieſties reigne) in the court of his maieſties bench he was indicted, he confeſſed the offenſe, and put himſelfe to his maieſties mercies. At which time, vpon his ſaid confeſſion, ſubmiſſion, and faithfull promiſe of his dutie and allegiance to his highneſſe from thenceforth, the queenes maieſtie of hir mercifull nature was pleaſed, not to looke into his offenſe with the extremitie of hir lawes; but dealt therein as by waie of contempt onelie, as may appeare by the record: the effect whereof was then ſhewed in the court, vnder the hand of one of the clerkes of his maieſties ſaid bench, In hæc verba.

An extract of the ſaid record conteining the ſaid earles indictment.

MEmorandum, that Henrie Perſie late of Tinmouth in the countie of Northumberland knight, was indicted in the terme of Eaſter, in the fourteenth yeare of his maieſties reigne, for that hee with diuers others did conſpire for the deliuering of the queene of Scots out of the cuſtodie of the erle of Shrewſburie. Upon which indictment the ſame Henrie Perſie did confeſſe the offenſe, and did put himſelfe to the queenes mercie: and thereupon iudgement was after giuen by the court, that the ſaid Henrie ſhould paie to the queene for a fine for his ſaid offenſe, fiue thouſand marks, as appeareth by the record thereof in court.

By this record it maie appeare that the earle had his hand in that rebellion. But for a further proofe thereof, it is moſt manifeſtlie diſcouered in a certeine tract written by the biſhop of Roſſe (wherein he ſheweth how faithfullie he behaued himſelfe in the managing of thoſe treaſons, at and about the time of that rebellion) that the ſaid earle was in effect as farre plunged into the ſame, as the late earle his brother, howſoeuer he wound himſelfe out of the danger thereof at that time. Notwithſtanding theſe traitorous practiſes, the queenes maieſtie was contented to remit all within a ſhort time, and then accepted cepted moſt gratiouſlie of him both in honor and fauor, though vnworthilie beſtowed vpon him, for that he vtterlie forgetting thoſe graces and fauors recei-ued at hir maieſties mercifull hands, with a grace-leſſe reſolution was contented to enter into a new plot now latelie contriued, not onelie for the deliuering of the Scotiſh queene, but for the inuading of the whole realme, the ouerthrow of the gouernment, aſwell concerning the ſtate of religion, as o-therwiſe, the danger of hir maieſties ſacred per-ſon, and aduancing of the ſaid Scotiſh queene to the regall crowne and ſcepter of this realme, whereunto hir maieſtie is lineallie and lawfullie borne and deſcended, and wherein God of his mercie contí-nue hir long in happie ſtate of gouernement, to the increaſe of hir owne glorie, and the comfort of hir louing and obedient ſubiects.

A ſumme of the traitorous purpoſes whereunto the earle was entered with a graceleſſe reſolution.

Then did maiſter Atturneie enter into the particularities of the treaſons, leauing manie parts thereof vntouched, becauſe the caſe ſtood ſo as it was not then conuenient to reueale them (as he ſaid) in reſpect that they touched ſome other perſons vndealt withall at that time, ſhewing that Throckemortons treaſons were not old, but freſh in euerie mans memorie, and how far forth they reached vnto the earle, he declared. And for that the treaſons of Throckemorton tended eſpeciallie to the inuading of the realme with forren forces, the purpoſe of that inuaſion long before intended, is proued by ſundrie examinations and confeſſions taken here within the realme, aſwell of hir maieſties owne ſubiects as others, by letters intercepted, written from and to the conſpirators abroad and at home, and by other good aduertiſements and intelligences had from forren parts diſcouering the ſame. He declared that in a letter written from doctor Sanders to doctor Allen out of Spaine, in the yeare 1577, it is ſet downe among other things, that the ſtate of Chriſtendome ſtood vpon the ſtout aſſailing of England.

The treaſons of Throckmorton communicable with the earle.

That in a letter ſent to the ſaid Allen from Rome, touching audience giuen by the pope to the ambaſſadors of certeine forren princes, betweene the pope & whom a league was agreed on againſt the queenes maieſtie, there were incloſed certeine articles conteining in effect, that the realme ſhould be inuaded with twentie thouſand men at the charge of the ſaid pope and princes, that hir maieſtie ſhould be depoſed, and ſome Engliſh catholike elected king. That it was confeſſed that the comming ouer of ſo manie prieſts into the realme, was to win great numbers to the catholike partie, to ioine (if opportunitie ſerued) either with forren inuaſion, or with tumult at home. That at Narbonne in Prouince, there was met an Engliſhman, being the head preacher there, who gaue intelligence to one of hir maieſties ſubiects, that the realme ſhould ſhortlie be inuaded by a forren king, and the popiſh religion reſtored:
and ſaid further, that prieſts came into England and diſperſed themſelues in countries, to make their partie ſtrong. A meſſage was ſent in Nouember 1581, to doctor Allen from a ſubiect of this realme, by a ſeminarie prieſt then returning beyond the ſeas: that whereas he had receiued word from Allen at Alhallontide before, that men and all things were in a readineſſe, if the place of landing might be knowne: that Allen ſhould forthwith ſend word whether things were in ſuch readineſſe or not: and if they were, he would then ſend him ſuch perfect in-ſtructions as he could. One Paine executed for treaſon, confeſſed that this realme could not continue in the ſtate wherein it was, for that the pope had a ſpeciall care thereof, and would in ſhort time either by forren princes, or by ſome other meanes worke a change of things here.

An inuaſion of this land by twentie thouſand men concluded vpon.

Paine with all of his accurſſed ſtampe ſhall (I hope in God) be found falſe prophets.

From hence, maiſter Atturneie fell into the treaſons confeſſed by Francis Throckemorton, ſhewing that the ſtate of this realme had beene often preſented to the conſideration of a forren prince, who after long hearkening to the motion, had reſolued to yeeld what furtherance he might, and to giue all aids neceſſarie for the reforming of religion, ſo they might be backed by ſuch as were well affected within this countrie. That the duke of Guiſe had ſolicited for two yeares together the pope and other princes, to ſupplie him with forces: but being croſ-ſed by the death of a great perſonage, it was now growne to this paſſe, if there could be a partie found in England to ioine in that action, and conuenient places and meanes for landing, and other things neceſſarie, there ſhould be a ſupplie for Guiſe of forren ſtrength. Francis Throckemorton was recommended from beyond the ſea to Don Barnardino de Mendoza, ambaſſador reſident for the Spaniſh king here in England, who acquainted Throckemorton what plot was laid for the enterprize of the duke of Guiſe, and that he was willed to conferre with Throckemorton in the matter, who thereupon acquainted the ſaid ambaſſador with the plot of the hauens, and with the noble men and gentlemen that he had ſet downe as fit to be dealt withall in that cauſe. Throckemorton ſaid, that the bottome of this enterprize (which was not to be knowne to manie) was, that if a toleration of religion might not be obteined without alteration of the gouerne-ment, that then the gouernment ſhould be altered, the queene remoued. That the Scotiſh queene was made acquainted from the duke of Guiſe with the intention to relieue hir by theſe forces.

Francis Throckemorton recommended to Don Barnardino de Mendoza & made acquainted with that which coſt him his life.

In the Month parts ſhould be purpoſed inuaſion of this land haue been made.

It was in debate betweene Throckemorton and the Spaniſh ambaſſador, how the Scotiſh queene might be deliuered, as by an enterprize to be made with a certeine number of horſſes: and it was told Francis Throckemorton by his brother Thomas Throckemorton, that it was a principall matter in debate beyond the ſeas, how ſhe might be deliuered with ſafetie: the lacke of reſolution wherin, was the principall ſtaie of the execution of the attempt of inuaſion. Mendoza told Francis Throckemorton about Bartholomewtide 1583, that one Pope was come into England to ſound the earle of Northumberland, and other principall men in Suſſex:
and about the end of September following, the ſame Mendoza told him, that Pope was Charles Paget, and that he came not onelie to ſound the men, but to view the places, the hauens, the prouiſi-ons and meanes, and neereneſſe and commoditie of mens abidings that ſhould ioine with the forren forces. It was deuiſed, that ſuch noble men and others, as would be contented to aſſiſt the forren forces (being iuſtices of peace & of credit in their countries) might by colour of their authoritie leuie men as for hir maieſties defenſe, and yet emploie them to aſſiſt the forren forces. The lord Paget was made acquainted with this deuiſe, and anſwered, that it was a good courſe, and that he had thought vpon it before. Mendoza told Throckemorton, that Charles Paget had beene in Suſſex, and had ſpoken with thoſe that were there, and that he came to moue the earle of Northumberland and others. The night before Throckemorton was apprehended, he came to the lord Paget, and deſired him that he would not acquaint the earle of Northumberland and certeine others (whome he named) with ſuch matters as had paſſed betweene them two, touching the practiſe of this inuaſion: and the lord Paget willed him to deale as wiſelie for his part as he would doo for himſelfe, and all ſhould be well: but (quoth the lord Paget) the earle of Northumberland knoweth

Francis Throckmorton ſtandeth in ſundrie examinations and confeſſions to confirme the report of this practiſe, ſo pa. 1374, 1375.

Charles Paget comming ouer about the proſecution & practiſe of the ſaid enterprize proued.

The earle examined and found therein a faiſer and double.

Francis Throckmorton deſireth the lord Paget not to make the earle priuie to the conſultation of them two.

knoweth you well enough. It was once agreed among the confederats, that the duke of Guise should land in Sussex, being ouer against Dieppe and Normandie: which after was misliked, because those parts laie too neere his maiesties greatest force and store, and that the people thereabout for the most part were protestants.

Maister attourneie shewed further, that in summer last, there was taken vpon the seas, sailing towards Scotland, a Scotish Jesuit, about whome there was found a discourse written in Italian of a like enterprise to be attempted against England, which should haue beene executed in September or October then last past: wherein assurance is made that the earles of Northumberland and Westmerland, Dacres that is dead, whom they termed lord Dacres, and of all the catholike lords and gentlemen in the north parts (where the invasion should haue beene attempted) setting it downe, that it is not said by coniecture that these men are assured, but that it is certeinlie knowne that they will ioine with the forren forces. In the said discourse it is also affirmed that the priests dispersed in the realme, can dispose of the other catholikes of the realme, as they shall be ordered: and that the popes excommunication should be renewed and pronounced against his maiestie, and all those that shall take his part: and that all such should be holden traitors that did not ioine with that armie by a daie.

In the North parts should the purposed invasion of this land haue beene made.

When maister attourneie had thus proued the purpose of invasion, he proceeded to the proofe of Charles Pagets comming ouer about the practise and prosecution of that enterprise. And first, that Paget came to Petworth in September 1583, was secretlie receiued, and brought in the night late to the earle of Northumberland into his gallerie at Petworth, by one of the earles seruants: where the earle and he had secret conference together by the space of a large houre: from thense Paget was likewise conueied backe into the towne by the same seruant, and there lodged all that night, and the nert night following was conueied secretlie to a lodge in the earles parke at Petworth, called Conigar lodge, where he was kept with like secrecie by the space of eight daies or thereabouts: and the seruant by whome Paget was thus conueied, was by the said earle inioined and commanded in no wise to discouer Pagets being there. The earle of Northumberland, vpon the arriuall of Charles Paget, sent for the lord Paget with the priuitie of this seruant, who was made beleeue that Charles came ouer to set things in order, and to passe certeine deeds and conueiances betweene the lord Paget and him. The lord Paget came to Petworth, staied there two nights, lodged in the earles house, conferred with Charles Paget, and with the earle togither sundrie times.

Charles Pagets comming ouer about the prosecution & practise of the said enterprise proued.

The earle examined and what therein he knew and confessed.

The earle afterwards examined what causes or affaires had passed betweene the lord Paget and Charles his brother, when they were togither at Petworth, answered one while, that they passed certeine deeds and conueiances; and another while, that there was onelie a will or testament signed and sealed betweene them: he confessed that he set his hand vnto the will, but knew not what the same conteined. All which appeared to be false, for that it hath fallen out by occasion of seizure of the lands and goods of the lord Paget (after his departure out of the realme) that he had disposed of his lands and goods by an other course of assurance executed at London: and therefore their pretense of the passing of deeds & will at Petworth, was but a deuise, to shadow their traitorous conspiracies.

Francis Throckmorton recommended to Don Bernardino de Mendoza & made acquainted with that which cost him his life.

Francis Throckmortons confessions do confirme the report of their practises, fo. pa. 1374, 1375.

Francis Throckmorton dissuadeth the lord Paget not to make the earle priuie to the consultations of them two.

And for better proofe thereof, it was alleaged by maister attourneie, that Charles Paget returning from Petworth to the house of one William Dauies, neere to the place where Paget had landed in Sussex, and toke shipping againe at his departure beyond the seas, sent to William Shelleie esquire, residing then at his house at Michelgroue, distant about a mile from the house of William Dauies, to come vnto him (who within few daies before had beene at the lodge at Petworth with the said Paget) and now at their meeting in a coppice neere to Dauies house, Paget entred into speech and discourse with him of diuers matters, and at the last among other things, he began to be inquisitiue of the strength and fortification of Portesmouth, and what forces and strength his maiestie had in the other parts westward.

William Shelleie an actor in this purposed tragedie, & what consultations passed betweene him and Charles Paget.

Paget brake out and declared vnto him that forraine princes would seeke reuenge against his maiestie of the wrongs by him done vnto them, & would take such time and opportunitie as might best serue them for that purpose, and said that those princes disdeined to see the Scotish queene so kept & vsed here as she was, and would vse all their forces for hir deliuerie: that the duke of Guise would be a dealer therin, and that the earle of Northumberland would be an assistant vnto them, willing Shelleie what soeuer should happen, to follow the earle of Northumberland, affirming that there was not a noble man in England of conduct and gouernment like to the said earle; saieng further, that the earle of Northumberland was affected to the Scotish queene, & would do what he could for hir aduancement: that the duke of Guise had forces in a readinesse to be employed for the altering of the state of religion here in England, and to set the forenamed Scotish queene at libertie.

God preuented this plot by the fatall end of the earle as he will in time disappoint all the complices.

Shelleie gathered by these and other speeches which passed betweene him & Paget, that Paget had dealt with the earle as a chiefe partie, and a man forward in these actions: and Paget confessed that he came ouer to breake and deale in these matters. Paget deliuered further, that the catholikes would all ioine for so good a purpose, for that it would be a meanes to reforme religion. He said, the stir should be in the North parts, because Sussex was not conuenient, as well for that there were no safe landing places, as for that it was so neere London, where the queenes maiestie would be readie to resist them, and that whensoeuer anie stir should be, the earle of Northumberland would not staie in Sussex, but would into the North parts.

The north parts appointed to be the receptacle of all the intended broile.

When maister attourneie generall had in this sort laid downe the particularities of the treasons and traitorous practises of the confederates for this purposed invasion; then Thomas Edgerton esquire, hir maiesties sollicitor, to proue the earle guiltie of these treasons by the circumstances of his own proceedings, shewed that the erle knowing how far him selfe was touched with the said treasons, & in what degree of danger he stood if they should haue bin reueled, found his onelie hope of safetie to consist in the cunning concealing of them, & therfore he indeuored to couer them by all the possible meanes he could deuise. And first by conueieng awaie of the lord Paget, a man not onelie priuie to the practises and treasons handled by Francis Throckmorton, but also to the treasons of his brother Charles, wherein the earle and the lord Paget were doubtlesse both confederats with Charles, made acquainted by him with the causes of his comming ouer, as principall men with whome he dealt in those matters at Petworth.

Maister solicitor, namelie Thomas Edgerton, proueth the earle guiltie, &c.

The lord Paget conueied ouer sea by the earles meanes & vpon what occasion.

The occasion that prouoked the earle to conueie awaie the lord Paget, grew vpon the apprehension of Throckmorton, who being committed to the Tower, and charged with high matters, was in case to be delt withall by waie of extremitie to be made to confesse the treasons charged vpon him; in reuealing whereof, Charles Pagets comming to Petworth, and the cause of his repaire thither could not be conceled. No man at this time within the realme could accuse the earle of these confederacies, but the lord Paget onlie, who stood in danger to be discouered by Francis Throckmorton: the safetie therefore of the earle rested altogither vpon the lord Pagets departing out of the realme. Which was procured by the earle with so great expedition, as that Throckmorton being cõmitted to the Tower about the seuenth daie of Nouember 1583, the earle made meanes the twelfe daie to haue the lord Paget prouided of shipping in all hast by William Shelleie, wherin the earle vsed such importunat intreatie, & sent so often to hasten the preparation of the ship, that the same was prouided, and the lord Paget imbarked by the 14. of the same moneth following, or thereabout.

This was a shift but yet successelesse, as appeareth by the sequele.

The departure of the lord Paget some after discouered, and how, and by whom he was conueied awaie: hir maiestie vpon good cause taking offense thereat, the earle being then at London had notice thereof, and of the confessions of Throckmorton (who began to discouer the treasons) came presentlie down to Petworth, sent immediatlie for William Shelleie, who comming to him to Petworth the next morning about dinner time, met the earle in a dining parlour readie to go to his dinner. The earle tooke Shelleie aside into a chamber, and as a man greatlie distracted and troubled in mind, entred into these speeches: Alas I am a man cast awaie! And Shelleie demanding what he ment by those speeches, the earle answered: The actions I haue entred into, I feare will be my vtter vndoing, and therupon desired Shelleie to keepe his counsell, and to discouer no more of him than he must needs. The earle moreouer at this meeting intreated William Shelleie to conueie away all such as he knew to haue beene employed and were priuie of the lord Pagets going awaie, and of Charles Pagets comming ouer, which was accordinglie performed by Shelleie: and the earle for his part conueied awaie a principall man of his own, whom he had often vsed in messages into France, and had beene of trust appointed by the earle, to attend on Charles Paget, all the time of his staie at Connigar lodge.

The earle and Shelleie conferre, and as men dismaied for the discouerie of their dealings are extreame pensife.

Maister solicitor pursuing the matters that made the earles practises and deuises for the concealing of his treasons manifest, declared further: that after the earle and Shelleie had obteined some libertie in the Tower after their first restreint: the earle found meanes to haue intelligence with Shelleie, & was aduertised from him of all that he had confessed in his first examinations, taken before they were last restreined: since which time, the earle by corrupting of his keeper hath practised to haue continuall aduertisements as before, as well of things done within the Tower as abroad: in so much as by his said keeper he had sent and conueied twelue seuerall letters out of the Tower within the space of nine or ten weekes, and one of those on sundaie the twentith daie of June in the morning, when he murthered himselfe the night following.

What deserued the keeper that would be corrupted by an offendor so malicious?

By the same corruption of his keepers he sent also a message to William Shelleie by a maidseruant in the Tower, by the which he required him to stand to his first confessions, and to go no further; for so it would be best for him, and he should keepe himselfe out of danger. Whereunto Shelleie returned answer by the same messenger, that he could hold out no longer, that he had concealed the matters as long as he could, and willed the earle to consider that there was a great difference betweene the earles estate and his: for that the earle in respect of his nobilitie was not in danger to be dealt withall in such sort as he the said Shelleie was like to be, being but a priuat gentleman, and therefore to be vsed with all extremitie to be made confesse the truth: wherefore he aduised the earle to deale plainlie, and to remember what speeches had passed at his house at Petworth, when Charles Paget came last thither.

The earle and Shelleie communicat their minds by message.

James Price a messenger to and fro betweene the earle & Shelleie.

James Price by the same corruption of the earls keeper came to William Shelleie on the fridaie or saturdaie before Trinitie sundaie last, and told him that the erle was verie desirous to vnderstand how farre he had gone in his confessions: and at Prices instance, Shelleie did set downe in writing the effect of the said confessions, and sent the same to the said earle: who vpon the sight therof, perceiuing the treasons reuealed and discouered, and knowing thereby how heinous his offenses were, fearing the iustice and seueritie of the lawes, and so the ruine and ouerthrow of his house, fell into desperation, & so to the destruction of himselfe. For confirmation whereof, it was confessed by one Jaques Pantins, a grome of the earles chamber, who had attended on the earle in the Tower by the space of ten weeks before his death, that he had heard the earle often saie, that maister Shelleie was no faithfull frend vnto him, and that he had confessed such things as were sufficient to ouerthrow them both: that he was vndone by Shelleies accusations, affirming that the earle began to despaire of himselfe, often with teares lamenting his cause, which the earle said to proceed onlie of the remembrance of his wife and children, saieng further, that such matters were laid vnto his charge, that he expected no fauour, but to be brought to his triall, and then he was but a lost man: repeating often that Shelleie had vndone him, and still mistrusting his cause, wished for death.

The earle bewaileth his desperat and forcethe him to destroie himselfe.

Herewith maister solicitor concluded, and then sir Roger Manwood knight, lord chiefe baron of hir maiesties exchekar, entered into the description of the earles death, and in what sort he had murthered himselfe: shewing first how the same had beene found by a verie substantiall iurie chosen among the best commoners of the citie, impanelled by the coroner vpon the view of the bodie, and diligent inquirie by all due meanes had according to the law, and declared, that vpon the discouerie of the intelligence conueied betweene the earle and Shelleie, it was thought necessarie for the benefit of hir maiesties seruice, by such of hir highnesse most honourable priuie councell, as were appointed commissioners to examine the course of these treasons, that Jaques Pantins attending vpon the earls, and the earles corrupt keepers should be remoued.

Sir Roger Manwood describeth the maner how the earle murthered himselfe.

Whereupon Thomas Bailiffe gentleman, sent to attend on the earle of Northumberland, vpon the remouing of Palmer and Jaques Pantins from about the said earle (who from the beginning of his last restreint attended on him) for the reasons last lie before mentioned, was by the lieutenant of the Tower on the sunday about two of the clocke in the after none (being the twentith of June) shut vp with the earle, as appointed to remaine with him, and serue him in the prison for a time, vntill Palmer, Pantins, and * Price, then committed close prisoners, might be examined, how the earle came by such intelligences as were discouered to haue passed betweene the earle and Shelleie, and betweene the earle and others. Bailiffe serued the earle at his supper, brought him to his bed about nine of the clocke, and after some seruices done by the earles commandement, mandement, departed from the earle to an vtter chamber, where he laie part of that night: and being come into his chamber, the earle rose out of his bed and came to his chamber doore, and bolted the same vnto him in the inner side, saieng to Bailiffe, he could not sleepe vnlesse his doore were fast.

O deepe at midnight!

About twelue of the clocke at midnight, Bailiffe being in a slumber, heard a great noise, seeming vnto him to be the falling of some doore, or rather a peece of the house: the noise was so sudden and so great, that he started out of his bed, and crieng vnto the earle with a lowd voice, said: My lord, know you what this is? The earle not answering, Bailiffe cried and knocked still at the earles doore, saieng, My lord, how do you? But finding that the earle made no answer, continued his crieng and calling, vntill an old man that laie without, spake vnto him, saieng, Gentleman, shall I call the watch, seeing he will not speake? Yea (quoth Bailiffe) for Gods sake. Then did the old man rise, & called one of the watch, whome Bailiffe intreated with all possible speed to call maister lieutenant vnto him. In the meane time Bailiffe heard the earle giue a long and most greeuous grone, and after that, gaue a second grone: and then the lieutenant (being come) called vnto the earle, who not answering, Bailiffe cried vnto the lieutenant to breake open the earles chamber doore bolted vnto him in the inner side, which was done, and then they found the earle dead in his bed, and by his bed side a dag, wherewith he had killed himselfe.

James Price a messenger to and fro betweene the earle & Shelley.

He could not answer hauing discharged the dag vnto his bodie.

Sir Owen Hopton knight, lieutenant of the Tower, 1585.

Sir Owen Hopton knight, examined vpon his oth, affirmed that on sundaie last at night, lesse than a quarter of an houre before one of the clocke after midnight, he was called vp by the watch to come to the earle of Northumberland, who had beene called vnto by maister Bailiffe his keeper, and would not speake as the watch told him. Whereupon the said sir Owen went presentlie to the earles lodging, opened the vtter doores, till he came vnto the chamber where maister Bailiffe laie, which was next to the earles bedchamber. Bailiffe said to this examinat as he came in, that he was wakened with a noise as it were of a doore or some great thing falling, & that he had called on the earle, and could haue no answer. And this examinat going to the earls chamber doore, finding the same bolted fast on the other side within the earles lodging, so as he could not go into the earle, this examinat called on the earle, telling him the lieutenant was there, and praied his lordship to open the doore.

The earle bewraieth desperat and forceth not to destroie himselfe.

The warders with their halberds wrest and wring at the earles chamber doore.

But this examinat hauing no answer made vnto him, and finding the doore fast bolted in the inner side of the earles chamber with a strong iron bolt, so as they could not enter into the same out of the lodging where the said Bailiffe laie, without breaking vp the chamber doore, caused the warders which were with this examinat, to thrust in their halberds, and to wrest the doore thereby, as much as they could, and withall to run at the doore with their feet, & with violence to thrust it open, which they did accordinglie. And when this examinat came into the chamber, in turning vp the sheets, he perceiued them to be bloudied: and then searching further, found the wound, which was verie neere the pap, not thinking at the first sight, but that it had beene done with a knife.

This examinat went thereupon presentlie to write to the court, and tooke the warders into the vtter chamber, & left them there vntill he returned, bolting the doore of the earles bedchamber on the outside. And as soone as this examinat returned from writing of his letter to the court, he searched about the chamber, and found the dag in the floore, about three foot from the bed, neere vnto a table that had a greene cloth on it, which did somewhat shadow the dag: and after, turning downe the bedcloths, found the box in the which the powder and pellets were, on the bed vnder the couerlet; and saith, that the chamber where the earle laie, hath no other doore but that one doore which was broken open as aforesaid, saue one doore that went into a priuie, which hath no maner of passage out of it: and that the earles lodging chamber, and the entering to the priuie, are both walled round about with a stone wall, and a bricke wall, and that there is no doore or passage out of or from the said earles bedchamber or priuie, but that onelie doore which was broken open by the appointment of this examinat. The warders that were with this examinat at the entrie into the prison, and the breaking vp of the earles chamber doore, and the doing of the other things aforesaid, were Michaell Sibleie, Anthonie Danies, William Riland, and John Potter, and one John Pinner this examinats seruant was there also.

the box and pellets in the bed.

This is a manifest proofe and full of sufficient credit, that none could come at him to do him violence.

Deponents viua voce, confirming the lieutenants deposition vpon his examination.

For the proofe and confirmation of the seuerall parts and points of this deposition, Sibleie, Danies, Riland, Potter and Pinner were deposed, and they viua voce affirmed so much thereof to be true, as was reported by the examination of the lieutenant, concerning the comming of the lieutenant vnto the earles chamber, the breaking vp of the doore being bolted with a strong bolt on the inner side, the finding of the earle dead vpon his bed, the dag lieng on the ground, the powder and pellets in a box on the bed vnder the couerlet, with the rest of the circumstances therevnto apperteining. They affirmed also, that there was but one doore in the earles chamber, sauing the doore of the priuie, which togither with the chamber was stronglie walled about with stone and bricke: and further (as I remember) the lord chiefe baron confirmed the same, hauing viewed the chamber himselfe where the earle lodged, and was found dead.

Of whom the dag was bought.

Iaques Pantins in his examination of the one and twentith of June confesseth, that James Price deliuered the dag to the earle his maister in this examinats presence: whereupon he presentlie suspected that the earle meant mischiefe to himselfe, and therefore did his indeuour to persuade the earle to send awaie the dag, and told the earle that he knew not how the diuell might tempt his lordship, & that the diuell was great; but could by no meanes preuaile with the earle in that behalfe: and saith moreouer, that the earle required him to hide the dag, and he thereupon hanged the same on a naile within the chimneie in the earles bedchamber, where the earle thinking the same not to be sufficientlie safe in that place, it was by the earles appointment taken from thense, and put into a slit in the side of a mattresse that laie vnder the earles bed, neere to the beds head, and that the same sundaie morning that the earle murthered himselfe at night, he saw the dag lieng vnder the earles beds head. The dag was bought not manie daies before of one Adrian Pulan a dagmaker, dwelling in east Smithfield, as by the said Pulan was testified viua voce vpon his oth, in the open court, at the time of the publike declaration made of these matters in the Starchamber.

All these particularities considered, with the depositions and proofs of the witnesse concerning the earles death; first, how he came by the dag; secondlie, how long he had kept the same, and in what secret maner; thirdlie, the earles bolting of his chamber doore in the inside; fourthlie, the blow of the dag; fiftlie, the breaking vp of the earles chamber doore by the lieutenant of the Tower; and lastlie, the finding of the earle dead as aforesaid; what is he so simple that will thinke or imagine, or so impudent and malicious that will auouch and report, that the earle of Northumberland should haue béene murthered of purpose, by practise or deuise of anie person, affecting his destruction in that manner? If men consider the inconuenience happened thereby, as well in matter of state, as commoditie to the quéenes maiestie, lost by the preuention of his triall, who can in reason coniecture the earle to haue béene murthered of policie or set purpose, as the euill affected séeme to conceiue?

If the earle had liued to haue receiued the censure of the law for his offenses, all lewd and friuolous obiections had then béene answered, and all his goods, cattels and lands by his atteindor had come vnto hir maiestie, and the honour and state of his house and posteritie vtterlie ouerthrowne: the consideration and feare whereof appeareth without all doubt to haue béene the principall and onelie cause that made him late violent hands vpon himselfe. If obiections be made, that to murther him in that sort might be a satisfaction to his enimies, who could be pacified by no meanes but with his blood: that séemeth to be as improbable, for that it is commonlie discerned in the corrupt nature of man, that when we are possessed with so profound a hatred, as to séeke the death of our enimie, we imagine and wish his destruction to be had with the greatest shame and infamie that can be deuised: thinke you not then, that if the earle of Northumberland had anie such enimie that knew the danger wherein he stood, and that his triall and conuiction by law would draw vpon him the losse of his life, lands and goods, fame, honor, and the vtter subuersion of his house, would be so kindharted vnto him, as to helpe to take awaie his life onelie, & saue him all the rest? I suppose there is no man of iudgement will beléeue it.

The principall cause that made the earle late hands vpon himselfe.

But to returne to the maner of the earles death. It was declared by the lord Hunsdon, and the lord chiefe baron, that the dag wherewith the earle murthered himselfe, was charged with three bullets, and so of necessitie with more than an ordinarie charge of powder, to force that weight of bullets to worke their effect. The earle lieng vpon his backe on the left side of his bed, tooke the dag charged in his left hand (by all likelihood) laid the mouth of the dag vpon his left pap (hauing first put aside his wastecote) and his shirt being onelie betwéene the dag and his bodie (which was burnt awaie the breadth of a large hand) discharged the same, wherewith was made a large wound in his said pap, his heart pearsed and torne in diuerse lobes or péeces, three of his ribs broken, the chinebone of his backe cut almost in sunder, and vnder the point of the shoulder blade on the right side within the skin, the three bullets were found by the lord Hunsdon, which he caused the surgion in his presence to cut out, lieng all three close togither within the breadth and compasse of an inch or thereabout: the bullets were shewed by his lordship at the time of the publication made in the court at the Starchamber.

The lord of Hunsdon declareth how the dag was more than ordinarlie charged: and how the earle dispatched him selfe.

Three bullets found vnder the point of the earls shoulder blade.

And whereas it hath béene slanderouslie giuen out to the aduantage of the earle, as the reporters suppose, that he was imprisoned & kept in so streict, narrow and close rowme, with such penurie of aire and breath, that thereby he grew sickelie and wearie of his life, and that to haue béene the cause chiefelie why he murthered himselfe; if it were so that he died by the violence of his owne hand which they hardlie beléeue. To answer that peeuish and senselesse slander, there was much spoken by the lord chiefe baron, who had viewed and caused verie exactlie to be measured the chambers and rowmes within the prison where the earle late, being part of his maiesties owne lodging in the Tower. The particular length and breadth of the said chambers & rooms, and the qualitie of the lights and windows, expressed by the said lord chiefe baron, I can not repeat: but well I do remember it was declared, that all the date time, the earle had the libertie of fiue large chambers, and two long entries within the vter dore of his prison: three of which chambers, and one of the entries late vpon two faire gardens within the Tower wall, and vpon the Tower wharfe, with a pleasant prospect to the Thames, and to the countrie, more than fiue miles beyond. The windowes were of a verie large proportion, yéelding so much aire and light, as more cannot be desired in anie house. Note therefore how maliciouslie those that fauour traitors and treasons, can deliuer out these and the like slanderous speéches, to the dishonor of hir maiestie, noting hir councellors and ministers with inhumanitie and vncharitable seueritie, contrarie to all truth and honestie.

A slanderous report of the quéenes enimies and the earles fauourers answered.

The earle wanted no prospect or pleasure nor walks of conuenient libertie.

The earle standeth vpon termes of his innocencie, all the world séeing cause to the contrarie.
